COL. KING. The corpse of this individual was scarcely deposited in its grave, when the anti-masonick party asserted that he was not dead. The story they tell is, that masons induced him to abscond; after which, to save his bail, the friends assembled and buried an empty coffin! These men talk of their respect for religion and domestic happiness, yet they have no scruples in asserting that the widow of colonel King and his twelve orphan children have followed with all the "mockery of woe," an empty coffin to the habitations of the dead. That the tears which on that occasion, were shed for the husband and the father, were evidences only of affected grief, assumed in defence of the masonick institution.

What are the people prepared to think of a combination of men who can thus, with the cry of religion in their mouths, violate the sanctity of the grave, scoff at the tears of bereaved relations, and brand with the charge of hypocrisy, the wailings of the orphan, whose tender years and unfeigned sorrow are blazoned to the world as evidence of crime. For what, it will be asked, is this done? To promote the views of a political party! No better motive can be found. It is the work of those who, aspiring to power and place, labour constantly to promote suspicion and distrust in society to advance their political views.

Without dwelling longer upon the relentless depravity of the act under consideration, let us spend a moment in contemplating the effects of such wickedness. This will be best done by assuming a case. Well, let us suppose that a culprit was convicted last week at our county court, of grand larceny, and when remanded to prison, to await his sentence, was placed in the debtor's apartment. Here, during the night, he forced open the outer door, with an axe, and escaped. These, we believe, are the facts. Now, our Sheriff, Jailor, and District Attorney are all anti-masons; and although we have not the least suspicion that either of these officers, or any one else was accessory to the escape, yet we might readily create such suspicion, and raise up a party in the county to act upon it. We might pursue the subject until no act of these officers should be fairly or honestly construed; and, without invading the solemnity of a funeral procession, we might render, in the opinion of honest and worthy men, their whole lives disrespectful by implication.

This is but a single case, nor is it marked by any peculiarity. By perverse intention and untiring efforts, suspicion may be made to pervade every walk of life, and attach to every station in community. What the situation of society would be, under such a state of things, we need not describe; nor need we comment further upon the motives of those who can charge bereaved relatives with concealing sinister designs under the funeral rights performed over the mortal remains of one whom in life they had loved.

From the Cayuga Patriot.

A good deal of contrivance and disguised preconcert, appears to have been resorted to, to draw out Mr. Colden's sentiments. He gives a distorted view of the masonick institution, which may have been occasioned either by prejudiced feelings or motives of private ambition. He admits, however, the main facts, for which we have contended: That the masons, as a body were not privy to or concerned in the abduction or death of Morgan. We presume he must admit also, that the masons, as a body, have never understood that they were bound to do anything contrary to moral principle, or hostile to the interests of society, and that they have acted honestly in joining and adhering to the masonick institution. Of course, as a body, they are not the proper subjects of proscription or persecution. Punish the guilty, wherever they can be discovered, and if the innocent are wrong in their sentiments or opinions, convince them by fair argument, but do not injure them. This is the course that ought to be pursued by honest anti-masons. But when we see a set of unprincipled men abusing and proscribing their fellow-citizens for their honest opinions and attachments, and riding anti-masonry as a political hobby, to acquire power and office, words cannot express the disgust we feel at such baseness of conduct and motive.

From the Norwich (Chenango co.) Journal.

CADWALLADER D. COLDEN. This gentleman has renounced masonry in his old age, with the expectation of being the anti-masonick candidate for governor. The bargain has been made by the few; we shall see whether the many will sanction it. He has undoubtedly done it to promote the interests of his party; but more particularly the interests of his own dear self. He denies that masonry is a political institution, and says that the craft had nothing to do with the abduction of Morgan. But he thinks if it should become political, it might be dangerous. It is in fact a glaring exhibition of mental imbecility, garnished with a little learning, which, in his case, was like seed sown upon a barren soil.

From the Fredonia Censor

Some of our poor, weak, renouncing brethren have a peculiar way of attaching importance to themselves. They affect to stand in great fear of being murdered by the masons, or having some other dreadful punishment inflicted upon them; betraying either a consciousness of guilt or an over-weening anxiety that they shall not become as noted as Morgan. But they stand in the same predicament as the fellow Hill, who accused himself of the murder of Morgan,—he being too insignificant to be hanged.

TO THE CLERGY OF ALL DENOMINATIONS IN THIS STATE.

For some years past in many of our churches, collections have been made on the 4th day of July, or on the preceding or following Sunday, for the benefit of the American Colonization Society. During the last session of the legislature of this state, a state society auxiliary to the American Colonization Society, was instituted in this city. The managers of the state society now respectfully request and urge the reverend clergy of all denominations in this state, with renewed zeal to repeat their efforts on the approaching anniversary of our independence, on the preceding or succeeding Sunday, to make collections to promote the benevolent and highly interesting objects of the American Colonization Society. What other purpose of benevolence can be more interesting to us as christians, philanthropists or patriots? What else can be done that promises such beneficent results? The well known objects of the American Colonization Society are the moral elevation of the freed black man; introducing into Africa and spreading the benefits of knowledge, civilization and christianity; the abolition of the slave trade on its western coast, north and south of Liberia; and in process of time, in accordance with the spirit of the age, with public opinion in the slave holding states, and with the interest of those states, to expel slavery from this blessed land.

This ultimate and grand object is of course distant, but it should be considered that in the history of nations, a century is but as a day in the life of an individual. We should think of the changes that have occurred in human opinion; in the condition of men and of nations, during the lapse of the last century, during the brief period of our own lives.

Who can think of estimating the good that has already been done by the American Colonization Society. It is not extravagant to say, that the condition of multitudes of our race during the progress of future centuries, may be influenced by the establishment of the colony of Liberia. Every vessel sent by the charity of the wise and good of this country, with freed black people to Africa, may carry with it seeds which will spring up and produce fruits of moral and intellectual good for ages to come. In planting that little colony, we may hope that a work has been done "which not years, nor ages, nor time, nor eternity shall undo." The growth of the colony will facilitate its intercourse, and increase its commerce with this country; and consequently diminish the price of the passage from the one to the other. It has hitherto progressed beyond the hopes and expectations of its founders and patrons. Coffee, the produce of Liberia, is now selling in this city.

We have every inducement to exert ourselves in hastening on all the good expected from the efforts of the society; and it is hoped that the collections to be made the next 4th of July, will exceed those of any former year.

The moneys to be collected may be transmitted to Richard Yates, Esq. cashier of the New York State Bank, and treasurer of the society.

DIED.

In this city, on Tuesday afternoon last, Mrs CATHARINE EIGHTS, widow of the late Abraham Eights, aged 80 years.

On Saturday morning last, at the residence of his son, in Roxbury, Massachusetts, departed this life, general HENRY DEARBORN, aged 78 years and three months.

In Hamilton, Butler county, Ohio, on Thursday, the 19th ult. captain JOHN CLEVELAND SYMMES, extensively known as the author of a theory of open Poles and Concentrick Spheres. Captain Symmes was a native of New-Jersey, but emigrated to the western country. He was attached to the Army of the United States for a number of years, and during the late war distinguished himself on the northern frontier by his coolness and intrepidity. He sustained through life the character of an amiable and exemplary man, and died with religious composure and philosophick resignation. He was buried with military honours.

POETRY.

JULIA, TO HER LOVER.

Edgar, by the roses of the spring,
By maidhood, honour, truth, and every thing,
I love thee, so that maugre all thy pride
Nor wit nor reason can my passion hide. Shakspeare.

And wilt thou then, my Edgar dear,
To other climes depart,
Nor stay to dry the rising tear
That swells my breaking heart,
Thy Julia, oft I've heard thee say,
Was all on earth that's worth thy stay,
And can thou her so calmly leave,
And o'er her image never grieve.

Julia, thou loved one, thou did say
Weep not for me, my love,
The time's but short and while away
'T will serve thy worth to prove.

We parted then, I saw him go,—
He left me, shrouded deep in wo,
And deep in wo, I shall remain
Till Edgar doth return again.

Oh Heaven! a hapless maiden cheer,
My loved one guard, I pray,
Where'er he is, be thou still near
And keep him day by day.

At thy command the foaming crest
Of Ocean's wave sinks calm to rest,
Let that command make smooth the sea,
And Edgar bring to love—near me.

HOBLEDEHOYS.

"Not a man—nor a boy,
But a Hobbledehoy." Old Song.

O these is a time, a happy time,
When a boy is just half a man;
When ladies may kiss him without a crime,
And flirt with him like a fan:—
When mamma with their daughters will leave him alone,
If he only will scamp to fear them;
While, were he a man or a little more grown,
They never would let him come near them.

These, Lilly!—these were the days when you
Were my boyhood's earliest flame,—
When I thought it an honour to tie your shoe,
And trembled to hear your name;—
When I scarcely ventured to take a kiss,
Though your lips seemed half to invite me;
But, Lilly! I soon got over this,—
When I kissed—and they did not bite me.

O! those were glad some and fairy times,
And our hearts were then in the spring,
When I passed my nights in writing you rhymes,
And my days in hearing you sing:—
And do n't you remember your mother's dismay
When she found in your drawer my sonnet;
And the beautiful verses I wrote one day,
On the ribbon that hung from your bonnet!

And the seat we made by the fountain's gush,
Where your task you were wont to say;
And how I lay under the holly hush,
Till your governess went away:—
And how, when too long at your task you sat,
Or whenever a kiss I wanted,
I brayed like an ass—or mewed like a cat,
Till she deemed the place was haunted?

And do not you, love, remember the days,
When I dressed you for the play,
When I pinned your kerchief and laced your stays,
In the neatest and tidiest way?—
And do you forget the kiss you gave
When I tore my hands with the pin;—
And how you wondered men would not shave
The beards from their horrible chin?

And do you remember the garden wall
I climbed up every night,—
And the racket we made in the servant's hall,
When the wind had put out the light;—
When Sally got up in her petticoat;
And John came out in his shirt—
And I silenced her with a guinea note,
And blinded him with a squirt?

And don't you remember the horrible bite
I got from the gardner's bitch
When John let her out of the kennel for spite,
And she seized me crossing the ditch:—
And how you wept when you saw my blood,
And numbered me with love's martyrs—
And how you helped me out of the mud,
By tying together your garters?

But, Lilly! now I am grown a man,
And those days are all gone by,—
And fortune may give me the best she can,
And the brightest destiny;
But I would give every hope and joy
That my spirit may taste again,
That I once more were that gladsome boy,
And that you were as young as then.

AN EVERY DAY CHARACTER.

Fallentis semita vite.

Horac.

Near a small village in the West,
Where many very worthy people
Eat, drink, play whist, and do their best
To guard from evil Church and Steeple,
There stood,—alas! it stands no more!—
A tenement of brick and plaster,
Of which, for forty years and four,
My good friend Quince was lord and master!

Welcome was he in but and hall,
To maids and matrons, peers and peasants,
He won the sympathies of all
By making puns, and making presents:
Though all the Parish were at strife,
He kept his counsel, and his carriage,
And laughed and loved a quiet life,
And shrank from Chancery suits and marriage.

Sound was his claret and his head;
Warm was his double ale, and feelings,
His partners at the whist club said,
That he was faultless in his dealings—
He went to Church but once a week;
Yet Dr. Poundtext always found him
An upright man, who studied Greek,
And liked to see his friends around him.

Asylums, Hospitals, and Schools,
He used to avenge were made to cozen;
All who subscribed to them were fools,
And he subscribed to half dozen;
It was his doctrine that the poor
Were always able, never willing;
And so the beggar at his door,
Had first abuse, and then a shilling.

Some publick principles he had,
But was no flatterer, nor fretter;
He rapped his box when things were bad,
And said, "I can not make them better!"
And much he loathed the patriot's snort,
And much he scorned the placeman's snuffle."
And cut the fiercest quarrels short,
With—"Patience, gentlemen, and shuffle."

For full ten years his pointer, Speed,
Had couched beneath his master's table;
For twice ten years his old white steed
Had fattened in his master's stable—
Old Quince averred, upon his troth,
They were the ugliest beasts in Devon;
And none knew why he fed them both,
With his own hands, six days in seven.

Where'er they heard his ring or knock,
Quicker than thought, the village slatterns
Flung down the novel, smoothed the frock,
And took up Mrs. Glasse, and patterns;
Adeline was studying baker's bills;
Louisa looked the queen of knitters;
Jane happened to be hemming frills;
And Bell, by chance, was making fritters.

But all was vain: and while Decay
Came like a tranquil moonlight o'er him,
And found him gouty still, and gay,
With no fair Nurse to bless or bore him;
His rugged smile, and easy chair,
His dread of matrimonial lectures,
His wig, his stick, his powdered hair,
Were themes for very strange conjectures.

Some sages thought the stars above
Had crazed him with excess of knowledge;
Some heard he had been crossed in love,
Before he came away from College—
Some darkly hinted, that his Grace
Did nothing, great or small, without him,
Some whispered with a solemn face,
That there was something odd about him!

I found him at threescore and ten,
A single man, but bent quite double,
Sickness was coming on him then,
To take him from a world of trouble—
He prosed of slipping down the hill,
Discovered he grew older daily;
One frosty day he made his will,—
The next he sent for Dr. Bailey.

And so he lived,—and so he died!—
When last I sat beside his pillow,
He shook my hand—"Ah!" he cried,
"Penelope must were the willow."
Tell her I hugged her rosy chain
While life was flickering in the socket;
And say, that when I call again,
"I'll bring a license in my pocket."

"I've left my house and grounds to Fag—
(I hope his master's shoes will suit him:)
And I've bequeathed to you my nag,
To feed him for my sake—or shoot him.
The Vicar's wife will take old Fox,—
She'll find him an uncommon mouser;
And let her husband have my box,
My Bible, and my Assmanshauser.
"Whether I ought to die or not
My doctors can not quite determine;
It's only clear that I shall rot,
And be, like Priam, food for vermin.
My debts are paid;—but nature's debt
Almost escaped my recollection!—
Tom!—we shall meet again;—and yet
I can not leave you my direction!"

THE SKY ROCKET.

BY CHARLES EDWARDS.

Thou dost but mock the elements, proud thing!
And let the stars, so quiet, turn thee pale;—
The fire of nature's womb may lend a wing—
And the wind let thy scintillations sail:
Still, thou art earthly, and to earth must fall,
As meteor fly with robe of borrowed light:—
Oh, if my soul could so o'erleap its wall,
And have a chance of such a gallant flight,
It should not be dispersed like unstrung pearl,
But on and on give out a fearless ray;
Winnow a path between the night-lamp's curl;
And rush to glory, through the milky way.—
Nor rest, until it glowed before God's throne,
As incense quivers on an altar stone.

MASONICK RECORD.

TO THE PUBLICK.

Our apology for addressing you, if any is necessary, is to be found in the very extraordinary papers which have appeared in the publick prints, bearing the signatures of some seventy respectable members of the masonick fraternity. One of the papers in question is a "CIRCULAR," addressed to the masonick lodges in the western part of our state, proposing to them the abandonment of their charters, as a means of restoring peace to the community, which is highly excited by reason of the outrage committed on the person of WILLIAM MORGAN. The other is an "ADDRESS TO THE PUBLICK," echoing the advice given in the Circular, and stipulating, on the part of the signers, to withhold their attendance on masonick meetings.

The appearance of the last mentioned paper before the publick prior to the transmission of the Circular, containing the propositions to the lodges, is a remarkable circumstance. It is not for a moment to be presumed that "peace" is to result from the mere publication of the proposed means of effecting it: it is, according to the views of the brethren, to result mainly (if it results at all) from and through the abandonment of masonick charters.

Now, it does appear to us, the brethren would have proceeded with a better prospect of effecting their object, if they had silently sent to the lodges the Circular, and when the lodges should be convened for the purpose of deliberating on the expediency of adopting the proposals, then to have attended personally on the meetings, so far as they could do so, and to have shown by arguments and facts the propriety of following the advice given them. We regret that this course was not taken.

There is one circumstance connected with this proffered peace offering, with which the publick are unacquainted, and which is only known to a few of the Circular brethren: it is this—the very proposals contained in the Circulars were, at a convention of masons held at Canandaigua on the first of February last, duly considered and negatived. This convention was called, and the proposals submitted and advocated, by a few of the brethren whose names are appended to the Circular. Seeing then that the temper of the brethren as expressed in convention was not at that time favourable to the proposals, and believing that "peace" would result from the abandonment of the charters—and feeling anxious, as they ought, that every member of the masonick family, however exalted or however humble, should share in the pacification, it is strange this course was not taken. Had it been, we are not sure but that, in the end, the proposals would have been acquiesced in, and a general peace might have been the result.

We regret extremely that our Circular brethren took the course they did. We regret it mainly on their own personal account; they have subjected themselves to the suspicion that it is not a general peace they are seeking—not a peace which shall carry the olive branch to all, but shall only extend it to a few. We would if possible save them from this cruel suspicion. If our humble testimony shall be received, we will say that, to our knowledge, there is attached to the Address in question as pure names as can be found in any community.

The outrage committed on the person of William Morgan in depriving him of his liberty, and in all probability of his life, has called forth the honest sentiments of indignation and abhorrence from the people. These sentiments are just, and are felt "by us in common with our countrymen." They are such as will always be felt and evinced by a people prize the blessings of liberty, whenever high-handed crime tramples on the sovereignty of the laws. Junius said to the British publick, "the people are sometimes wrong in their opinions, but in their sentiments they are never mistaken." The observation is a sound one, and will apply in all communities where the blessings of freedom are enjoyed. At this time and in this community, it is peculiarly illustrated. While we accede to the justness of the sentiments, we beg leave to enter our most solemn protest against the correctness of the opinion entertained, that, as this daring outrage was committed by masons, it grew out of, and proceeded from the principles of masonry. Masonry requires from its members perfect obedience to the laws of the land. This we affirm to be a fundamental requirement, admitting of no exception—not even in governments of arbitrary and despotick rule.

This is not the time for, nor is it our intention to enter into a defence of the masonick institution. We will barely observe that it was devised for wise and salutary purposes—namely, of extending to all parts of the world the blessings of good feelings and charity. It is simply a widely extended charitable institution; having for its object the amelioration of the human family; "uniting men of all countries, of all religious sects, and of all political opinions, in the bonds of social intercourse." Such do we solemnly affirm to be the scope and end of the institution: and never have we seen, in any instance, (and some of us have been members of the order for the last thirty years,) the institution prostituted to political or religious sectarian purposes. It is matter of pride that no mason who has renounced the institution has in his zeal to find favour with the enemies of masonry, preferred any specific charges of such prostitution.

We claim to ourselves no merit by reason of being masons; but at the same time we protest against the charge or the conclusion that, because we are masons we must of necessity be bad men. Our institution comprises a numerous body of men, possessed of the same feelings, prejudices and passions as enter into the composition of other men. We are neither wiser nor better than others; we partake of the infirmities of humanity; and while we had occasion heretofore to rejoice at the liberal feelings and principles inculcated by the order, and evinced in the general conduct of its members, we could not believe that any of them would ever swerve from the path of duty through the influence of the fell spirit of fanaticism. But yet, so is the fact: this demon, which in all ages, in all countries, and in the most sacred of causes has shown its Hydra head, has stretched forth its bloody arm and sent to the grave, "unannounced and unannealed," the trembling victims of its vengeance—so is the fact, that in this enlightened age, this nineteenth century, it has shown itself among some few members of the masonick order; maddened them with its impulses, and propelled them to the commission of the foul crime of robbing a fellow man of his liberty, and probably of his life. We join with you, fellow citizens, in your feelings of deep abhorrence of the transaction, and we mourn the corruption of human nature as evinced in the commission of the deed.

It is a fundamental rule of justice, sanctioned by all civilized nations, that every man shall be held responsible for his own acts, and for those only. This rule is deeply engraven on the human heart: it is an impress of the great Eternal, who is the fountain of justice. Now, we ask you not as mendicants seeking popular favour and distinction, but as men living under a happy government, in which equal rights and equal laws are secured to all and govern all, whether this rule shall be reversed as to us?

Are the blessings of good government to be withheld, while its requirements and exactions shall be demanded from us? Protection and allegiance are reciprocal duties. Will you demand the one and refuse the other? If we are to be disfranchised, does not justice require that you free us from the burthens of government?—should we not be exempt from taxation, and ought not our names to be stricken from the muster rolls of our militia?

We beg of you, fellow-citizens, to pause. Let reason resume its empire. Do not, we beseech you, violate the eternal principles of justice in persisting in a course of persecution towards us, unworthy of the age in which we live. Do not subvert the wise provisions of our constitutions and our laws; for in dealing out to us a measure which they do not give, you attempt their subversion. Our free and equal laws cost much. They are the "perfection of human wisdom;" a perfection arrived at through slow and tedious processes. They comprise the wisdom of all nations, of all ages—accumulated through pain and suffering. It would be wise, in our judgement, to transmit them unshaken, unimpaired to the remotest posterity.

The object of this address is to conciliate you. We are anxious for peace. And this anxiety is increased when we find that it is not enough that this part of the state shall be torn and distracted with the "Morgan excitement;" but that the whole state and Union must be shaken with it. It is with grief that we see talented men lending those talents which were given them to be employed in promoting peace, union and safety, for the purpose of extending the evils felt here, into all parts of our common country. We wish for "peace," but wish for it on terms which will not compromise our integrity; and on such terms only will we accept of it. Suppose the avenue to "peace" to be the abandonment of freemasonry through the medium of the publick journals, declaring it to be base; and suppose we should seek "peace" through this avenue, as some have sought it; would you extend the olive branch to us—take us into your confidence—because, to our other commendatory qualities we added that of hypocrisy? We know you to well—we are too well read in the human heart not to know, that, by using hypocrisy and making ourselves traitors, we should present such claims to your regard and consideration as would fail us at some future day. Treason may be approved, but the traitor is always despised.

As in the physical so in the moral world—a calm will succeed a storm. Your passions, your resentments will subside. When that period arrives, we are anxious to be found worthy of your respects and of our own. We are not bigoted in favour of masonry: if it must sink, it will not be through the efforts of persecution; but through the efforts of calm and sober reason. If reason cannot demolish the fabrick, the battery of persecution will be used upon it in vain. Our object in addressing you is not to sustain the edifice of freemasonry, but if possible to bring about "peace"—to put an end to the distracted state of feeling which pervades every dwelling in this part of the state.

Our laws presume every man to be innocent until the contrary appears. This wise and beneficent rule is reversed in our case. Be it so. To exculpate ourselves from the charges preferred against us as a body and individually, as the rule is reversed, so necessarily the ordinary mode of proof must be changed. From the nature of the case, our own testimony must and ought to be received in exculpation. We must therefore be permitted to avail ourselves of this mode of justification. If it shall be found unavailing, the consciousness that we have done all that honest and honourable men can or ought to do, will sustain and cheer us in the midst of trial and persecution. Therefore,

We, the Members of the Geneva Lodges and Members of the Masonick Institution, residing in Geneva and its vicinity, appealing to ALMIGHTY God for the truth of our declarations, DECLARE, that we have had no agency, directly or indirectly, in the abduction of William Morgan: that prior to his abduction we had no information that the outrage against his person was contemplated, and at this time his fate, whatever it may be, is to us unknown.

We most solemnly affirm, that the principles of freemasonry require no services or duties from its members incompatible with the laws of the land: but that they inculcate and enjoin obedience to the civil laws as a fundamental duty.

CELEBRATIONS.

Amicable Lodge, No. 22, will celebrate the anniversary of St. John the Baptist, on the 24th inst. Members of the neighbouring lodges and chapters are respectfully solicited to attend. The band of musick attached to the 8th regiment of Artillery, are engaged for the day. The procession will be formed at 10 o'clock precisely.

NATH'L CAULKING, DANIEL TOWER,
ADISON R. GILLMORE, Committee.
New-Hartford, Oneida co., June 12, 1829.

The Nativity of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by Constellation Lodge, at Dedham, Massachusetts, on Wednesday, the 24th of June current. Neighbouring lodges, chapters, encampments, and the brethren generally are respectfully invited to attend, with appropriate clothing, and officers with their insignia. Addresses may be expected from M. E. Rev. Paul Dean, and Comp. Samuel H. Jenks, of Boston. The procession will form at 10 o'clock A. M. Suitable accommodations and refreshments will be provided by Br. Francis Alden, particularly for the ladies. Per order of the Committee of Arrangements.

Dedham, June 4. ELISHA THAYER, Sec'y.

The members of Kingston Lodge, the members of Esopus Lodge, and the members of New-Paltz Lodge, of Free and Accepted Masons, are hereby respectfully invited to attend the celebration of St. John's day, at the lodge room, at Mr. John Tack's, in Marletown, on the 24th inst. The brethren are requested to be punctual in their attendance at 10 A. M. The procession will be formed at that hour at Mr. Tack's, and proceed from thence to the Dutch Church, where an appropriate sermon will be delivered by a Rev. brother. Travelling members and sojourners belonging to the fraternity, and in good standing, are invited to attend. By order of the Committee.

JOHN HILL, JAMES M'GINNIS,
DAVID HUNT.
Marletown, June, 9, 1829.

The approaching Anniversary of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, will be publicly celebrated at Somersworth, (Great-Falls,) New Hampshire, by St. John's Lodge, Portsmouth; Humane Lodge, Rochester; Stafford Lodge, Dover; Pythagoras Lodge, Portsmouth; Lybanus Lodge, Somersworth; Rising Star Lodge, New-Market: St. John's Lodge, Berwick; and several other Masonick bodies of a higher order. An Address will be delivered on the occasion, by Hon. Br. JOHN HOLMES. Dinner Tickets one dollar each. Brethren of the fraternity generally, are respectfully invited to attend. The procession will be formed at nine o'clock, A. M.

JOSHUA EDWARDS,
for the committee.

Putnam, Uriel, and Eastern Star Lodges, will celebrate the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist on the 24th inst. at Ashford, Connecticut. The brethren are requested to convene at Br. Dyer Clark's, at 9 o'clock, A. M. The usual exercises may be expected at the meeting house in the 1st Society, commencing at 11 o'clock, A. M. The brethren of adjacent lodges are invited to attend.

DARIUS MATTHEWSON, GEORGE W. WEBB,
COLVIN WHITNEY, ARTEMAS FLETCHER,
DAVID AVERY, ICHABOD BULKLEY.
June 10, 1829. Committee.

There will be a procession and Installation of the officers of Mt. Pleasant Lodge, at Mount Pleasant Ohio, on the 24th June, 1829. Brethren of the neighbouring lodges and their vicinities are respectfully invited to attend.

The Festival of St. John the Baptist, will be celebrated in this village, by the several lodges in the 3d masonick district, on Wednesday the 24th inst. The lodge will convene at Masons' Hall at 9 o'clock A. M. and proceed to the meeting house, where religious exercises will commence at half past 10 o'clock. A discourse will be delivered on the occasion by the Rev. Mr. Brown of Troy, N. Y. Members of neighbouring lodges are respectfully invited to join in the celebration and meet at the hall. All others who may feel disposed, are also invited to attend at the meeting house.

M. S. WALLER, Sec'y.
Middlebury, Vt., June 15th, 1829.

A resolution was adopted at a late meeting of the members of "Genesee Royal Arch Chapter," and "Rising Star Lodge," in Genesee county, to return the charters of that chapter and lodge to the source from whence they came. Accompanying this resolution is an address of the members to the publick, setting forth their reasons for the measure. These are, a disposition to restore peace to the community of which they are members, and to evince their continued desire, as good citizens, to acknowledge the will of the majority upon all subjects, when such will can reasonably be required to operate. The address is candid and manly, and as such we doubt not it will be fully satisfactory to honest anti-masons, and highly offensive to all other members of that party.

ASTRONOMY.

From the London Literary Gazette.

THE ASTEROIDS.

Ceres is 163 miles in diameter, and appears of a ruddy colour (which is also the prevailing hue of the others), and shines with the brilliancy of a star of the eighth magnitude: it is surrounded with an atmosphere 675 miles in height, which gives it very much the semblance of a small comet or nebulous star. Pallas, another of the asteroids (eighty miles in diameter), has a similar nebulosity surrounding it, 468 miles in height. Juno and Vesta are destitute of this nebulous atmosphere, though the latter—which is the smallest of the four (diameter forty-nine miles), and subtending an angle not greater than one of the Saturnian satellites, or half a second—shines with a light so pure and distinct as to be visible to the naked eye, as a star of the fifth magnitude.*

The form and position of the orbits of the asteroids, and the physical changes observed in them, suggests the idea of their being a sort of connecting link, uniting the planetary and cometary bodies. The orbits of the old planets vary but slightly from circles; those of the new planets are considerably eccentric, though not so much as those of comets. The apheion of Juno is double the distance of its perihelion; and the distance of the centre from the foci of its ellipse 68,588,433 miles. It passes over that half of its orbit nearest the sun in half the time occupied in traversing the other half; the major axis of its orbit little exceeding in length that of the comet of Encke—the former being 450,800,000 miles in length, and the latter 420,000,000 miles.

The orbits of the asteroids make greater angles with the ecliptic than the planets, and in this respect resemble comets, some of which have their paths considerably inclined, and ascend or descend at right angles to the earth's path. The least inclination of a planet's orbit to the ecliptic is that of Uranus, which is 46 min. 20 sec.; and the greatest that of Mercury, which is 7 deg. The inclination of the orbit of Vesta is 7 deg. 8 min. 9 sec.; and that of Pallas 34 deg. 50 min. 40 sec. The inclination of the orbits of the comets of Encke and Gambart are, respectively, 13 deg. 20 min. and 13 deg. 33 min.; and of one that appeared in 1818, the position of its path relative to the ecliptic was 89 deg. 47 min.

More considerable and sudden changes are also observed in these small bodies than in the planets. Venus, it is supposed, has had an atmosphere generated about its orb since the commencement of the past century, which conceals those irregularities on the surface formerly so distinctly seen. Mars has a periodical change about its poles, supposed to arise from the melting of the snows when the planet is in certain parts of its orbit. Jupiter also has sudden changes in its belts, which are supposed to arise from its swift rotation. These changes in the planets are different to those observed in the visible hemispheres of Ceres and Pallas, which are sometimes pale, overclouded, or as if surrounded with dense mist, and, at other seasons, suddenly shine forth and display well-defined discs. Variations of a similar nature are also observed in the brilliancy of the other two.

To account for these phenomena, so anomalous in the planetary system, some have supposed the asteroids to be fragments of an exploded planet, formerly moving between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Some curious coincidences occur to render such a theory plausible; for, on the supposition of such an explosion, the fragments ought to have two common points of reunion, through which they would all pass; and it is remarkable that the positions of the nodes of the asteroids favour the idea of their having diverged from the same place. The smallest parts also would be thrown to the greatest distance from the original orbit, while the larger would, on account of their greater quantity of matter, deviate less from the path of the primitive

* Very considerable differences occur in the results obtained by Schroeter and Herschel in measuring the diameters of the asteroids. It is highly probable that the former included portions of their atmospheres in his measurements, while the latter (who is generally considered to be the most accurate) measured only the nucleus or disc.

planet. This is supposed to account for the orbit of Pallas and Juno (the smallest of the four) being more eccentric than Ceres and Vesta.

The immense atmospheres of Ceres and Pallas have furnished materials for another theory relative to "the lost comet of 1770," which ought, by computation, to have returned ten times since that year, but which has not been since seen. It has been supposed that this comet, passing near these two asteroids, communicated to them those immense nebulous atmospheres by which they are surrounded: but, unfortunately for this theory, the comet is not lost, but is revolving in a new orbit, into which it has been directed by the powerful attraction of Jupiter. It is rather surprising that some bold theorist has not identified in these asteroids the comet of 1770 itself, having the following data: That the explosion of a comet is a more probable event than that of a planet; that the asteroids were discovered not long after the comet was missing; that the form and inclination of their paths, together with considerable physical changes in their orbs, assimilate them to the nature of comets; and that, supposing the comet disrupted at right angles to its tale, there would be an unequal distribution of its atmosphere among the fragments, which would account for two having these atmospheres, and the others being destitute.

But there is no necessity for adopting such violent hypotheses. These small bodies are neither the wreck of a ruined world, nor are they wrapped in the newly acquired train of a comet wandering from its course. In the whole of creation, wherever the power of the Divine Being is evinced, there is also displayed harmony, and an arrangement for the general preservation; a beautiful connexion may be traced, uniting bodies apparently opposite in their natures, gliding through the various links, which ascends from the minute to the stupendous—from the grain of sand that fetters the proud ocean, to the rolling world, and all the vast orbs that move through immensity.

It is singular that the existence of these bodies, or at least of a planet moving near the courses which they pursue, was indicated by a very curious law, discovered by Prof. Bode,—that the excesses of the distances of the planets above Mercury form a geometrical series, of which the common ratio is 2: the mean distances at which the asteroids revolve are nearly equal, and complete the relation, which was before wanting. By assuming 10 as the mean distance of the earth from the sun, the following will be the result of this remarkable analogy:—

	Distance in round numbers.
Mercury	4 = 4
Venus	4 + (3 × 1) = 7
Earth	4 + (3 × 2) = 10
Mars	4 + (3 × 2 ²) = 16
Asteroids	4 + (3 × 2 ³) = 28
Jupiter	4 + (3 × 2 ⁴) = 52
Saturn	4 + (3 × 2 ⁵) = 100
Uranus	4 + (3 × 2 ⁶) = 196
A planet next beyond } Uranus, if any exist }	4 + (3 × 2 ⁷) = 368

which latter is a little greater than the proportional distance of the apheion of the comet of Halley. It is not easy to see the reason of this law, which is also lately found to prevail among the satellites of the system, relative to their mean distances from the centres of their respective primaries. Though hitherto unexplained, it is worthy of observation, that a similar law, relative to the periodical times and distances of the planets, remained veiled in obscurity until the connexion was discovered to be a necessary consequence of the laws of gravity. The explanation of this singular law may be reserved to some future period, when it will doubtless be found to be an important part of that grand scheme, every particular of which indicates design and perfect harmony.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the London Mechanics' Magazine.

PROTECTION FROM LIGHTNING.

Sir: Will you permit an individual who has, four times in the course of his life, nearly become a victim to lightning, or a thunder-bolt striking a house, and making its way into the interior, to inquire, what would be the best precaution to take, or the best means to adopt in an apartment, effectually to guard against the danger of being struck by lightning during a thunder-storm? I am, &c.

FULMEN.

We extract the following directions on this head from our common-place-book:—Places of the greatest Safety in a Thunder-storm.—In case a thunder-storm were to happen while a person is in the house, not furnished with a proper conductor, it is advisable not to stand near places where there is any metal, as chimneys, gilt frames, iron case-ments, or the like; but to go into the middle of a room, and endeavour to stand or sit upon the best non-conductor that can be found at hand, as an old chair, stool, &c. It is still safer to bring two or three mattresses or beds into the middle of the room, and, folding them up double, put the chair upon them; for they not being such good conductors as the walls, the lightning will not choose an interrupted course through the air of the room and the bedding, when it can go through a continued and better conductor—the wall. The place of most absolute safety is the cellar, and particularly the middle of it; for when a person is lower than the surface of the earth, the lightning must strike the surface of the earth before it can possibly reach him. But when it can be had, a hammock, or swinging bed, suspended by silk cords equally distant from the walls on every side, and from the ceiling above and below, affords the safest situation a person can have in any room whatever, and what, indeed, may be considered quite free from danger of any stroke of lightning. If a storm happens whilst a person is in the open fields, and far from any building, the best thing he can do is to retire within a small distance of the highest tree or trees he can get at; he must by no means go quite near them, but should stop at about 15 or 20 feet from their outward branches; for if the lightning should fall thereabout, it will very probably strike the trees; and should a tree be split, he is safe enough at that distance from it; besides, from repeated observations, it has been ascertained, that the lightning by no means descends in one undivided track, but bodies of various kinds conduct their share of it at the same time, in proportion to their quantity of conducting power.

TANNING.

A tanner, named Rapedius, of Bern Castle, on the Moselle, has discovered a new species of tan proper for dressing leather. It is the plant known by the name of Bilberry or Whortleberry, (Vaccinium Myrtillus, or Myrtillis) which should be gathered in spring, because at this season it dries more readily, and is more easily ground. Three pounds and a half of this tan suffice for dressing a pound of leather, while six pounds are required from the oak to produce the same effect. By this new process, tanners can gain four months out of the time required for preparing strong leather. A commission having been appointed at Treves to examine the leather so prepared, reported, that they had never seen any as good, and that every pair of shoes made therefrom lasts two months more than what are manufactured from common leather; that the skin of the neck, which it is difficult to work, becomes strong and elastic like that of the other parts. The shrub should not be pulled up, but cut with a bill, to obtain the reproduction of the plant the following year. When cut, damp does not deteriorate it, which is not the case with oak bark, which loses ten per cent. of its value by being wetted.

[From the French.]

INFUSION OF WALNUT LEAVES TO DESTROY INSECTS.

It appears by a late communication to the London Horticultural Society, by Sir Charles M. L. Monck, Bart. that worms which infest plants in pots were destroyed by a pint of an infusion of walnut leaves given to each pot. The worms quickly emerged from the mould to the surface, and were removed. This treatment was repeated in the following week, when a few more worms were extracted; the plants which had been sickly, after this application resumed their health and blossomed strongly. This success induced Sir Charles to try the experiment on orange trees, and other plants in pots, and it was attended with equal success. He thinks that the infusion is beneficial, not only in destroying the worms, but that it acts also as a manure. The infusion is made by pouring boiling water on fresh walnut leaves, which having stood till cold, is ready for use.

THE GATHERER.

From the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

DIRECTIONS TO HOT PEOPLE.

Now-a-days, nobody is cool—every face is as red as a beet, and every man's blood is hot enough to boil an egg. What is to be done? imprimis—keep your temper—it will never do to get into a passion at this season—reserve your wrath till the first frost, and you may then blaze away as much as you please. Secondly—rise early, even before the sun, and enjoy his astonishment at seeing himself beat. Wash your whole body, put on clean linen, and take a slow walk of twenty minutes and fifteen seconds. Don't jump out of the way at any sudden alarm—it is much better to be quietly run over by a cart or two, than to jump into a fever. Sit down to breakfast moderately; don't bolt into your chair as if you were thrown out of a third story window. Drink no coffee; it is too heating—tea or milk you may take in any quantity; but eat no meat as you eschew caloric—every mouthful is an incipient fire brand. A little bread (and, if you are in love, a cold potato) degeune. Eat slowly, and beguile the time, by reading the Courier and Enquirer. It will always put you in good humour, and your smiles are very becoming. Put on a white hat, and away to your place of business. If any thing has gone wrong, don't scold—scolding is allowed only in winter. If you meet any friends on the way, give a gentle look of recognition, but do not bow or say "good morning"—talking is very exciting. If you can conveniently meet with a little misfortune, do so—melancholy is very cooling, and what is more, it makes others cool towards you. You thus gain considerable comfort from their icy reflection.

"As the day grows warm and high," you become thirsty. You are afraid to drink cold water—you therefore mix a little brandy (or a good deal) with it to prevent any bad consequences—you put in a lump of ice, and quaff it off without ceremony. You goose! cold brandy and water, taken suddenly into your stomach, is just as dangerous as cold water—so is cold punch—cold any thing else—so would a parcel of cold live coals, if you could freeze them. Your best beverage is claret and water—you may cool it if you please, but you must sip it very gradually. We mean, real bona-fide claret—none of your poke-berry juice, which is absolute poison.

Do not eat much dinner—animal food puts the lion in a fever, and so it will serve man. If you find that you have much appetite, eat a lump of sugar, or take a walk into the kitchen, just before the table is set. The best thing for you is a little hash and mashed potatoes—it saves a great deal of labour for the jaws. You may smoke two cigars afterwards—the smoke warms your mouth, and causes a rush of air into it which overbalances the artificial heat. In the evening you may read a novel or listen to music—it must be slow music, however—the "Dead March, in Saul," or something like it. "Yankee Doodle" would put you in a fever in five minutes. Go to bed early—leave your windows open—the free, pure air never harms any body that is used to it, and if you are not, it is high time that you were. Take as many airs upon you as you can—the hen sets all the summer night upon the fence, and takes no cold. Are you not ashamed to be more delicate than a hen?

SINGULAR FRIENDSHIP.

We were lately visiting in a house where a very pleasing and singular portrait attracted our observation; it was that of a young lady represented with a partridge perched upon her shoulder, and a dog with his feet on her arm. We recognized it as a representation of the lady of the house, but were at a loss to account for the odd association of her companions. She observed our surprise, and at once gave the history of the bird and the spaniel. They were both some years back, domesticated in her family. The dog was an old parlour favourite, who went by the name of Tom. The partridge was more recently introduced from France, and answered to the equally familiar name of Bill. It was rather a dangerous experiment to place them together, for Tom was a lively and spirited creature, very apt to torment the cats, and to bark at any object which roused his instinct. But the experiment was tried; and Bill, being very tame, did not feel much alarm at this natural enemy. They were of course, shy at first, but this shyness gradually wore off: the bird became less timid, and the dog less bold. The most perfect friendship was at length established between them. When the hour of dinner arrived, the partridge invariably flew on his mistress's shoulder, calling with that shrill note which is so well known to sportsmen; and the spaniel leapt about with equal ardour. One dish of bread and milk was placed on the floor, out of which the spaniel and the bird fed together and after their social meal, the dog would retire to a corner to sleep, while the partridge would nestle between his legs, and never stir till his favourite awoke. Whenever the dog accompanied his mistress out, the bird displayed the utmost disquietude till his return; and once, when the partridge was shut up by accident during a whole day, the dog searched about the house with a mournful cry, which indicated the strength of his affection. The friendship of Tom and Bill was at length fatally terminated. The beautiful little dog was stolen; and the bird from that time refused all food, and died on the seventh day, a victim to his grief.

POLYGAMY.

It is well known that the Turks avoid answering questions put to them concerning their religion, to prevent being exposed to criticism or raillery. A lady of quality reproached a Turkish ambassador, on the Mahometan religion allowing them to have several wives. The ambassador, without entering into any discussion, replied, "It permits it, that we may be able to find in several, all the graces which are concentrated in you alone."

INDIAN PLASTER.

All the fine plaster with which the walls of the houses are covered in India, and which is so much admired by strangers, is composed of a mixture of fine lime and soapstone, rubbed down with water: when the plaster is nearly dry, it is rubbed over with a dry piece of soapstone, which gives it a polish very much resembling that of well-polished marble.

The initial letters of the Latin names of the kings of Bonaparte's family form the Latin word Nihil, (nothing;) and this used to be called the genealogical acrostick:

—udovicus.
—osephus.
—ieronimus.
—oachim.
—apoleo.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE WIFE OF SEVEN HUSBANDS.

A LEGEND OF ANCIENT LONDON.

(Concluded.)

After a short pause, he resumed, "Didst thou, then, not love thy other husbands, Alice?"

"Love them! No, Martyn—no; I hated them with a deadly hate." And at these words her face grew lividly pale, her eyes fixed on her husband's with a strange and snake-like glistening, that his marrow thrilled again, and his heart beat thick. He spoke to her, however, in a meek voice, and said—

"Why didst thou hate them so, Alice?"

"Because that they were drunkards and faithless, Martyn; and, therefore, I hated them so; and therefore, were it possible thou shouldst be such, I should even so hate thee, much, very much as I now love thee." She uttered these words in a tone of deep tenderness, and fell weeping on his neck.

He strove, both by caresses and assurances, to soothe her; but it was some time before he could do so. The conversation was not resumed, and they retired to bed. But Martyn's mind continued very restless, and he lay awake after his wife had gone to sleep: he could not dismiss her words from his brain, nor efface the impression made thereon; and, after turning the matter over a great many times, he came to the resolution that he would see a little more into the matter. At last he fell asleep, but it was only to wake soon from a wild dream. He thought he and his wife were still sitting on the low settle, as they had been that evening; and that their faces were lit up, as they then had been, by the fitful glimmering of the dying embers—that hers wore the same livid hue, and her eyes glistened in the same snake-like manner, that had then so frightened him; and that they were fixed as then, upon his, and, though her look was most shocking, that he was fascinated by it, and could not move away his glance from hers; and her face kept growing paler and paler; and her eyes grew brighter and brighter, and more and more terrible; and he grew sick and sicker at heart, and felt a reeling in his brain, and a choking in his throat; and still he could not turn his eyes from her. And, behold! her long black curls, that hung about her neck and shoulders, seemed of a sudden, and yet slowly, to become instinct with life; and, one by one, they uncurred themselves—some moving their ends to and fro, and up and down, as he had seen leeches do in a vase when they had sought to fix their heads somewhere—others, again, twined themselves round the carved rail work of the settle—while others, arching and stretching themselves out, twisted round his neck so tightly that they nearly throttled him. He woke up in alarm and agony, and found his wife's long hair indeed, around his neck—and her arms, too; and her head was lying on his chest, and she was sobbing violently. He asked her what ailed her; and she said she had had a dreadful dream, all of which that she could recollect was that she had seen him murdered.

Martyn slept no more that night; and, the next morning, he rose betimes, and, pretending business, he went out at an early hour. Business, however, he had none. He walked forth at the Cripplegate, and strolled through the Finsburie fields, and so away into the country, without any fixed determination or even knowledge of whither he was going. It was a drizzly day, too; but he seemed unconscious of it, though he was soon drenched to the skin. But he kept walking about, thinking over the scene of the last evening, and all the stories he remembered to have heard of his wife from the day he first saw her, and all the other stories he could remember ever to have heard respecting witches and their cunning, till he began to hold his wife one in real earnest; or, if she was not a witch, she certainly was something else of an unusual nature, but what he could not just then bring himself to decide. Still he felt that he was not, somehow or other, safe with her, in spite of all her fondness for him; and reflecting upon her expressions of deep hate for her former husbands, and the cause whereto she had ascribed that hate, he conceived a design to try her love, which he determined upon carrying into immediate execution. It was long after sunset when he returned home, and he went straight to bed, pleading cold and weariness. The next day, he sat all the forenoon with his wife; but, in spite of her kindness and attentions, he could not overcome the disagreeable feeling that was upon him. He remained reserved, and almost sullen; and, at last, Mrs. Alice seemed infected with the same manner. At noon he left his house, and went straight-ways to Master Andrew, who lived not far off, with the purpose of inducing from him a recital of some of those marvellous tales wherewith he had, on a former occasion, regaled him. His purpose was, however, so far forestalled; for when he came there, he found he had some friends with him, and, of course, he was not anxious to make his wife's conduct matter of public talk. He sat, therefore, the whole evening nearly in silence; for which, however, they made full amends by their boisterous and drunken musick. He sat as late as any, and left them with full determination of putting his plan into effect that very night. On his way home, he trod casually upon a piece of apple rind lying in the path, and, slipping, fell into the mire, for it had been raining all that day too. At first he was not a little put out; but, after a little reflection, remembering that this very mischance might be made serviceable to his scheme, with disordered dress, bending knees, drooping mouth, and half-closed eyes (assuming, as much as he could, the bearing of a drunken man), he presented himself at his door. His wife, although it was now late in the night, had sent the servants to bed, and herself sat up for him—a mark of attention that some very loving wives do at times pay to their husbands, often more to their annoyance than comfort. In the present instance, however, nothing could have happened more to Lessomour's wish. The moment his wife saw him, her face flushed even to darkness, and her large black eyes widened to a greater size, as she said in a tone half of anger and half of dread, "Why, Martyn, what is this? what has befallen thee?"

"I've been with some friends, my love," he replied, speaking thickly.

"Martyn! Martyn!" she answered, and bit her lip, and shook her head, "a get thee to thy bed; I will follow quickly."

He went accordingly; but it was sometime before she did follow him, and she lay down by his side without speaking a word to him. He pretended to be asleep, though he did not really sleep all that night; nor more, he thought, did she—for she tossed about, and seemed very restless, now and then muttering to herself; and as soon as morning broke, she rose, and dressed herself, and left the room. The whole of that day he staid at home, feigning to have a bad head ache. She was very attentive to him, but in no way hinted at his conduct of the foregoing evening. In two or three days he repeated the experiment, and with nearly the same success, saving that Mrs. Alice seemed a little more gloomy the following day. He tried a third time and a fourth, and that night she did not come to his bed at all. The next morning she spoke to him, for the first time upon the subject; she expressed more sorrow than anger—talked kindly to him—said she had hoped once, twice, and even thrice, that his coming home full of liquor might have been a mishap; but she now felt forced to fear that drunkenness was becoming an usage with him; and she begged him, with tears in her eyes, as he prized her happiness, to stop in good time, ere it did in truth become an usage. He was moved by her earnestness, and promised her, and, at the time, himself determined to disquiet her no farther on this head; but an impulse which somehow he could not resist, urged him in a few days to break his word. Twice more his conduct called forth pressing entreaties from his wife—the last time, indeed, they were mingled with some reproaches; but it all was of no effect upon Lessomour, he continued in the career he had begun. The day after he had returned home, for the seventh time, in a pretended state of drunkenness, his wife said to him, "Martyn, I have prayed thee till I am weary: I now warn thee—take heed.

As my husband, I owe thee love and duty; but I can pay neither to a drunkard. Heed my warning, or woe upon us both!"

And did Martyn still go on with the pursuit of his experiment?—He did. Although he saw it was losing him his wife's love, and winning him her anger—her hate—he went on, with an unswerving resolution, which, in such a cause, seemed obstinacy or madness, or worse. In the present enlightened age, I should not like to say he was bewitched, or to attribute to any supernatural influence the strong impulse which led him on to do as he was doing, in spite of his better sense and better feeling—in spite of the love he had unquestionably borne his wife—in spite of the danger which he felt he was thrusting himself into and feared; and yet I equally dislike to suppose that he was tempted to this severe trial of his wife's love and duty either by too great faith in them, or a want of it; though something, perhaps, of a similar nature was the trial to which Henry put his Emma, and Posthumous his Imogene: in neither case, indeed, so severe a one, nor, for his personal safety, may be, so dangerous; but, whatever might have been his motive, it certainly to himself was as inexplicable as he owned it to be irresistible. Again, therefore, he transgressed, and was again threatened; again he reiterated his offence; and then his wife said to him the next day, "Goest thou forth to-day, Martyn?"

"I must, indeed, Alice," he answered; "I have weighty business to do to-day."

"Then mark me, Martyn. I am not going to pray thee; but I have warned thee once, I have warned thee twice, and I now warn thee for the third and for the last time. Go at thy risk, and see thou heed this warning better than thou have done mine others. Go not forth to-day Martyn; or, going, come not back to me as thou hast been wont of late to come. Better that thou stay from me altogether; but better yet that thou stay with me altogether, Martyn."

"Nay, nay, I needs must go, Alice."

"There needs no plea, Martyn, but thine own will—thine own stubborn will—that will not bend to thy wife's prayer. Ay! I said I would not pray thee, but I do now. Look! see, Martyn! I am on my knees here to thee—and there are tears in mine eyes!—and, kneeling and weeping thus, I pray thee go not forth to-day. I have had dreams of late—dreams of bad foretoken, Martyn; and only last night I did truly dream that—" [Here she gulped, as if for breath.] "Thou wilt lose thy life, an thou go forth to-day, Martyn."

THE CATASTROPHE.

But Martyn Lessomour, like Julius Cæsar, was not to be frightened from a fixed purpose by a wife's dreams; and he answered her,—

"Wife, wife, thou art a fearful woman, and make me fear thee; but, natheless, I shall go."

"Go then," she said, and rose and left him; and he shortly after went from the house—he returned in the evening in the same assumed state as before, and went to bed. For the last two days that he had played this part, since his wife had begun to use threats, he had gone when he left his own house, either to a friend's or tavern, where he slept away all the time he was absent, in order that he might lay awake during the night, to watch what his wife would do; but during this day he had not, for the disquietude of his mind, been able to sleep at all; but now that he was in bed, such a drowsiness came over him, that in spite of all his endeavours he soon fell into a sound sleep. From this he was aroused by his wife getting out of bed; yet, although he at once started into thorough wakefulness, he had the presence of mind to be still asleep, and lay still and watched her. She had thrown a night gown around her—but her hair was loose, and hung struggling about her neck, and as she passed the foot of the bed, the light from a lamp that was burning on a table, fell through her locks upon her face, and Martyn saw that it was of that livid paleness, and that her eyes were brightened by that hateful snakelike look, which he had only once before beheld in reality, though in memory, thousands and thousands of times: he saw too that she held a small knife in one hand. Slowly and stilly, like a ghost, she glided on—but away from him; and going up to the place where she had hung her gown up when she undressed, she took it down and ripped open one of the sleeves of it, and took something out: she then went to the hearth, where there was a fire burning, for it was winter, and having laid the knife and whatever else she had in her hand, beside the lamp upon the table, she seemed searching for something about the hearth. At last Martyn heard her mutter, "Not here—how foolish—heedless of me—I must go and fetch it from below." She moved towards the door—Martyn's heart beat high within him, as he thought the moment she should be gone, he would leap from the bed and rush past her down stairs, and out of the house—for he strangely felt to be alone would be more dreadful than to be in her most dreaded presence. She stopped, however, at the door—laid hold of the latch, but did not rise it—and continued in a low mutter, "Not here; mayhap that it was for some good end that I forgot it—mayhap that I should give him one more trial yet—shall I? I shall—one more trial I will give thee, dear Martyn, dear still, though lost, I dread—one more—one more;" and saying this, she hurried back to her bed, and leaning upon her Martyn's shoulder, sighed and sobbed, not loudly indeed, but as if her heart were cracking—and he—he lay deadly still by her side, for he really feared to speak to her, even though it were to speak comfort; or when he thought of doing so, the remembrance of her word, "one trial more" stifled him—she seemed soon after to doze. In the morning he took care to rise before her, and woke her in so doing—he went up, as if by accident, to the table, and saw that beside the knife there lay a smallish round lump of lead.

"What is this for, Alice?" he said, in a careless tone—for he knew she was watching him.

"What is it?" she replied. He took it to her bedside. "That," she continued, "is a weight from the sleeve of my gown; I cut it out last night, to put in a smaller, for I find it too heavy."

Martyn laid it down and presently left the room. It was sometime before his wife joined him below stairs, and when she did at last come, her eyes looked so swollen and red, that Martyn was pretty sure she had been weeping; he said nothing about it, however, but in a few minutes rose, and took down his cap, and said, "I am bidden forth to dinner again to-day Alice." "Good bye then, Martyn, good bye," was all her answer, and that was said in a low, very solemn, and yet kind tone of voice. He lingered in the room for a moment or two, in the hope she would say something more to him, for he felt less inclined to pursue his fraud that day than he had ever felt before; perhaps it was from a return of love he felt this, perhaps from fear—she said, however, nothing more, indeed did not seem to notice his presence: so after saying "Well, good bye, Alice," he withdrew. He went at once to his next door neighbours, and requested them to hold themselves in readiness, in case he should want for their assistance in the night, for he had some idea, he said, that there would be an attempt to rob, or perhaps to murder him that night. This greatly alarmed his neighbours, and they promised to do what he requested, and the moment he had left them they sent for a reinforcement of their friends and also begged of the fitting authorities that there might be an additional watch set in their neighbourhood that night.

Lessomour returned earlier by some hours than usual, and to his wonder, found his door was not fastened within. He entered, and called, but no one answered—he fastened the door, and went up to his bedroom, where he found his wife already in bed, and seemingly fast asleep—this was the first time she had not set up for him. He made a great noise, overturned stools and boxes, and sundry other things, and then cursing at them after the manner of drunken men—but his wife still seemed to sleep soundly; he spake to her, but she made no answer. Really believing she was asleep, he got into bed, and pretended himself to sleep, and to snore—still she lay quiet. For two hours after he got into bed she never moved; but then she quickly but silently slipped from the bed, hurried, but still without noise, to a stool near the fire, took from under one of the cushions a small iron ladle, and what Martyn knew again for the leaden weight he had seen in the morning—this she put into the ladle, and kneeling upon one knee, set it upon the fire; in about a minute she turned her face to the bed, and then raised it up, and Martyn saw that though her features were frightfully written with bad passions, there were tears in her eyes that bespoke an inward struggle. She rose notwithstanding, and whispered—"Now—no flinching"—and walked up to the bed, with the ladle containing the molten lead, in her right hand; and just as she brought this forward to pour in her husband's ear, he started up with a loud outcry, seized her hand jumped out of bed, at the same time saying, "Shameless assassin! have I caught thee? help, ho! help, neighbours! Help—murder!" Alice did not scream—nor start even—but stared in her husband's face, and with a strong effort freed her hand, flung the ladle into the fire, sank on a stool behind her, and hid her face in her hands. Lessomour continued calling for help, which call his neighbours, to do them justice, were not slow to obey—but to the number of two score and odd, well armed, they forced the outer door, and were hastening up the stairs. As they were close upon the bed room door, Alice took her hands from her face, and with a hollow voice said—"Martyn Lessomour, before the ever living God, I am glad this hath so happened." Before he could reply, his neighbours and the watch were in the room, and upon his charge, seized his wife.

The next day the coffins of her former husbands were all opened, and in the skulls of each was found a quantity of lead, which had plainly been poured in through one of the ears. Mrs. Alice was soon after tried upon the evidence of her living husband, and that of her dead ones, which though mute was no less strong. She would say nothing in her defence; indeed after the words she spoke to her husband in their bed-room on the night of her apprehension, she never uttered another: only, in the court, during her trial, when Lessomour was bearing witness that he pretended drunkenness to try what effect it would have upon her—when he swore to this, Alice, whose back had hitherto been towards him, turned rapidly round, fixed her glazing eye upon his, and uttering a shriek of piercing anguish, would have fallen, but that her jailer caught her in her arms; and that look and that sound Martyn Lessomour never forgot to his dying day. His wife was found guilty of petit treason, and was burnt to death at Smithfield, according to the law of the land.

And so great a noise did this story make, that in the course of that year a statute was passed, more determinately to settle the office of Coroner, and the powers and duties of him and the jury he should summon to the Inquest.

Martyn Lessomour lived to be a very old, and, as had been foretold of him, a very rich man—but he never was a happy one.

MISCELLANY.

From H. E. Dwight's Travels in the North of Germany.

DUELLING IN GERMANY.

The genuine university duel differs from any other in Europe. In some slight degree the mode varies in the different universities, but the leading features are every where the same. The weapon used is a straight sword, about three feet in length. Near the point it has a double edge, so that it will cut equally well on either side. To protect the hand, a circular piece of brass or iron of six or eight inches in diameter rises between the handle and the blade. These three parts are separated from each other, the cap receiving the circle of defence, the handle being placed in their pockets, and the blade concealed in a hollow cane, or carried under their coats. Thus prepared they promenade the streets, and go to the theatre of combat, without even exciting a suspicion in the minds of the gendarmes or constables, (for I know not what else to call them,) attached to the university. When assembled at the room which is to be the scene of their prowess, the parties consist of the following persons: the combatants—the seconds—the umpire who is chosen by the seconds, whose province it is to determine when they shall commence, and when they shall terminate their contest—the surgeon—and finally a few friends of the parties, who are usually invited as witnesses. The dress consists of very thick gloves, which come almost to the elbows; and of a leathern jacket corresponding with a breast plate, which is so stuffed and padded that a sword can not penetrate it. This descends below the hips, and guards every vital part of the body. Nothing but the face is thus exposed, as if this were the only part of the person worthy of being ornamented with scars. At this they aim all their blows, as it is considered unworthy of a Bursch to strike at the legs of his opponent. The seconds are arrayed in the same costume as the combatants. They place themselves on each side of their friends with drawn swords, and ward off those blows which defy the skill of the principals. Although not in the thickest of the affray, they not unfrequently receive wounds themselves.

A duelling code is established here, by which all the students were governed. I have not yet been able to procure it, but have been informed of some of the laws. From them, as well as from descriptions of such scenes from eye-witnesses, I shall be able to give you an idea of such a combat. If the offence is trifling, they strike a certain number of blows, I think it is twelve, and if no blood flows, they shake hands and separate. If the offence is of greater magnitude, they continue fighting until one of them is wounded, or until they have struck twelve times twelve. During a long contest, which results from an equality of skill on the part of the combatants, they occasionally stop to recover their breath, and after a few minutes respite they commence again with new ardour, continuing their strife in some instances half an hour, before either of the parties is wounded. Whenever blood is visible, the umpire immediately orders a suspension of arms. The surgeon then examines the wound. If it is two inches in length, and opens of itself one-fourth of an inch, the duel ceases; as a wound of these dimensions is considered ample satisfaction for any offence that can be atoned for by the sword. The parties then become friends, the grasp of the hand being the sign of reconciliation; and leaving the wounded student with the surgeon, they repair to town, provided, as is usually the case, the duel is fought at a little distance from it.

Many of the students here are horribly hacked, and not a small number of them carry on their faces the scars of many a duel. It not unfrequently happens that these wounds transform a very fine face almost into deformity. Instances have occurred where both eyes have been put out by a too well directed blow; in others, the nose* has been cut off, or the jaw has been so wounded as never to recover from it. Within a short time, one of the students has lost his nose; another an eye; while others have been so hacked as to be disfigured for life. They seem as proud of these scars as an old Roman warrior, apparently believing that their reputation for courage will be in proportion to their number in size. I have been informed by those who have every opportunity to form a correct estimate, that more than two hundred of these duels have been fought here during the present term. Among the students, I have two acquaintances, one of whom during this period, has fought seven, and the other six times. These are not very rare instances. It is currently reported that another has sent and received eighteen challenges, which are to be cancelled by as many duels the approaching semester or term.

The thirst for acquiring distinction, by fighting, and by getting into rows with the police, with the Philistines, and with each other, attracts many young men to those universities; who reside here for no other object than to pass their time as pleasantly as possible, with the intention of leaving behind them the brilliant reputation of a genuine Bursch. While here, their hours are passed in fencing, riding, smoking, drinking beer, and fighting, and in all these accomplishments, they take the lead. This class, which may form perhaps the tenth part of the students, make more noise, and fight more duels, unless there is a quarrel between the Landsmannschaften, than all the others. They are the men who always stand ready to dispute the pavement with you, and Sie sind ein dummer Junge is always on the end of their tongues. They are ready to embark in any carousal, and the Burschen song coming from their throats salutes your ear long after all honest persons should be at home. These are the men at all the universities, who fill the beer cellars with smoke, and songs, and with noise, from the loud laugh which issues from these subterranean caverns, to the thundering shout with which they greet the air as they emerge into starlight. All the duellists, however, are not of this character. Some of those who fight are very peaceable and gentlemanly in their deportment. If, however they have the reputation of being expert swordsmen, they are sure of being challenged by the class of students just mentioned, who with the hope of gaining the reputation of wounding them in combat, cheerfully expose their faces to the danger of receiving such honourable scars.

* You probably have heard that artificial noses are made in Europe. One of the Heidelberg students, who had lost this member in such a contest, procured one, which was in his opinion a very respectable one. While fishing in the Rhine, as he looked over the side of the boat to watch his nibbles, this ornament unfortunately dropped into the stream, and was lost to him forever.

THE DEVIL IN PISA.

The Devil has lately been in Pisa,—according to one man's testimony at least;—and God forbid we should have better evidence. A drunken cooper, playing unsteadily at bowls, lost game after game, and bet after bet, till, in a rage at his ill luck, he burst open his waistcoat, seized on the Madonna's miniature, which every good Catholic loves to feel dangling from his neck, and tore it to pieces, and trampled on it, blaspheming like a Turk. So great a profanation was never known; the bystanders shrank from him in terror; and he, to keep up his unholy courage, still blasphemed, and swallowed wine, (every one remaining at an awful distance from the prodigy,) till he swore he would leave them all to the Devil, and go home by himself. No one offered to accompany him; and, whether it was owing to the urging of that word "devil," or to the wine, or both together, he began, as well as a man could in his worse than maudlin state, to be dreadfully frightened. As ill luck, his old enemy, would have it, his reeling zig-zag way lay through the Piazza di Santa Caterina. All the world knows that if anybody crosses that Piazza alone, and a dog meets him, and stares him full in the face, that dog is the Devil incarnate. Now it happened that a dog met him just in the middle of the Piazza, and looked up at him; when, with a loud shriek, the cooper fell down flat on his face. "At that instant," he asserts, "the Devil seized on me, flew up in the air with me to a tremendous height, and there, keeping fast hold of my heels, whirled me round and round. In this awful situation I begged pardon of the Madonna, and prayed for her assistance with all my heart and soul. When the Devil heard me pray, exasperated at my repentance, he dashed me to the earth. I should have been certainly destroyed,—my head and bones crushed to atoms without doubt,—had not the ever-blessed Madonna at that moment descended, and, catching me by the arm, broke my fall, so that I came to the ground without the slightest injury." It is easy to imagine, considering the poor fellow's panic, and the whirl in his own head at the time, that he verily believed every particular of the story he related; and, as a proof of his sincerity, he has dedicated himself to a religious life. But we could not hear of any other person in Pisa who put faith in it, except an old woman, who assured us it was true, and entirely owing to his not having been baptized. As there was so little credulity, the priests were silent, though perhaps some fifty years hence, there may be admirable attestations, (the old woman's included,) confirming the miracle; and, in the event of the cooper's falling into a state of melancholy madness in his convent, he may chance to be canonized.

A singular custom was formerly observed in the city of Middelburg, in the Netherlands. When any inhabitant died, a bundle of straw was placed before the house, with the ears towards the street, if the deceased was a man; but towards the house, if a woman.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JUNE 20, 1829.

The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

"The Misfortunes of the Twentieth Century," by H. and "A Riddle," by Q. shall be inserted next week.

THE FESTIVAL. Our letters and papers assure us that the approaching Festival will be celebrated very generally, and with as much good feeling and attachment to the masonic institution as in former years. The evidence thus afforded of firmness and good faith on the part of adherents, is the best proof of the stability and abiding virtue of our order. In ordinary times there is something in the meetings of the fraternity which is calculated to call the best feelings of human nature into action; but at the present time, when every slander that can be invented is heaped upon the institution, the commemoration of its ancient usages is a source of increased and peculiar gratification. In these celebrations no selfish feeling participates,—no private interest is consulted or thought of; all ambition is forgotten, save that of encouraging feelings of benevolence and adoration, and works of charity: human kindness is at its flow; and every feeling which can ennoble the nature of man, holds its festival. Let those whose souls are incapable of appreciating any goodness cavil at the institution as they please; so long as those who know its worth justly value it, it will survive every trial, and gather honour and strength from every struggle.

The following extract, which we take from Mr. Brown's Narrative of the Antimasonic Excitement, was originally published in the National Observer, and written by its editor, Solomon Southwick, soon after the abduction of Morgan, in 1826. We would not be understood as attaching peculiar importance to any opinion which Mr. Southwick has at any time expressed; but there can be no doubt, that his sayings of 1826 are worth as much as those of the present day. Let the reader, however, give what credit he pleases to the following: the masonic institution is above the eulogy as well as the censure of Solomon Southwick; and we publish this extract merely to show the admirable consistency of the gentleman, and as a tolerable specimen of his weathercockish tendencies.

"We shall only add, to what has been said by the editor of the Repository, that as to the book, which Morgan has written, we do not believe it is worth a cent. We think that all who purchase it, will 'pay dear for the whistle.' Such attempts have been made before now, and have always terminated in the disgrace of their authors, without injuring the cause of masonry. But, as we have said before and now repeat it, Morgan's folly, depravity, or wickedness, form no justification for the violation of the civil law, which has taken place in his person, as well as that of Miller the printer. If we have a government of laws, let us adhere to it; for anarchy is the ruin of all.

We repeat it again, that we do not believe Morgan's book to be worth a cent; but if there be any who wish to know something about masonry that is worth knowing, let them purchase a book, which was translated from the German, about a year since, and published by Messrs. Hosfords in this city. The work is worth reading; for whilst it shows what abuses masonry has been subjected to in England, France, Italy, and elsewhere, it likewise discloses, as far as they can be disclosed, THE GOOD SOURCES OF THE INSTITUTION, AND SUBLIME PRINCIPLES OF VIRTUE WHICH HAVE EVER GOVERNED IT IN ITS PRISTINE PURITY. The author of the work in question, was a mason of high distinction in Europe; and the gentleman who translated it, has long been a respectable citizen of this state, (a naturalized German, who came to this country during the Revolution) and is well known to, and intimate with some of the most respectable citizens of Albany. We are not at liberty to mention his name, and should not have mentioned it here, but for attracting the attention of the public to his book, which possesses the interest of romance, or deep dramatic design, with the strictest regard to historic truth and correct principles. It is worth a thousand such trash as Morgan's: which, we repeat it, whoever purchases, will 'pay too dear for the whistle.'"

The May number of the Western Monthly Review completed its second volume and second year. The table of contents will be found in a subsequent column. The third volume will commence on the first of July next, and every one who desires (as every one should) to be acquainted with the western portion of the Union, will benefit himself by patronizing it.

The June number of The Ladies' Magazine reached us this morning. We have not, of course, had time to peruse it; but the reader will find the table of contents in another column. We forgot to state that the number for May was embellished with a fine lithographic print. The Ladies' Magazine is got up in very superior style, and the talent connected with it does honour to the literature of the country.

The emancipation of the Irish Catholics was celebrated by the Friends of Civil and Religious Freedom, in New-York, on Wednesday last. A dinner was given "in Niblo's best style," some very good toasts drank, and several speeches made. It is said the whole went off with great eclat.

THEATRE. There have been several very good pieces very well acted at the Theatre during the present week; and every thing indicates that the house will sustain a far different and better character than heretofore. We hope the encouragement may keep pace with it. Jefferson is re-engaged, and will appear to-night in Zemba, and Who's the Dupe? Let those who love fun, and those who do not know what it is, go and see him.

RELIGIOUS ANTI-MASONIC MEETING. The anti-masonic managers in this county, finding, in spite of all their efforts, that their cause is rapidly declining, and that good sense and liberal feelings are likely to triumph over fanaticism and hypocrisy, have resorted to another expedient to keep alive the dying members of political anti-masonry. The religious feelings and prejudices of the community are now appealed to, and the seeds of discord and disunion are to be sown among our churches and religious societies, to minister to the ambition of political demagogues, who hope to obtain, by the force of prejudice and fanaticism, that which their own merits and the sober judgment of the community would never award to them. Accordingly, an "anti-masonic religious meeting" is formally announced in the last Censor, to be held in August next. By what authority, or by whose request the meeting is called, we are not informed, but we presume the very pious and worthy editor of the Censor has assumed that authority—a man who was never suspected of a religious feeling, or a virtuous principle. Are the religious community prepared to commit the interests of religion to the keeping and guardianship of such men as Morton, Goodale & Co.? Will religion be honoured by this attempt to connect it with an unholy crusade, to minister to the ambition of political adventurers? Is it in accordance with that spirit of christian charity, which is the foundation of all religion? Is it calculated to promote a spirit of harmony and brotherly love, so essential to the true interests of the church? These are questions which address themselves to the sober judgment of the religious community, and which they are now called upon to decide. But we are confident that the respectable portion of the religious community have not authorised the call of a meeting of this kind. It is designed for political effect, and the prime movers and promoters of it would sacrifice—we had almost said the kingdom of heaven itself, were it necessary to consummate their political purposes.

OPINION OF THE SUPREME COURT IN BRUCE'S CASE. Eli Bruce and others, ad. the People. The only question upon which our advice is requested, is, whether Bruce should not be acquitted of the charge of conspiracy, inasmuch as the evidence that proves the conspiracy proves also the abduction of Morgan? It is not intended to call in question the correctness of the verdict of the jury upon the charge for conspiracy. It is not necessary, therefore, that we should give any opinion upon the question whether the testimony was sufficient to authorize the conviction.

We are of opinion that the facts in this case do not constitute a merger. The offence of conspiracy is a distinct and separate offence—and not at all necessary to, or necessarily connected with the false imprisonment shown by the evidence. The defendant, Bruce, might commit the offence of abduction or imprisonment without having been guilty of the conspiracy.

It was decided in Lambert's case, in the court for the correction of errors, that when the indictment charges a conspiracy, and also the commission of the unlawful act conspired to be done, it was to be considered an indictment for the offence itself. This is not that case, or, at least, it is not so presented to us. Upon the case, as it appears before us, we advise the court of general sessions to give judgment upon the conviction against the defendant.

May 7, 1829. JOHN SAVAGE.

In connexion with the above opinion, we have procured from Gen. Matthews, one of the defendant's counsel, the following explanation:

The objection made by the counsel of Bruce was, that the testimony proved that the act conspired to be committed (to wit, false imprisonment, &c.) was committed pursuant to the conspiracy, and that that was the offence. Such, in effect, is the above opinion; for the court say that it was decided in Lambert's case, in the court of errors, that, where indictment charges a conspiracy, and also the commission of the unlawful act conspired to be done, it was to be considered an indictment for the offence itself, that is to say, the offence conspired to be committed.

Now, it can make no difference whether the indictment charges the act conspired to be committed, to have been committed, or whether proof establishes the commission of the offence conspired to be committed. The result is the same. The manner of charging the offence cannot alter the nature of it. The counsel for Bruce had no knowledge of Lambert's case when they made up Bruce's case. They adapted it to the objection made by them; and if their case had gone up, the opinion would unquestionably have been different; but it was altered after it went out of their hands, with the honest, but mistaken purpose of simplifying it, and so the real objection was not presented to the court.

From the Morristown, N. J., Jerseyman.

Mr. Colden must certainly have had some person at his side tickling him when he wrote—"I have been a Mason a great number of years, and have held very high Masonick offices." But what the mischief got into the old gentleman's head when he directly adds, "I have never known a very great Mason, who was not a very great fool"? Probably his conscience told him that what he then was writing was very applicable to his own peculiar case. Some people have been so uncharitable as to suppose Mr. Colden is to be the next anti candidate for Governor. This can not be for the "Young Cub" is too aspiring, and is already on the ground—Sir Solomon having been distanced the first heat, will be withdrawn from the course, and employed to cry—"mad dog."

ANTI-MASONICK DECENCY. The anti-masons are brutally railing at the death of colonel King. The grave itself is insufficient to protect its inmates from the fury of the harpies. The anti-masonick gentry say that the story of King's death is a mere fiction—that he is not dead—but that he has fled, and an effigy was buried to lull suspicion! They hint likewise that his grave will be ransacked, and the coffin taken up for examination! Such an infamous course would be perfectly characteristic of the men who tore up the corpse of Timothy Monroe and pulled his hair and whiskers to make him "a good enough Morgan till after the election!" [Roch. Daily Adv.]

Weed abused the western lodges for surrendering their charters, and he sneers at the members of the Skaneateles convention for retaining them. These are the inconsistencies of a demagogue. [Onondaga Journal.]

VARIETIES.

Library of Arbedil. Among several trophies which the Russians gained in Persia during the last war, there is a very valuable literary treasure, the library of Arbedil, the city where the Persian Kings are crowned. The acquisition was made by Count Suchtelen, at the taking of Arbedil. The library was founded in 1013 of the Hegira; the then reigning King Abbas I. having deposited the manuscripts collected by him in a mosque. It is now to be conveyed, by order of Nicholas, to St. Petersburg, under a military escort.

Voltaire. It has been doubted whether Voltaire valued more highly his reputation as a poet, or as a prose writer. The following reply may throw some light on the subject:—A friend seeing him engaged, would not enter for fear of interrupting his labours, "Entrez, entrez," said the philosopher of Ferney, "Je ne fais que de la vile prose."

Musick. The German, who makes a science of every thing, treats musick learnedly; the voluptuous Italian seeks from it vivid but transient enjoyment; the Frenchman, more vain than sensitive, speaks of it with effect; the Englishman pays for it, but interferes no farther.

Suicide. A powerful treatise on this subject has been published by Dr. Heyfelder, of Berlin. The following remarks deserve notice: That difference of religion is not without influence upon suicides, which is more rare in Catholic countries than in others; and in countries, such as Spain, where suicide is very rare, assassinations are very rare, and vice versa."

Number of Students in the Prussian Universities. A Prussian official gazette has published the following account of the number of students who have frequented the seven universities of that kingdom, in the years 1820 and 1828:—

Number of Students	In 1820.	In 1828.
In Theology, Protestants	853	1951
Papists	256	888
In Philology and in Philosophy	373	714
In Law	928	1539
In Administration Economy (Kameralwissenschaft)	95	111
In Medicine	623	731
Total	3144	5654
Of whom—Native Students	2450	4804
Foreign Students	694	1150

It is probable that many of the Prussian youths are educated in other parts of Europe; without, however, considering this, but merely taking the above statement, that, in 1820, there were 2450 native students, and 4804 in 1828, we obtain the following results:—

	1820	1828
The entire population of Prussia 11,272,482.
in 1820—12,552,278 in 1828: which gives
One Scholar for	4971	2613
One Student, destined to instruct either in Schools or in the Churches for	8431	4120
One Student, designed for the Administrative or Legal Profession, for	12666	8562
One Student in Medicine for	27360	25235

If these proportions be adopted, and the period of study at the university be estimated according to established regulations, four years for the medical profession, and three years for every other one; if the mean time of a man exercising his profession after quitting the university be taken at 30 years—Prussia will be found to possess.

	Inhabitants.
One ecclesiastick or professor brought up at a university, for	442
One functionary for	256
One physician, for	3360

A new author is about to appear in the literary world who is likely to hold a very distinguished station in it. His genius has long been recognized in private circles, and some of his productions have, without his knowledge, found their way into several weekly papers. His first avowed publication, now on the eve of appearance, is an historical novel, to be called "Richelieu, a Tale of France," a work which may be fitly announced in our columns, inasmuch as the scene of the tale is chiefly at the Court of France in the eventful days of Louis XIII. [London Court Journal.]

John Locke. A Life of the celebrated John Locke is preparing for publication, by Lord King. It will comprise extracts from his Journals, Correspondence, and other papers in the possession of the author's family.

ITEMS.

Family Jars, not Jars of Sweetmeats. Mr. Joseph Lane of Kesseville, advertises his wife Charlotte as having eloped from his bed and board, without any justifiable cause. Whereupon Mrs. Charlotte replies that Mr. Joseph never had any bed, but that she has taken her bed with HER, and that she leaves it with the publick to say whether being knocked down and turned out of doors is or is not a justifiable cause for leaving his board.

"Oh! Matrimony, thou art like To Jeremiah's figs,
The good were very good—the bad
Too bad to give the figs!"

[N. Y. Courier & Enquirer.]

A Royal Authoress. We learn from the London Gazette, that "the illustration of the recherche pursuits of fashionable life by means of novels is now about to receive its highest perfection. The class of fashionable authors has risen in rank from private gentlemen to peers; and we are now assured, that a work to be called "The Exclusives," from the pen of an authoress of royal blood, is actually in the press."

"Hard Times." Last week one of the editors of this paper went on a collecting tour, to a place where he had seven or eight subscribers. He received money from one—promises from three—ascertained another was on the jail limits, and two more were non est inventus.

[Rensselaerville Folio.]

A newly commissioned magistrate sent the following note to a bookseller—"Sir, please send me all the ax of the Legislature that belong a Gustis of the Peas, as I am now one. Yours, &c."

The editor of the Lancaster Gazette declares from experience, that a slight application of mercurial ointment, will effectually remove the disease in the peach tree, usually called the yellow leaf. One ounce of the ointment will be sufficient for fifty trees.

LADIES' MAGAZINE conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, 41 Washington-st Boston—and by Bourne, at the Depository of Arts, 359 Broadway, New-York, & Thomas T. Ash, 150 Chesnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 50 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 600 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusions of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history and its character, and manners of its inhabitants, which Americans of either sex should be careful to acquire. But no sectional prejudices shall be admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the publick, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

Contents of No. VI. for June. Original Miscellany—The Country and the Common; Remonstrance of an Album; Sketches of American Character, (Capt. Glover's Daughter;) The Brownie of Cawder Castle, (A Scottish Legend;) Recollections, No. 3, My Cousin Sophy Dane; The Dangers that beset the Female Sex; Letters on Female Character; The Athenæum Exhibition, Letter to the Editor; Bedford Street Infant School. Original Poetry—The Rose; Abraham's Trial; The Sea Maid; To the Violet; To my Boy; Woman's Love; Sonnet. Literary Notices—Edge Hill, or the Family of the Fitzroyals; Specimens of American Poetry; Amir Khan, and other Poems; The Happy Valley; Happy Days; The Warning; The Garland of Flora; Ourika, a Tale from the French; To Readers and Correspondents.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

O'er dismal thoughts dull bigots hang,
Reject the pleasures life would give,
By fancy suffer many a pang,
And daily die, while yet they live.

Such seem to think that joy's a sin,
That never heart was light and gay
Where did not lurk, concealed within,
The germs of fell depravity.

The buoyant step, the laughing eye,
The blythesome look that youth bestows,
The bosom stranger to the sigh,
The cheek where lively beauty glows,—

These marks of innocence and joy
Oft meet the scowling bigot's frown,
Whose woful mind dark fears employ,
And thoughts that weigh the spirits down.

But let us still the present prize,
Enjoy the moments as they pass,
Seize on the pleasures that arise,
Nor think that each will be the last.

TO THE HUDSON RIVER.

Written on the passage from Albany to New-York, April 10, 1820.

Thy course is through a varied scene,
Of all that's smooth and rugged too;
Through rocks and wilds and meadows green,
Thou dost alike thy track pursue.

Glide on thou mighty River! Glide
Through fertile grounds and mountains high;
Till lost in Ocean's swelling tide,
Thy name famed Hudson there must die!

There buried in boundless grave
Of kindred waters, long to lie;
Till God commands thy liquid wave,
In airy spouts to mount on high.—

Thus mortals, on the stream of life,
Are passing onward down to death;
Through mixed scenes of care and strife,
From early days till latest breath.

Then laid at last in silent graves,
"To mingle with their kindred earth;"
Till God who rules the Oceans waves,
By sound of trumpet shall call them forth.

Then happy he who's just indeed,
Whose works have all been purified;
Who at the bar of God can plead,
For me O Father, "Jesus died."

CASTARA.

BY W. HARRINGTON—1835.

Life the violet which, alone,
Prosper in some happy shade;
My Castara lives unknown,
To no looser eye betrayed,
For she's to herself untrue,
Who delights in th' publick view.

Such is her beauty, as her arts
Have enriched with borrowed grace,
Her high birth no pride imparts,
For she blushes in her place,
Folly boasts a glorious blood,
She is noblest, being good.

Cautious, she knew never yet
What a wanton courtship meant;
Nor speaks loud, to boast her wit;
In her silence eloquent;
Of herself survey she takes,
But 'twixt men no difference makes.

She obeys with speedy will
Her grave parents' wise commands;
And so innocent, that ill
She nor acts, nor understands;
Women's feet run still astray,
If once to ill they know the way.

She sails by that rock, the court,
Where, oft, honour splits her mast;
And retiredness thinks the port,
Where her fame may anchor cast;
Virtue safely can not sit
Where vice is enthroned for wit.

She holds that day's pleasure best,
Where sin waits not on delight;
Without mask, or ball, or feast;
Sweetly spends a winter's night;
O'er that darkness, whence is thrust
Prayer and sleep, oft governs lust.

She her throne makes reason climb,
While wild passions captive lie,
And, each article of time,
Her pure thoughts to Heaven fly;
All her vows religious be,
And her love she vows to me.

THE MOTHER'S CALL.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

Come, sweet ones, come to the fields with me,
I hear the hum of the honey bee,
I hear the call of the gray cuckoo,
I hear the note of the shrill curlew,
I hear the cry of the hunting hawk,
The sound of the dove in our customary walk,
The song of the lark, the tongue of the rill.
The shepherd's shout on the pasture hill.

My sweet ones, all come forth and play,
The air is balm, and I smell new hay;
Come breathe of the flowers, and see how neat
The milk maid trips on her scented feet;
Young folks come forth all joy, and run
Abroad as bright as beams of the sun;
Old men come out with a sadder grace;
And matrons come with a graver face.

The smoke streams up, and the air is rife
With joy, and all is light and life.
From East to West there's not a stain
In all the sky, and the birds are fair,
And the beasts are glad, while man in song
Breaks out, for rain has loded long,
And earth has drunk more than her need
To fill her flowers and nurse her seed.

Now, now ye come, my little ones all,
As the young doves come at their mother's call;
One run to yon tall fox-glove, and see
At his breakfast of balm the golden bee;
Another go hunt from bud to bloom
The worm that flies with a painted plume;
Or see the doe solicitous lead
Her twin fawns forth the odoriferous mead;
Or mark the nestlings, newly flown,
With their tender wings and their crests of down.

But stay, my children. Ere ye run,
Who made the sky and yon glorious sun?
Who framed the earth and made it sweet
With flowers, and set it 'neath mankind's feet?
'Twas one in heaven. Kneel down, and lay
Your white foreheads to the grass, and pray.
And render Him praise, and seek to be
Pure, good, and modest—then come with me.

From the Messenger of Intelligence.

DEPARTED LOVE.

The crimson morn may raise the flowers
That drooped beneath the midnight hours,
Wake into life the distant bowers
And silent grove:

But where's the morn that can restore,
When life's first dream of bliss is o'er,
The charms that bloom on earth no more
Of banished love?

A course where once the streamlet threw
Its silver cloud of sparkling dew,
Now parched and desert to the view,
A lonely cot,

That mourns its gilded herbage green,
Its thousand glittering waves between:—
Such is the soul where once has been
Departed love.

A dream of joy that, sadly breaking,
Leaves the lone heart to weep in waking,
At all it prized, and hoped forsaking,
Its heaven beneath:

A dark and heavy cloud of sorrow;
A night, for which earth knows no morrow
Whence hope a few faint rays might borrow;
A living death.

Yes! though another love may rise,
To light awhile life's gloomy skies,
And Hope, with all its meteor joys,
The passions move.

'Tis but the twilight of a day,
Whose loveliest hours have passed away,—
A feeble, faint, and dying ray
Of early love.

No! not on earth the morn can rise,
To kindle passion's ecstasies:
Its crimson gleams o'er other skies

Heaven only can the joys restore,
The love that blooms on earth no more;
And give the heart, when time is o'er,
Its former love.

THE SKY LARK.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

Bird of the wilderness,
Blithesome and cumberless,
Light be thy matin o'er moorland and lea!
Emblem of happiness!
Blessed is thy dwelling place!
O to abide in the desert with thee!

Wild is thy lay and loud,
Far in the downy cloud;
Love gives it energy, love gave it birth.
Where, on thy dewy wing,
Where art thou journeying? &

Thy lay is in heaven, thy love is on earth:
O'er fell and fountain sheen,
O'er moor and mountain green,
O'er the red streamer that heralds the day
Over the cloudlet dim,
Over the rainbow's rim,
Musical cherub, hie, hie thee away!

Then when the gloaming comes,
Low in the heather-blooms,
Sweet will thy welcome and bed of love be!
Emblem of happiness!
Blessed is thy dwelling-place!
O to abide in the desert with thee!

MASONICK RECORD.

From the Norwich (Chenango co.) Journal.

ANTI-MASONRY UNMASKED.

It was to establish personal liberty upon a safe and enduring basis, as well as to secure our political independence, that our revolutionary fathers encountered the dangerous conflict with British power. Freedom of speech, of the press, and the right to social enjoyment, undisturbed by the minions of tyrants, together, with the liberty of worshipping God according to the dictates of their consciences, were the blessings to which they aspired. In so holy a cause they were invincible, and our free constitution were the fruits of their dauntless achievements. But it has been well said, that "the condition on which God grants liberty to man, is eternal vigilance."

To maintain in their pristine purity, the free principles for which our fathers fought and bled, has been, as it always should be, the constant aim of the democratic party. So far their efforts have been successful, notwithstanding the untiring exertions of designing men, to wrest the constitution from its true meaning, and convert it into an instrument of oppression. But it seems the time has now come, when its destruction is menaced, under the specious guise of pretended alarm for the public safety. Our Oathes and Beddoes, are prowling for victims. In the delirium of their heads and the corruption of their hearts, they have fabricated their plot, erected their Moloch, and denounced against all who will not kneel and propitiate their idol with a sacrifice, disfranchisement and persecution.

We had supposed, that the rights of American citizens were too firmly secured to be shaken by any combination of men, however desperate or depraved. We had supposed, that if a citizen conducted himself with propriety and virtue, if he discharged his private and political duties with honesty and fidelity, that no man would have the hardihood to attempt his disfranchisement. But we were mistaken. Our personal rights are no longer held sacred. A conspiring band of Catalines and their dupes, have set the laws and the constitution at defiance, and erected their own prejudices and passions into an unholy tribunal, for the purpose of degrading and persecuting all those who have the firmness to resist their encroachments. We allude to the political anti-masons at the west, and their hypocritical coadjutors in this section of the state.

But lest we should be accused of charging them unjustly, we will select from the report of their committee of the Senate, a few passages which will develop their views and principles. We thank them for this precious document, for we intend to make it the means of their entire prostration. What could induce them thus to make public their dangerous principles we know not, unless they imagined that victory was sure to perch upon their piratical flag at the next election. But whatever it was, whether "moonstruck madness," or a want of knowledge of the character of the American people, it could not have been ushered to the world at a more propitious period.

In relation to "remedial laws" they observe—"the Autocrat of all the Russians has exerted the force of his edicts against Masonry, but without having been able to extirpate it from his dominions." After alluding to England and France, they add, "And in Spain, the meeting of the members of a lodge to admit, and actually admitting a new member, is made felony of DEATH." They do not in terms recommend the same laws here. But why are the tyrannical edicts of Russia, and the merciless laws of bigotted Spain, paraded forth on paper with apparent approbation in this report, unless for the imitation of the government and people of this state? That they would rejoice in the establishment of similar laws in our country, we may gather from what follows. They express, faintly, doubts as to the "constitutionality" of such measures here, but observe, "that legislative enactments of 'somewhat different character, and more prospective in their operation, ought to be adopted,' &c.

They, it seems have a little doubt, as to the "constitutionality" of punishing with torture, imprisonment and death, their fellow citizens, who have been guilty of no crime—who have offended against no law, merely for belonging to an institution which Franklin cherished and Washington loved and adorned, and which they for sinister purposes, without reference to its merits or demerits, choose to denounce. But should success crown their efforts—should the sceptre of power be entrusted in their hands, those doubts would vanish—opinion would be no longer free; and the man who should be suspected by their pimps, spies or parasites, of belonging to a secret society of any description, would be dragged from his family and friends, incarcerated in a loathsome dungeon, or stretched upon the rack to feast with his groans the ears of some murderous Inquisitor, or left to a bloody death. Is the picture too highly coloured? Why was Spain cited as an example? Why was barbarous and despotick Russia brought forward as a pattern—Russia, where the people are slaves, transferable with the soil on which they labour in debasement for their brutal masters? Partial disfranchisement they recommend in the same jesuitical manner. First to deprive the people of their rights, and then follow with more grievous oppression is always the crafty policy of tyrants.

With respect to the "prospective enactments" which they recommend, we are left in the dark. They do not tell us whether they would employ the rack, the gibbet, or the stake, to punish those who dare to violate their bloody edicts. They have, however, given us a sufficient view of their ulterior designs, to warrant us in saying, that their object is the destruction of our liberties. We do not make this assertion on slight grounds; for should their avowed object be carried into effect, liberty would be at an end. If they can disfranchise and punish one set of men for their opinions, they can do the same to another; and when the young wolf once gets a taste of blood, he is never satisfied while a victim remains to quench his savage thirst.

They say that Masons are impious, wicked and dangerous; but they adduce no proof, excepting tales manufactured by themselves, and fit only to attract the attention of "gaping idiot wonder." And could not the same false accusations be made against any other body of men? Universalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, might be made obnoxious to the same charges. In vain would they plead their innocence. Some Southwick, or some Weed, could be procured to fabricate falsehoods; and some of their own fraternity might be found to commit deliberate perjury, for the purpose of their condemnation. Would they appeal to the purity of their lives for justification! Experience has shown that power in pursuit of safety or vengeance, is deaf alike to reason and to mercy. Apostate Christians of old were found to accuse their brethren of the most wicked and debasing crimes, and procure their persecution and death. Give way to his ruthless assault upon liberty in one instance, and all safety will vanish. No man can trust his neighbour or his friend. When treachery is made honourable and perjury a virtue, no innocence, however clear, can justify the intended victim—no respectability or purity of life, preserve him from the scaffold.

Such is the tendency of the principles avowed by the leaders of the party who have now assumed the name of anti-masons. They would be much better characterized by the designation of anti-republican. It may be asked, is such the object of the political anti-masons of this county? Of many of them unquestionably. Others merely wish to acquire political power, and think they shall be able to controul the storm in its fury. Deluded men—they will only be a feather in the gale, to be blown about at random. Should they offer resistance they would be the first to be sacrificed. They should therefore pause before they proceed further—before they kindle a flame which will consume themselves.

What, under this state of things, are democrats to do? Pursue the same course which they always have pursued—support their principles, adhere to their party, rally around the constitution as the ark of their safety, and protect the rights of all that they may themselves be protected. Every honest man should consider it his duty to strip these ambitious and unprincipled politicians of their disguise, and expose their objects to the condemnation of the community. In doing this we shall be seconded by the wise and the virtuous, and in the end receive the thanks of thousands saved from ruin and disgrace.

There is nothing wanting to effectually prostrate political anti-masonry, but information, disseminated among the people. They have only to learn who is engaged in it, and what are their principles, and their fancied power will be "Like Dead Sea fruits, that tempt the eye,

And turn to ashes on the lips."

In Chenango, it is already on the wane. It enjoyed for five or six weeks an apparent prosperity in two or three towns; but we have certain information, that even in those towns the fever is abating. Its political character has been discovered, and it is now most thoroughly despaired.

From the (Utica) Oneida Observer.

The freedom of discussion no republican would wish to abridge; the principles of masons as well as the principles of religionists of every sect, it is fair and proper to scrutinize; but any attempts to establish new and oppressive political tests, should be resisted. To be an anti-mason, every man has just as good a right as to be an anti-Presbyterian or anti-Baptist; but when individuals would make such difference of opinion, a ground of disfranchisement and of expulsion from office, it becomes gross intolerance; such in spirit as caused in times gone by the imprisoning, branding and burning of heretics. It is therefore only against political anti-masonry that we remonstrate. If masonry is wrong in principle, it can be put down by appeals to the consciences of men much easier than by a system of political proscription, which is calculated only to exasperate and render its victims more obstinate. But political partisans who aim more at the possession of power than the annihilation of masonry, assert that to "refuse to permit masons to hold any office so long as they adhere to the institution, is not intolerance; if they are persecuted, say they, they persecute themselves, by refusing to renounce it." Such miserable sophistry has been gravely used. Those who write it are wicked, those who believe it are unfortunate. The poor and oppressed Catholic of Ireland might have been taunted with similar language; "you are not oppressed: you persecute yourselves by refusing to renounce your religion and embrace the Protestant faith." Many of the political anti-masons doubtless think, what they call Popery, worse than masonry, and they would therefore if they deemed it necessary to the accomplishment of their purpose, find a ready excuse for compelling believers in the Catholic faith to abjure it or submit to a cruel and odious political disfranchisement.

We are accused of an attachment to masonry. We admit the charge—but not in the sense implied. Our attachment goes no further than a desire to protect it, and ourselves, from the sweeping charges aimed at the institution by corrupt and designing demagogues. It is pronounced dangerous to the country; the charge attaches to every individual who ever did or now does belong to it. The anathemas of bigots are hurled at it—its members are pronounced "hell deserving," and the consolations of religion are denied to the conscientious and pious. We know that its character is misrepresented; and knowing this, we shall still exercise the right of free citizens in maintaining our opinions.

From the Onondaga Journal.

The anti-mason party of the western counties, are following in the steps of their predecessors. They denominate themselves "democratick anti-masons." This appropriation is as absurd as any that ever preceded it. It is a satisfactory evidence of their conscious feebleness, and is also an augury of their downfall. If there is no virtue in anti-masonry, the superfluous appertainment of "democratick" will carry none to it. We are led to these remarks by this circumstance, the seizure and use of the word most forcibly reminding us of a passage in Pollock's Course of Time, where the hypocrite is described as stealing—"The livery of Heaven to serve the Devil in!" We want no other criterion by which to specify the nature of the new party in our borders.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The Annual Communication of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of Vermont was held at Mason's Hall, in Rutland, on Wednesday the 17th inst. An excellent and highly appropriate discourse was delivered at the north meeting house, by the E. and Rev. Amos Drury, G. Chaplain, to a numerous and respectable auditory, from Isaiah 21st—11th, "Watchman, what of the night?"

The following companions were duly elected officers of the Grand Chapter, for the year ensuing:

Officers of Lafayette Lodge, in Alps Village, Nassau, Rensselaer county, for the present year:—

Timothy C. Larkin, Master; Lewis Cross, Senior Warden; Peter Brown, jun., Junior Warden; Lyman Williams, Senior Deacon; William Waterbury, Junior Deacon; Alanson Wilbur and Shash Adsit, Stewards; Jason Simmons, Tyler.

NOTE. Mr. Colden says "he never saw a very who was a very great fool."

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

Thomas Wildey, G. S. of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of the United States, accompanied by Past G. S. Small, of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, arrived in this city on Wednesday evening last, on the regular visiting tour to the several lodges of Odd Fellows in the northern and eastern states. The several lodges of the city assembled at the room of Hope Lodge, No. 3, where the G. S. was received with appropriate honours. On Thursday evening a sumptuous repast was served up at the United States Hotel, under the direction of a committee of the order, of which about sixty guests partook. If furnished in season, we shall give the toasts and a sketch of the proceedings in our next.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the Brattleborough (Vt.) Messenger.

THE BRATTLEBORO' PRESS.

This new power press has now been in constant operation for a considerable time, and the rapidity with which it throws off the work while at the same time it executes in the most beautiful manner, would seem incredible were we not eye witnesses of its operation. It is the second one which has been constructed on the same plan, but it contains many important improvements, which render it now perhaps the most perfect machine of the kind in existence. The first one has been in operation nearly a year and has worked extremely well, but this one has not only surprised but delighted us by the regularity as well as the rapidity of its motion.

It works two forms at a time, which are inked by the same apparatus, the impression given by two platens, one at each end. Two girls are required to put on and lay off the sheets which is all the labour required. The ordinary rate at which it runs is three tokens an hour, although on newspapers or other common work fifteen sheets a minute may be thrown off; indeed it has been run at the rate of eighteen a minute, though this is more sheets than can be handled for any length of time. In fact we see not how any more can be done on a press of any construction, for there is no delay in any part, the sheets may be put on as fast as they can be handled. If we mistake not, the great Napier press cannot do much more than this does, with twice the number of hands.

The length of the machine is about eight feet, and the whole does not occupy many more square feet of room than the common press; the machinery which is exceedingly compact, is all contained between the ribs and the floor. The workmanship does great credit to the ingenious manufacturer, Mr. E. H. Thomas of this place. The price will be very moderate and such as to bring it within the reach of nearly all who require one. The proprietors are now manufacturing them for sale, and any communications addressed to Messrs. Holbrook and Fessenden will meet with prompt attention. We earnestly recommend it to the notice of all who are interested in printing, as the most perfect machine of the kind of which we have ever heard.

THE NATURALIST.

THE SHIPWORM.

Of the marine tribe of Molluscules, the Teredo navalis, the shipworm, is the only one which has excited notice by its destructive powers. This shell-enclosed worm, which Linnaeus has styled the "calamitas navium," is said to have been introduced into our seas from the East within little more than a century. They are now common in all the seas of Europe; and being gifted with the power of perforating wood, they have done, and continue to do, extensive mischief to ships, piers, and all sub-marine wooden buildings. The soundest and hardest oak cannot resist them; but, in the course of four or five years, they will so drill it, as to render its removal necessary, as has happened in the dockyard of Plymouth. In the years 1731 and 1732, the United Provinces were under a dreadful alarm, for it was discovered that these worms had made such depredations on the piles which support the banks of Zealand, as to threaten them with total destruction, and to claim from man what he had wrested from the ocean. Fortunately they, a few years after, totally abandoned that island, from causes unknown, but suspected to be from their not being able to live in that latitude when the winter was rather severer than usual. The method now adopted to preserve the timbers necessarily used about the docks at Plymouth is, to cover that part which is continually under water with short broad-headed nails, which, in salt water, soon cover every part with a strong coating of rust, impenetrable to these animals.

SPIDERS.

It would be very interesting to know whether the gossamer threads thrown out by these insects are in an excited state of electricity: their divergent state would seem to imply they were; for there seems to be no other natural cause which could prevent them from coming together, especially before the insect had left its resting-place. If electric, then neighbouring bodies, as the hand or branches of a tree, or a stick, &c., would attract them; but care would be required in making the experiment, from the readiness with which these threads would move upon disturbance of the air. If electric, then it would be important to know whether they were positive or negative; which their attraction, or repulsion, by a stick of sealing-wax, rubbed on the sleeve of a coat, would at once determine. It is well known that these threads are almost perfect insulators of electricity, and would retain a charged state for a long time in a dry sunny atmosphere.

THE GATHERER.

MAXIMS OF JOHN BULLISM.

When you travel in a stage-coach, make all the passengers, both inside and outside, fully acquainted with your name, business, and objects in travelling, before five minutes have elapsed. Among the rest, be sure you give them to think you are a man of property, and the personal friend of at least half-a-dozen nobles or members of parliament. If in trade, inform them you have something very handsome in the three per cents., and live on terms of perfect familiarity with the great Jew.

Honesty is the best and most profitable policy in the long run, but there are a thousand exceptions to this rule in private practice.

Do no charity by stealth; it is never repaid in this world to any advantage; do it openly, and there are chances of its returning cent per cent.

You may keep a running horse, or two, though you are a magistrate sworn to put down gambling: you need not bet upon the race-course yourself. You may subscribe to Fishmongers' Hall, and go there without throwing the dice. You may share the profits of a roulette table, without venturing your luck. It is strange that vulgar understandings cannot discriminate in these matters!

When you have made up your mind finally to do any thing, ask the advice of your friend about it. The act of consultation will please him, and you will be none the worse.

Human happiness is more or less complete in a ratio with successful pecuniary accumulation.

If you enter a drawing-room before dinner a little time too early, and find yourself vis-a-vis with an unlucky visiter as forlorn as yourself, do not utter a word. The chances are, nine out of ten, he will not speak first, that is, if he be a true Briton. Stare at him as hard as you can.

If you meet a lady in society, old or young, married or single, who equals you in argument, or rises superiour to the thousand and one automaton disgorged monthly from fashionable boarding-schools, report her a bas bleu to your male acquaintances, and warn her own sex to shun her.

When you meet an inferior in a publick street, it is your duty to cut him, if any one who knows you is in sight. If you cannot escape a recognition, do it with as little parade as possible—a movement of the lips is sufficient—and walk on at a quick rate. Who knows but the Lord Mayor, or Mr. Alderman Blowbladder, may observe you?

A grain of impudence will fetch more in the market than twelve bushels of modesty.

If you visit foreign parts, and meet a countryman who may be useful to you, do not hesitate to avail yourself of his services; but be sure never to acknowledge him should you meet in your native land, unless he receive some other introduction to you, and you have it on creditable evidence that he is a man of good property.

Never allow reason weight in any thing you have resolved to be right that is opposed to it. Reason may be useful in mathematicks, to men of genius, and to scholars; but it has little to do with every-day existence, with the Three per Cents, the national revenue, the Stocks Exchange, or the Indian House.

Never get acquainted with your next-door neighbour, unless you find he is in good pecuniary circumstances. If you meet on the highway, or touch elbows at your respective fore-doors, look at each other like two strange tom-cats, and pursue your way.

When you dine with the Lord Mayor or any of the Aldermen of Brobdingnag, and they attempt to exhibit their skill at repartee, be sure decide the wealthiest to be the wittiest. It will insure you a good dinner another time, perhaps something more.

In choosing a wife, prefer even Bristol ugliness to beauty, especially if there be a fortune. Beauty will change, intellect may be too much for you, but ugliness will be true to you as to itself; besides its advantage of preserving you from the effects of conjugal frailty.

A judge's wig is a Delphick mystery, whether brains be in it or not. It is a symbol of sublimity wisdom—an umbrella over an oracle.

When you dine at a publick dinner, always take your seat opposite a favourite dish. Carve it yourself, and select the choicest bits, then leave it to your right-hand neighbour to help the rest of the company.

Always stick your napkin in your button-hole at the dinner table, if you admit such French superfluities at all. Eat with the sharp edge of your knife towards your mouth; forks won't take up gravy. Never wipe your lips when you take wine with a lady, and fill both her glass and your own until daylight is not visible through crystal.

When Mrs. Bull is obstreperous, go to the coffee-house and call for your glass. It is an excellent cure for her complaint, and you will get the latest news retailed in the most engaging manner, with the pleasure of knowing she is biting her lips at home in vexation.

Never hold any intercourse with people of whom the world speaks ill. 'Tis true they may be, and generally are, among the very best of mankind, but as they are not reputed to be so, what is that to you?

Some persons cant about the wickedness of the times: believe them not; this is the most saintly of ages, the most pure of generations, considering its temptations.

Never leave a dispute to be settled by arbitration; if you are rich, always appeal to law, especially if your opponent be poor. The lawyers will manage for you long before the case gets up to the Lords, and perhaps secure your rival in banco regis for expenses. In an arbitration, the case may be decided against you in a twinkling. It is a capital thing that justice and a long purse are sworn brothers; besides, moneyed men should have some advantage in society.

So little is the value of an oath understood by any but the Bull family, that none but the post-boys and the vulgar use oaths in foreign nations, America excepted; but that country being a chip of the old block, already rivals honest John; outdo him she must not.

Lard your butter, wet your tobacco, pipe-clay your flour, sand your sugar, sloe-leaf your tea, coal-ash your pepper, deteriorate your drugs, water your liquors, alloy your gold and silver, plunder your bankers, and, while none know it, who is the worse!

Then to church, and thank God you are not as other men.

Live and talk as if you were to live for ever. If you have accumulated tens of thousands, try and make them hundreds of thousands. Why should you retire and make way for the industry of others, while you are able to treasure up more.

Give credit, take credit, live upon credit; if you are wealthy, your own money will be gathering interest at the same time. If you are poor, you have no other means to live by.

In matters of business, let there be no favour. If you are dealing with your own father, give nothing to him. Screw the uttermost farthing, and, if need, sell him.

Give only to receive.

Men of genius are fools; the truly great men know how to make money, and money is power—the power of making more money. Your men of genius are at best but harlequins with empty pockets.

MODEL OF THE INQUISITION.

The English papers give an account of a curious model of the prison and officers of the Inquisition, formerly situated at Coimbra, in Portugal. It is exhibited in Pall Mall. It was constructed by Mr. Young, a British officer, lately in confinement for several months as a state prisoner of Don Miguel. The following is a description of it from a London paper.

When we visited the model, Mr. Young was in attendance, and pointed out the various departments and uses of the building. The model is on a scale of half an inch to a foot, and upon being taken to pieces exhibits the utmost recesses of the place, from the external roof down to the subterranean dungeons. The instruments of torture, and the mode of using them, are also displayed by very ingenious devices. Five varieties of treatment, as varieties in torture were mildly termed by the Holy Office, are exhibited:—The water treatment, whereby the patient whose refractory disposition would not allow him to confess all he knew to the Grand Inquisition, was bound down with cords and obliged to swallow several gallons of water, administered through a funnel, till, on the point of suffocation, he was humanely released by being placed heels uppermost, so that the superfluous liquid might run out through his mouth and nose—the fire treatment, whereby an untoward temper was warned of the deference due to the Inquisition, by being fixed on an iron cradle, with the soles of his feet exposed to a brisk fire, without the power of withdrawing them a single inch from its scorching influence, a treatment which may be regarded as somewhat an approach to the Mahomedan's hell, pictured as a place where men are shod with boots of red hot iron, making their brains boil like a cauldron. There are three species of the violent treatment by which men were repeatedly hauled up by ropes to the ceiling of a high room and suddenly let down, so as frequently to dislocate and break their limbs. By another device a man was tied down to a horse manger, with his hands fastened behind him, so as to be obliged to eat his food like a pig or an ox. This, however, as Mr. Young explained it, was not deemed a punishment, but only a degradation. The holes through which the Monks were enabled to see what every prisoner was about, the knowledge of which was often used by the Grand Inquisitors to impress their victims with the belief of their possessing supernatural powers—the secret places where the bones of those who were murdered, or reduced to death by the lingering pangs of confinement, were deposited, until the celebration of an Auto da fe, when they were burnt; and many other "secrets of the prison house" equally interesting and instructive, will be found fully and intelligibly displayed in Mr. Young's Model.

BARBARIAN MAGNIFICENCE.

In an account of the funeral of the late King of Madagascar, we find the following passage.

"The tomb was constructed at a small distance from the catafalque, and, according to the custom of the country, precious articles, such as gold and silver vases, crystals and porcelains, valuable fowling pieces, a golden powder flask, magnificent arms, trinkets, watches, clocks, cloths, and linens, and the portraits of Louis XVI., Louis XVII., of George IV., of Bonaparte, of Frederick the Great, in oil colours were enclosed therein, as well as several engravings of Napoleon, of Kleber, Massena, Marbot, Dessaix, Bernadotte, Eugene, Beauharnois, Poniatowski, &c., and other engravings, several of which were coloured, representing views in Europe, and land and sea battles given by France, and from the beginning of the revolution to the fall of the Emperor Napoleon. To these were added $150,000 in gold and silver coins and ingots. Six of the finest horses of the stables, and 20,000 oxen, were then sacrificed to the manes of the King. All these offerings were estimated at a sum-total of $350,000, including the coffin, made of 14,000 Spanish dollars. This coffin was eight feet long, and four and a half feet high and broad, and nearly a line in thickness."

From the Menagerie.

THE HYÆNA TAMEABLE.

Bishop Heber saw a gentleman in India, Mr. Traill, who had a hyæna for several years, which followed him about like a dog, and fawned on those with whom he was acquainted; and the Bishop mentions this as an instance of "how much the poor hyæna is wronged, when he is described as untameable." M. F. Cuvier notices an animal of this species that had been taken young at the cape, and was tamed without difficulty. His keepers had a complete command over his affections. He one day escaped from his cage, and quietly walked into a cottage, where he was retaken without offering any resistance. And yet the rage of this animal was occasionally very great when strangers approached it. The fact is, that the hyæna is exceedingly impatient of confinement, and feels a constant irritation at the constraint which, in the den of a menagerie, is put upon his natural habits. An individual at Exeter Change, some years ago, was so tame as to be allowed to walk about the exhibition room. He was afterwards sold to a person who permitted him to go out with him into the fields, led by a string. After these indulgences, he became the property of a travelling showman, who kept him constantly in a cage. From that time his ferocity became quite alarming; he would allow no stranger to approach him; and gradually pined away and died. This is one, out of the many examples, of the miseries which we inflict upon animals through an ignorance of their natural habits; and the same ignorance perpetuates delusions, which even men of talent, like Goldsmith, have adopted; and which still, in the instance before us, leads many to say with him, "though taken ever so young, the Hyæna can not be tamed."

The other day, a man of ninety-nine was buried at Pere-la-chaise, at Paris, and was followed to his grave by twenty children, fifteen grand-children and great-grand-children. Happily, such populations are not common! The deceased, it appears, had buried six wives, and married the seventh: he died in the full enjoyment of his senses, and assured his numerous progeny that he did not regret life, as he knew he was about to rejoin the six beloved partners of his days, who had gone before him. Few men, we fear, would be consoled by such an idea in their last moments, or at any moment of their existence! [Literary Gaz.]

No other period of the world, and no other people will compare with those of New-England, at the moment of the breaking out of the American revolution. They were high spirited without pride; they were well informed and well educated, at the same time that their demeanor was lowly, and their occupations toilsome. They were moral and religious without a single ceremonial exhibition of it, and they were determined and brave, without any conception that bravery was a virtue or a source of distinction.

The Romans owed their origin to vagabonds; Britain to savages and wild men; and Botany Bay to thieves. Future heralds will be puzzled to determine which of the Aborigines are entitled to the most dignified coat of arms.

can be said but what has already been said. Earth and air will have been robbed of their imagery. The laureate will but repeat the ode of years ago; the dramatist must consent to be the eulogist of former days. The guitar of the serenader will tinkle to words that have charmed the ears of maidens who will then sleep their "dreamless sleep;" epick and heroick stanzas and sonnet must consent to be the echo of what has been. Even "unwritten musick" will have all its changes rung ere that time.

Unfortunate Posterity! there will be no such question as "what news?" The word will be banished from the dictionary.

The only glimpse of sunshine in the shade that hangs over them, is the fact, that they will have no recollection of the faces of both male and female that now meet us in every direction. Perhaps in those days they will gaze on the forms and features of some of the then reigning queens of beauty, and perhaps in their ignorance, pity us their ancestors, who they imagine never had charms like those upon which to fix our eyes; but even here they are thwarted, for how can they win her smiles excepting by the same phrases that thousands before them have used, and the "fair ladye" will sigh that she could not have lived in our age, when the thoughts and feelings came with the purity of originality.

Perhaps there may be some comfort in store for the slandered profession; the lawyers of that century will at least be saved that study which so many of them in the present age find so troublesome. Precedents will have accumulated to such an extent that the bewildered legalist will with sincerity exclaim, "Bring me no more reports."

The physician will look back on the thousand triumphs of his science in our time, and mourn that there are no laurels left for him to win. And even the clergyman will (perhaps unwittingly) rouse the feelings of his hearers in the same language and in the same sentences that every Sabbath brings to our hearing.

I leave the rest of their misfortunes to the imagination of my readers. Perhaps they may think that I have but too clearly proved in this essay that the deficiency of ideas has already made its appearance.

Albany, June, 1829.

The following article, which we take from the London Mirror, was written after reading the essay on WINE DRINKING, which was extracted into the Record, from Brande's Journal, some weeks since. WINE, we believe, is not a proscribed liquor, even with the Temperate Society, and if it were, "equal and exact justice" would require that we should hear its defence. We hate proscription, it is so anti-masonick.

WINE.

The article appears to have been written with a view of inducing a more frequent use of that wholesome and invigorating beverage by adducing a host of respectable names of antiquity. But I am somewhat inclined to believe, that notwithstanding the classic lore and learned style in which the article appears, that many there are, whose adverse temper, and whom the present "march of intellect" has so far rendered callous to authoritative conviction, that they still remain scepticks of the extraordinary good qualities and virtues, which the ancients believed this beverage to contain; only because they have thought fit to adhere to the common adage, that no opinion ought to be received upon men's authority, without a sufficient reason assigned for its correctness. It is with this view of the subject then, that I venture to make the few following observations. In the first place, we will briefly consider the nature and chemical properties of wines, and their tendency and action upon the constitution.

The characteristic ingredient of all wines is alcohol, the proportion and quality of which, and the state and combination in which it exists, constitute the essential properties of the numerous kinds of wines. The colour of the red wines is produced from the husk of the grape, they being used during fermentation; on the contrary, the colourless wines are those where the husk of the grape is not used during the process of fermentation. The colouring matter produced from the husks is highly astringent, consequently the red and white wines are very different in their qualities, and very different in their effect on the stomach.

All wines contain more or less acid; for British wines are considered less salubrious than those of foreign, from their having an excess of malick acid, which our fruits contain. The foreign wines are reckoned superiour in quality, in consequence of their containing an excess of tartarick acid, their fruit containing a greater portion of this acid than does ours. Wines during fermentation, if improperly managed, will produce acetick acid, which will greatly deteriorate their quality.

Various have been the opinions of eminent men on the effects of wine upon the constitution. It would be needless to enter into a detailed account of all those who have written for or against its utility; the following from a modern eminent writer against the use of wines will suffice, and serve to show that the opponents to wine-drinking have at least some reason on their side. Mr. Beddoes, states, in his "Hygeia," vol. ii, p. 35, that an ingenious surgeon tried the following experiment:—He gave two of his children for a week alternately after dinner, to the one a full glass of sherry, and to the other a large China orange; the effects that followed were sufficient to prove the injurious tendency of vinous liquors. In the one the pulse was quickened, the heat increased; whilst the other had every appearance that indicated high health; the same effect followed when the experiment was reversed. This certainly is a formidable objection, but let us before drawing a final conclusion, examine the opposite arguments.

Wines, and, indeed, all fermented liquors have an antiseptick quality. They are in direct opposition to putrefaction, and in proportion to the quantity of alcohol which they contain, so will be their value and beneficial tendency. Now the circulating fluids of our system have a continual tendency to putrefaction; and the food we take, both animal and vegetable, tends to produce this effect; if, therefore, something of an antiseptick nature, or of a nature in direct opposition to this principle be not received, the fluids would ultimately become a mass of corruption, with the extinction of life. If we meet with an individual whose habits are abstemious, as regards the drinking of wines or fermented liquors, we generally discover him to have a great predilection for that valuable commodity salt, which article being in its nature antiseptick, answers the same purpose as wine. Therefore, the labouring man, whose narrow circumstances prohibit him from the advantage of a daily use of wine, by taking with his food a sufficient quantity of salt, and his apportioned quantity of malt liquor, retains his vigour and strength of body equally with those whose more ample means render them capable of acquiring the necessary quantity of wine daily. Doctor Barry mentions an experiment made on a soldier, who was hired to live entirely for some days on wild fowl,* with water only to drink; he received in the beginning his reward and diet with great cheerfulness, but this was soon succeeded by nausea, thirst, and disposition to putrid dysentery, which was with some difficulty prevented from making further progress, by the physician who made the experiment. Again he remarks, "I knew a person who, by the advice of his physician, abstained for some years entirely from salt, drank chiefly water, and used freely an animal diet, and by that means acquired a violent scurvy; he was, after some time, relieved by a strict regimen of diet and medicine, and as he afterwards used salt and vegetables with animal food, and drank wine more freely, never had a return of the disorder." It is therefore evident, that a moderate use of wine tends to promote health, and keeps off the numerous train of disorders, to which the constitution of man is subject, thereby lessening the evils incidental to human nature. We can then exclaim with Virgil of wine,

*It must be recollected that wild fowl in consequence of their living on animal diet, give more readily a putrid disposition to the fluids

INDEPENDENCE.

"INDEPENDENCE!" it's the word, of all others, that Irish—men, women, and children—least understand; and the calmness, or rather indifference, with which they submit to dependence, bitter and miserable as it is, must be a source of deep regret to all who "love the land," or who feel anxious to uphold the dignity of human kind. Let us select a few cases from our Irish village—such as are abundant in every neighbourhood. Shane Thurlough, "as dacent a boy," and Shane's wife, as "clane skinned a girl," as any in the world. There is Shane, an active, handsome looking fellow, leaning over the half-door of his cottage, kicking a hole in the wall with his brogue, and piking up all the large gravel within his reach, to pelt the ducks with—those useful Irish scavengers. Let us speak to him. "Good morrow Shane!" "Och! the bright bames of heaven on ye every day! and kindly welcome, my lady—and wont ye step in and rest—it's powerful hot, and a beautiful summer, sure—the Lord be praised!" "Thank you, Shane. I thought you were going to cut the hay-field to day—if a heavy shower comes, it will be spoiled; it has been fit for the sithe these two days." "Sure, it's all owing to that thief o' the world, Tom Parel, my lady. Did n't he promise me the loan of his sithe; and, by the same token, I was to pay him for it; and depending on that, I did n't buy one, which I have been threatening to do for the last two years." "But why don't you go to Carrick and purchase one?" "To Carrick!—Och, 't is a good step to Carrick, and my toes are on the ground, (saving your presence,) for I depended on Tim Jarvis to tell Andy Cappler, the brogue-maker, to do my shoes; and, bad luck to him, the spalpeen! he forgot it." "Where's your pretty wife, Shane?" "She's in all the woe o' the world, Ma'am dear. And she puts the blame of it on me, though I'm not in the fault this time, any how, the child's taken the small pock, and she depended on me to tell the doctor to cut it for the cow pock, and I depended on Kitty Cackle, the limmer, to tell the doctor's own man, and thought she would not forget it, because the boy's her bachelor—but out o' sight out o' mind—the never a word she told him about it, and the baby has got it nataral, and the woman's in heart trouble (to say nothing o' myself;)—and it the first, and all." "I am very sorry, indeed, for you have got a much better wife than most men." "That's a true word, my lady—only she's fidgetty like sometimes; and says I don't hit the nail on the head quick enough, and she takes a dale more trouble than she need about many a thing." "I do not think I ever saw Ellen's wheel without flax before, Shane?" "Bad cess to the wheel!—I got it this morning about that too—I depended on John Williams to bring the flax from O'Flaherty's, this day week, and he forgot it; and she says I ought to have brought it myself, and I close to the spot: but where's the good? says I, sure he'll bring it next time." "I suppose, Shane, you will soon move into the new cottage, at Clurn Hill. I passed it to-day, and it looked so cheerful; and when you get there, you must take Ellen's advice, and depend solely on yourself." "Och, Ma'am dear, don't mention it—sure it's that makes me so down in the mouth, this very minit. Sure I saw that born blackguard, Jack Waddy, and he comes in here, quite innocent like—'Shane, you've an eye to the Squire's new lodge,' says he. May be I have, says I. 'I am y'er man,' says he. How so, says I. 'Sure I'm as good as married to my lady's maid,' said he; and I'll spake to the Squire for you, my own self.' The blessing be about you, says I, quite grateful—and we took a strong cup on the strength of it; and depending on him, I thought all safe,—and what d'ye think, my lady! Why, himself stalks into the place—talked the Squire over, to be sure—and without so much as by y'er lave, sates himself and his new wife on the laase in the house; and I may go whistle." "It was a great pity, Shane, that you didn't go yourself to Mr. Clurn." "That's a true word for ye, Ma'am dear, but it's hard if a poor man can n't have a friend to depend on."

From the London New Monthly Magazine;

THE ACTOR.

Perhaps Fortune does not buffet any set of beings with more industry, and withal less effect, than Actors. There may be something in the habitual mutability of their feelings that evades the blow; they live, in a great measure, out of this dull sphere, "which men call earth;" they assume the dress, the tone, the gait of emperours, kings, nobles; the world slides, and they mark it not. The Actor leaves his home, and forgets every domestic exigence in the temporary government of a state, or overthrow of a tyrant; he is completely out of the real world until the dropping of the curtain. The time likewise not spent on the stage is passed in preparation for the night; and thus the shafts of fate glance from our Actor like swan-shot from an elephant. If struck at all, the barb must pierce the bones, and quiver in the marrow.

Our Actor—mind, we are speaking of players in the mass—is the most joyous, careless, superficial flutterer in existence. He knows every thing; yet has learned nothing; he has played at ducks and drakes over every rivulet of information, yet never plunged inch-deep into any thing beyond a play-book, or Joe Miller's jests. If he venture a scrap of Latin, be sure there is among his luggage a dictionary of quotations; if he speaks of history,—why he has played in Richard and Coriolanus. The stage is with him the fixed orb around which the whole world revolves; there is nothing worthy of a moment's devotion one hundred yards from the green-room. It is amusing to perceive how blind, how dead, is our real Actor to the stir and turmoil of politics; he will turn from a Salamanca to admire a Sir John Brute's wig; Waterloo sinks into insignificance before the amber-headed cane of a Sir Peter Teazle. What is St. Stephen's to him—what the memory of Burke and Chatham? To be sure, Sheridan is well remembered; but then Sheridan wrote the Critic.

A mackerel lives longer out of water than does an Actor out of his element: he cannot, for a minute, "look abroad into universality." Keep him to the last edition of a new or old play, the burning of the two theatres, or an anecdote of John Kemble, and our Actor sparkles amazingly. Put to him an unprofessional question, and you strike him dumb; an abstract truth locks his jaws. On the contrary, listen to the stock-joke; lend an attentive ear to the witticism clubbed by the whole green-room—for there is rarely more than one at a time in circulation—and no man talks faster—none with a deeper delight to himself—none more profound, more knowing. The conversation of our Actor is a fine "piece of mosaic." Here Shakspeare is laid under contribution—here Farquhar—here Otway. We have an undigested mass of quotations, dropping without order from him. In words he is absolutely impoverishable. What a lion he stalks in a country town! How he stilts himself upon his jokes over the sleek, unsuspecting heads of his astonished hearers! He tells a story; and, for the remainder of the night, sits embosomed in the ineffable lustre of his humour.

THE SPANISH LANGUAGE.

In the most ancient times, and in ages anterior to the entrance of the Romans, the language spoken in Spain was the Celtiberian; but in the towns on the sea-coasts, wherein were planted colonies from Tyre and Carthage, the Phenician and Punic tongues prevailed, incontestible proofs of both we have on their coins which have reached us.

* * * * * At length the Roman policy and language prevailed, with their dominion, over the Spanish mints and publick monuments.

* * * * * The residence of the Arabs in Spain, during seven centuries, insensibly added numbers of Moorish proper names to the Spanish orthography; from these sources is composed the elegant idiom spoken over the greatest part of Spain called "La Lengua Castellana," and which, in many respects, approaches nearer to the Latin tongue than even the Italian.

Before the establishment of the house of Bourbon on the throne of Spain, their language was always esteemed a necessary and elegant accomplishment of the English nobility.

The best Spanish Grammar and Dictionary ever published in England, was composed in 1699, by John Minshew, a professed teacher of the Spanish tongue in London, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth; why the Italian language should have since so prevailed in this country, as almost to obliterate the Spanish, may be accounted for by the constant resort of our gentry into Italy, where the mildness of its governments and the interesting objects of its Roman antiquities have constantly allured them; perhaps, likewise, the inimitable compositions of a Petrarch, the enchanting music of their Theatres, and the divine melody of a Metastasio may have enticed our literati to study, and fill their libraries with Italian books. Sure I am that the Spanish language is equally worthy of their attention; and to those who understand it thoroughly, it will be found full as soft, more comprehensive, manly and florid, without the eternal flatness of accent which renders the Italian so peculiarly adapted to the notes of music.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

To Correspondents. "The Misanthrope and the Youth," by Q. and "Stanzas," by CAMPBELL, shall be inserted next week. We render our thanks to them, and to H. and FRANCIS. They will at all times be more than welcome.

According to the Almanack, the FOURTH OF JULY will happen on Saturday next. It is the general opinion that it will come and go very peaceably; and the notion of hard times has so firm a hold of men's brains, that we are inclined to the same way of thinking. Much of the pomp and circumstance of war, we believe, is not prognosticated by any one. Men's blood is done leaping in their veins on the approach of the day, and there seems to be more labour than glory in its celebration.

Solomon Southwick, who sometime since became anti-masonick missionary, as we at the time duly informed our readers, has got into a pretty considerable business in that line, which we suppose is tolerably profitable for these hard times. He held forth, one day last week, somewhere in Schoharie county; and on the 24th instant, was at it again in Washington county. A few days since he entered into an engagement with the anti to make his first appearance at Hudson, in the Methodist Meeting House, on the anniversary of our national independence: it appears, however, that in this instance the wonder of the nineteenth century calculated without his host, as the following extract from the Hudson Gazette satisfactorily testifies:

To the Editor of the Hudson Gazette:

Sir—It appears from a notice in your paper of last week, that there is to be a meeting held in the Methodist Church, on the fourth of July, for the purpose of disapproving of all secret societies. This is to give notice to the inhabitants of Hudson, and its vicinity, that the doors of the Methodist Church will not be opened for any such purpose.

By Order of the Trustees.

Hudson, June 20, 1829.

Even the wisdom of Solomon is not infallible. It is now said the indefatigable gentleman has become wrathly with Hudson, and resolved to harrangue the fashionables at Saratoga Springs, on the Fourth.

Anti-masonry is making headway in something of an Irish fashion. Giddens' anti-masonick reading room in the village of Rochester, is shut up; the pious Mr. Greene's establishment of the same character, in the village of Batavia, is also shut up; the Madison Farmer, a "whole hog" anti concern, is stopt; the New-York Beacon, the Rev. H. D. Ward's glory and consequence, is also stopt; parson Strong's Hartford Anti-Masonick Intelligencer is suspended; the Boston Free Press moaned pitiously and pitifully over its condition, a week or two since, and will without doubt shortly be also suspended: the Palmyra Freeman half stopped, for some weeks past; and as for the National Observer, Solmon is getting to be so harmless, that the paper must ere long die of debility.

As an evidence that the "excitement" is gaining ground wonderfully in the city of New-York, it is stated that several persons, all of whom were suspected of being anti-masons, were lately taken to the Almshouse in a state of mental derangement. It is not said whether Mr.  and the Rev. H. D. Ward were among the number.

For the American Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

The masonick oaths do not then impose any moral obligation on those who take them. And I apprehend that no man believes that they do. For even masons will overreach each other in trade, contend with each other for offices, and murder each other in duels, notwithstanding their masonick oaths.

[Corres. North Star.]

Those who do not belong to the masonick institution have no means of judging it, except by the representations of its friends or enemies, who have been, or are still members. Allowing the above to be correct, may we not inquire, whence this excitement against the institution?

Let us allow, for the sake of argument, or even, if you please, because it is the case, that masons are under an obligation to protect each other, right or wrong, "murder and treason not excepted;" yet "no man believes that this obligation is morally binding;" consequently no one is influenced by it; and however much we may condemn the folly of receiving or imposing such an obligation, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing," yet here, according to the above concession, the folly ends. Admitting the above to be correct, we should rationally expect that honourable men would be opposed to the masonick institution, but we should expect them to oppose it as a "mere nothing," not calculated to produce any beneficial effect on community. We should not expect, however, to see them withdraw their confidence from those masons, who had been tried and found faithful. In fine, we should not expect to see political anti-masonry rearing its ghastly head at the ballot boxes, or denouncing a Clay, a Jackson, a Webster, or a Clinton, because they were masons, as unworthy the confidence of the people.

"Facts are stubborn things." Facts prove that masons have frequently been politically opposed to each other. And even the North Star correspondent stated no more than the truth, when he declared that they sometimes "overreach each other in trade, contend with each other for offices, and murder each other in duels." To their disgrace as men and masons be it spoken. But as one undeniable fact is better than ten thousand fine spun theories, have we not seen masons filling offices of honour and profit with credit to themselves and honour to the state? Did Hancock preside over our provincial congress, during our revolutionary struggle with Great Britain, with less dignity and ability, because he was a mason? Was Washington less virtuous, less republican, or less attached to the cause of the people? Was La Fayette less enthusiastic in the cause of liberty, because he was attached to the "republican monster Free-Masonry?" If all these questions must be answered in the negative, why then this antimasonick proscription?

I am no mason, nor advocate for masonry; but while life remains shall always continue the undaunted advocate of

EQUAL RIGHTS.

THEATRE. Mr. Pelby, one of the best actors upon the American boards, has played in this city a few nights during the present week. He made his first appearance in Hamlet, on Wednesday evening. We are sorry to say the house was not such as it should have been. The play was well sustained throughout, and we think that the acting of Mr. Pelby has left an impression upon the minds of those who witnessed it that will not be easily eradicated. Mr. Duffy played Laertes with his usual energy and excellence. Ophelia could scarcely have had a better representative than Mrs. Jefferson. Last evening Mr. Pelby appeared in the character of Brutus; Mrs. Pelby personated Tullia. We were not present.

Of Jefferson it is unnecessary to speak, farther than to say we believe his second engagement is nearly fulfilled. His acting, though in one sense always the same, has no sameness in it.

Forbes improves rapidly, and bids fair to be a most excellent actor. He sustained the character of the Duke Aranza, in the Honey Moon, on Thursday evening, with much credit.

Forrest met with a serious accident on Monday evening, during the performance of the drama of Blood for Blood. By using a real instead of a false dagger, he inflicted a wound on himself which created apprehensions for his life; we are happy to learn, however, that he is now considered beyond danger.

Those who really wish well to the drama, should bear in mind that their encouragement would be well timed, if bestowed at present, and in good earnest.

The Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland, adjourned its annual session on Saturday last. Another unsuccessful attempt was made to elect a successor to Bishop Kemp. The principal candidates were Mr. Johns and Mr. Wyatt.

"HARD TIMES." A Troy paper states that there are several boats at Whitehall, loaded with lumber, "which cannot come through the Champlain Canal for want of money to pay the canal toll."

REVOLUTIONARY BATTLES. The following table may be useful for occasional references:

Battle of Concord, April 20,	1775
Battle of Bunker Hill, June 17,	1775
Battle of Old Hampton, Va. where we took 5 decked vessels, some time in November,	1775
Battle of Great Bridge, near Norfolk, Va. December 18,	1775
Battle of Fort Washington, 17th November,	1776
Battle of Fort Lee, 19th November,	1776
Battle of Trenton, when Gen. Washington and his Army took one thousand Hessians, &c. 26th December,	1776
Battle of Princetown, 2d January,	1777
Battle of Brandywine, 11th September,	1777
Battle of Germantown, 4th October,	1777
Burgoyne's army taken near Saratoga, 17th October,	1777
Battle of the Red Banks, October 22,	1777
Battle of Monmouth, June 28,	1778
Battle of Stony Point, 16th July,	1779
Battle of Long Island, 27th of August,	1779
Cornwallis and his army taken at York Town, Va. October 12,	1781
Battle of King's Mountain, I think some time in October,	1781
Battle of Guilford, N. C. 16th March,	1781

Professor Eaton, in the last number of Siliman's American Journal of Science, has shown that five is the most favourite number of nature. He says at least half of all known plants have the parts of fructification in fives, or in a number which is the product of five. The radiated division of animals, such as the sea star, medusa's head, and every species of coral rock have their rays in fives or in a number produced by some product of five. Throughout the whole vertebral division of Cuvier, five is the leading number. We have five fingers to the hand, and five toes to the foot, in common with most animals which are provided with organs for suckling their young. We have five senses—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, and feeling; and Prof. Eaton further says that there are five principles constituting the highest order of vertebral animals, to wit, man. 1. Inert matter. 2. The attractive principle. 3. The living principle. 4. The sentient principle. 5. The intellectual principle.

ITEMS.

The Alexandria Gazette remarks that the year 1829 has been fruitful in remarkable events. In this year General Jackson became President of the United States—the Catholic Emancipation Bill passed the House of Parliament—one of the most splendid and ancient Cathedrals in Europe was burned—a most destructive earthquake occurred in Spain—and one of the most awful accidents, the blowing up of the Fulton, has occurred in this country. The above is a meagre list of the remarkables that have distinguished this year thus far.

Spain, as she now is, is an example how far the most felicitous combination of nature's best gifts may be counteracted by heavy oppression—how far the energy of a lofty national character may be borne down and depressed by a gloomy superstition, and its virtues and enterprise exhausted by the heavy despotism which has brooded over a people originally generous and noble.

A French paper states that a patent has been taken out in Paris for a new coach, with one wheel only; capable of accommodating from 30 to 40 passengers.

Some revolutionary symptoms are said to have made their appearance in France. There seem to have been excitations in several towns, and agitations in the Chambers of Deputies.

A society of lads has been formed in Providence with a view of suppressing profane swearing.

The Boston Statesman says that one of its contemporaries lately observed of a new work, "we have given it a nasty perusal!" Hasty "he would have said."

ANTI-MASONRY.

THE WHISKER CASE. The trial of the indictment against Luther Tucker and Henry O'Reilly, for the publication (in the Rochester Daily Advertiser and Republican) of an alleged libel on Thurlow Weed, one of the Morgan Committee, relative to the means by which the whiskers and hair of Timothy Monroe were pulled for the apparent purpose of making that corpse resemble the body of Capt. Morgan, is again postponed, notwithstanding yesterday (Monday) was assigned by the District Attorney for trial. The defendants were fully ready for trial last fall; but the Judge (Cowan) refused to try it, notwithstanding the heavy expense to which they were subjected in procuring the attendance of witnesses, some from a distance of 200 miles. The defendants had also taken all the preparatory measures for trial at this Court; but it seems that the persons who were most active in procuring the indictment against them, are now, for some reason or other, determined to defer the investigation into the subject-matter of the alleged libel.

[Rochester Republican, June 16.]

EDWARD GIDDINS. It is often asked why Giddins the anti-masonick almanack maker, is not indicted. He confesses that he was Morgan's jailer for several days—and a hard-hearted and brutal jailer he was. While he carried Morgan his victuals in one hand, Giddins held a loaded pistol in the other—ready to blow out Morgan's brains if he offered any resistance. Yet this wretch is permitted to "go unwhipped of justice," and to enrich himself by retailing the story of his own infamy! He enjoys the special favour of the Morgan committee, and fattens on the credulity of the anti-masonick party!!! What candour or honesty can be expected from men who denounce a whole fraternity as conspirators and murderers, while they themselves protect and cherish the wretch who stands self-convicted of crimes which should damn him to infamy and the gallows? Giddins' renunciation of masonry is seemingly considered a sufficient panacea for all his crimes! Such are the "beauties of anti-masonry!" [Ibid.]

ANTI-SOCIETIES. The editor of the Harrisburgh Chronicle thinks it would not be surprising if, before the dog days are over, we shall have anti-canal meetings and excitement. He has a recollection of the time when the excitement was directed against the Lawyers—and another editor wonders why an Anti-going to sleep with a candle burning Society has not been organized for the purpose of putting out the practice of reading in bed by candle light. [Ibid.]

Whiskerando is snivelling at the removal of Bates Cook from the Lewistown post office. He says Bates "is a man in whom ALL the human virtues may be summed up!!" If Bates is as modest as he is "happy," he would rather have his whiskers shaved than be rendered ridiculous by such bombastick puffery. [Ibid.]

Another "great fool," (according to Mr. Cadwallader D. Colden's doctrine) has renounced masonry—no less a personage than the Rev. Joshua Bradley, and the anti's are in ecstasies on the occasion. They are welcome to him. His exertions of late years appear to have been principally directed to getting all the money he could from the masonick brethren, and having, as we know, been foiled in his attempt to get the handling of all the masonick funds in this state, he has now, Arnold like, gone over to the enemy. One of two designs he undoubtedly has in view; either to start an anti-masonick party in Kentucky, (where he now resides,) at the head of which he intends to place himself, or he thinks this will recall him to Genesee county, to which place he has sent his renunciation to be first published. Every person who has seen the man, knows his excessive vanity, and will in this case at least respond to Mr. Colden's doctrine quoted above. [Fredonia Censor.]

C. D. COLDEN. "Indeed I have never known a very great mason, who was not a very great fool," says Mr. C. D. Colden. But his conscience stung him after he had penned the words, and he "begs to be understood." So, to save appearances, he excepts Washington, Clinton, Warren, La Fayette, Franklin, R. R. Livingston, Jackson, Marshall, and many venerated Clergymen, and means "by great masons, those who are proud of their pompous titles; who are fond of decorations," &c. Now, reader, when you reflect how proud the "Hon." C. D. Colden was of the title of Mayor—how fond of decorations in the way of equipage—and combine this with the acknowledged fact that he has held "very high masonick offices and honours"—it will be strange indeed if you do not perceive one instance at least, and perhaps the only one, in which a very great mason is a very great fool. [Ulster Sentinel.]

It is laughable to see how the anti's treat Mr. Colden's letter. When they touch upon what he says of the good and evil of the institution, they wag their tails right merrily; but when they come to that part where he says the masons generally were ignorant and innocent of the abduction of Morgan, and that the institution has never been used for political purposes, they sheer off, and go on the other side, or caution their readers not to believe this part. How very wise, consistent and commendable this is.

MORE INDICTMENTS. The Grand Jury which were in session in this village last week, closed their labours by pre-sending four indictments to the court against the following individuals—William R. Thompson, Nathan Follett, William Seaver, Jr. and Blanchard Powers. Eli Bruce was brought from Canandaigua jail to this village, on a habeas corpus, as a witness before the Grand Jury; but refusing to kiss the book, he was immediately taken back.

[Batavia Times.]

SOUTHWICKIANA. Solomon says in his last Observer, that masons "can better bear to be called knaves than fools," preferring the compliment to the head at the expense of the heart. Solomon does not say which of the appellations, he himself prefers. We insist that he shall have his choice, unbiassed by public opinion.

MARRIED.

At Hillsdale, Columbia co. on the 12th inst by the Rev. Timothy Woodbridge, DAVID L. FARNHAM, esq. of Enosburg, Vt. to Miss HANNAH COLLIN, daughter of David Collin.

Communicated for the Amer. Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

OBITUARY.

Departed this life on the 24th ult. in Hamilton, Monroe county, Mississippi, NATHANIEL B. BUCKINGHAM, Jr. in the 24th year of his age, of a typhus fever, after a long and painful illness which he bore with uncommon fortitude. The deceased was a young man of prepossessing manners, and of promising talents, an amiable disposition, a dutiful son, and an affectionate brother; besides which he has left numerous friends, who were most fondly attached to him, in the deepest affliction, to mourn his untimely death, for here "on earth we are in the midst of death." His remains were interred on the day following, at Columbus, with masonick honours, attended by a large concourse of citizens, who came to pay the last sad tribute to him they loved so much.

Sure 'tis a curse, which angry fates impose,
To mortify man's arrogance, that those,
Who are fashioned of some better sort of clay,
Much sooner than the common herb decay.

LADIES' MAGAZINE conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, 41 Washington-st. Boston—and by Bourne, at the Depository of Arts, 359 Broadway, New-York, & Thomas T. Ash, 130 Chestnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 50 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 600 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusion of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history and its character, and manners of its inhabitants, which Americans of either sex should be careful to acquire. But so sectional prejudices shall be admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the public, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

When the pulse now beating in life's full commotion,
And the heart that has ever to love owned devotion,
Shall be each laid at rest in eternity's sleep,
That slumber so lasting so awfully deep—

O, then will there ever the form of one bend
O'er the low humble mound where reposes her friend?
A friend who e'er found while on earth he remained
That in her guileless heart all his bliss was contained.

Will she come at the hour of witching twilight,
When the moon from on high beams resplendantly bright,
And will she remember—that future we drew
When of life and its troubles 'twas little we knew?

Ah! those, loveliest girl, were hours of sunshine;
We knew not, we feared not, the finger of Time;
We knew that we loved—were beloved, and therefore
We surely were happy,—and what would we more!

But this world and its troubles my spirit have broke!
That spirit so proudly compared to the oak
Has sank to the blast!—and this world I must leave
To answer that summons that grants no reprieve.

And thy placid temper the storm has outrode
That thy Lover has sent to his last long abode!
O horror! and must I then leave thee alone
In this wide wicked world, unprotected, unknown?

But calmed be my fears, thou 'rt not friendless, my love;
The God of the orphan a Father will prove;
O, then, bow thee submissive, and kiss the hard rod,
Or lean on the kind staff of an unerring God.

'Tis found in a desert, dark, dismal, and drear,
Is always in danger, but never in fear.
It presides over dungeons, and yet strange to tell,
Has never been known in a prison to dwell.
A baleful effect it produces on earth,
Like the hot sun of summer, it causes a dearth.
It can't be alive, for 'tis wanting in breath,
And, unknown to the living, is first seen in death.

Rolled up the veiling cannon smoke—
 A burthen on the air;
 It steamed before the setting sun—
 'Till the battle-field lay bare;
 It streamed against the setting sun,
 And caught its tinge of red,
 And poised upon its bloody wing,
 O'ershadowing the dead.

Rang out the earnest clash of steel
In mortal trial, yet,
Wherever on that flooded field,
The eyes of fœmen met;
And heavily in the distance
Pealed the unfrequent gun—
A banner flashed, or a lance shot up
In the pathway of the sun.

And ghastly in the daylight
A thousand faces shone,
And quivered many a trodden form
Where life yet lingered on.
Gray hairs lay steeped in slaughter,
The cheek of youth was pale,
And manhood's breast of iron
Heaved not beneath its mail.

Fearful! Oh, very fearful!
Is the sight of slaughtered men—
The rayless eye—the trampled heart,
Where the battle steed has been;
Yet who is she who steals among
These wrecks of being now?
A timid form—with trembling step,
And obscure glint and brow.

bon on the throne of :

What seeks she on a spot like this.
So burthened with the dead?
The red soil of the battle field,
Is not for woman's tread.
How fearfully she gazes
On the still dark faces near!
And bendeth o'er the fallen
With a shudder and a tear!

Dawn burst upon the darkness—
 Out shone the morning sun,
 Uprising o'er the same pale forms
 Its light went down upon.
 Where was that evening wanderer?
 Who with light and fearful tread
 Had stolen o'er that ghastly field,
 Like an angel to the dead?
 Had she not sought her fallen chief,
 Through the cruel wrecks of war
 The morning found her by his side,
 As pale—but lovelier far.
 Oh, love, how deep and passionate
 Thy hold on woman's heart;
 Far happier with the loved to die,
 Than live and mourn apart.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Doest thou idly ask to hear
At what gentle seasons
Nymphs relent, when lovers near Press the tenderest reasons?
Ah! they give their faith too oft
To the careless wooer;
Maidens' hearts are always soft—
Would that men's were truer!

Woo the fair-one when around
Early birds are singing;
When o'er all the fragrant ground
Early herbs are springing.
When the brook-side, bank, and grove,
All with blossoms laden,
Shine with beauty, breathe of love,
Woo the timid maiden.

Woo her when with rosy blush
Summer eve is sinking;
When on rills that softly gush
Stars are softly winking;
When through boughs that knit the bower,
Moonlight gleams are stealing:
Woo her till the gentle hour,
Wakes a gentler feeling.

Woe her when autumnal dies
Tinge the woody mountain;
When the drooping foliage lies
In the half-choked fountain.
Let the scene that tells how fast
Youth is passing over,
Warn her ere her bloom is past
To secure her lover.

Woo her when the north winds call
At the lattice nightly;
When within the cheerful hall
Blaze the faggots brightly.
While the wintry tempest round
Sweeps the landscape hoary,
Sweeter in her ear shall sound
Love's delightful story.

The billows run along in gold
Over the yielding main,
And when upon the shore unrolled,
They gather up again;
They get themselves a diff'rent form,
These children of the wind,
And, or in sunlight, or in storm,
Leave the green land behind.

Life's billows on life's changing sea
Come alway to Death's shore,
Some with a calm content, and free,
Some with a hollow roar;
They break and are no longer seen,
Yet still defying time,
Divided, and of different mien,
They roll from clime to clime.

All water courses find the main;
The main sinks back to earth;
Life settles in the grave--again
The grave hath life and birth:

Flowers bloom above the sleeping dust,
Grass grows from scattered clay;
And thus from death the spirit must
To life find back its way.

Life hath its range eternally,
Like water, changing forms;
The mists go upward from the sea,
And gather into storms;
The dew and rain come down again,
To fresh the drooping land;
So doth this life exalt and wane,
And, alter, and expand.

From Mrs H. C. Loden's Magazine, for June.

Far in a beauteous Isle which rose
An emerald in a chrystal sea,
Her home a lovely sea-nymph chose,
Where all was flowers and melody.
Her features wore a youthful smile,
No tear bedewed her cheek so fair,
No winter chilled her happy Isle,
Nor sorrow marked its footstep there.
An angel oft, in light arrayed,
Came down to bless the sea-nymph's home,
And oft he warned the favoured maid,
Across the waters ne'er to roam;
But every vale and every hill
With safety she might wander o'er;
And there content and cautious still,
She promised to avoid the shore.
Yet once, upon a tempting eve,
She sported near the silver tide;
Then rashly dared the bank to leave,
And far across the waters glide.
Night came with storms—the shore was lost—
No angel smoothed the troubled main—
And helpless mid the billows tost,
She never found her Isle again.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1829.

NO. 23.

MASONICK RECORD.

From the Batavia Times.

To the Rev. JOSHUA BRADLEY, of Louisville, Kentucky.

Sir—Your renunciation of Freemasonry which has of late appeared in some of the anti-masonick papers in this quarter, is deserving of some small notice. Not on account of any surprise it may have created in the mind of any of the brotherhood—because those who have been best acquainted with you, view the course you have taken as according perfectly with your character.

But that the publick may have a fair opportunity of judging of you correctly, I have thought proper to notice a few things in your renunciation, and to compare them with some of your masonick writings. You say, "I never had a thought that masonry was religion." I would ask you to turn your attention to a book written by you, entitled "Some of the Beauties of Freemasonry"—page 12, where you acknowledge our principles to be drawn from revelation. Page 17, "Here, without molesting the peaceful abodes of any, we cordially unite our talents—raise a fund for the indigent worthy brother, the widow and the orphan, and bow our knees before the Father of lights; beseeching him to make us his sons—to keep us from the contaminating principles of selfishness, and to enable us to spread our arms as extensively as possible to deliver our brethren from calamity, their connexions from penury, and the whole world from darkness and condemnation." Now, sir, will you say that that system which has its origin in divine revelation has no religion in it—and will you say that an institution has no religion in it whose members are taught by its glorious precepts to bow the knee before the Father of lights, humbly imploring his mercy that he would permit them to become his sons—that he would enable them to be instrumental in alleviating suffering humanity, and that the whole world might be delivered from darkness and condemnation. Page 48—49, "The united effects of christianity and genuine masonry are ever productive of the best society." Hence masonry becomes the handmaid of christianity, from which it draws its principles, and Mr. Bradley denies there being any religion in masonry. "It teaches those great and awful truths on which futurity is founded, and points to the means by which we may obtain the rewards of virtue." "And whatsoever we promise, religiously to perform." Has Mr. Bradley been sincere in saying that he never thought there was any religion in masonry? Let the world give the answer. Page 156, "Let it not be supposed that you have here laboured in vain, and spent your strength for nought, for your work is with the Lord, and your recompense with your God." "Finally, brethren, be ye all of one mind, live in peace, and may the God of love and peace delight to dwell with and bless you."

Here Mr. Bradley says that the mason's work is with the Lord; and that his recompense is with his God; and that the God of peace and love will delight to dwell with and bless him—and then says, "I never thought there was any religion in masonry."

Again, "Thou hast promised that where two or three are gathered together in thy name, thou wilt be in the midst of them and bless them."

"In thy name we assemble; most humbly beseeching thee to bless all our undertakings, that we may know and serve thee aright; and that all our actions may tend to thy glory, and to our advancement in knowledge and virtue."

I think Mr. Bradley had better return to Newport, R. I., where he first settled in the ministry, and there inform them that the doctrine which he had promulgated among them and elsewhere, in his preaching, was false; and that although the Gospel said that "Where two or three are met together in my name" &c., that the actual meeting of men agreeably to the words of our Saviour would be no evidence of any religion in the church. I will here transcribe parts of a number of paragraphs which Mr. B. has introduced into his book, which may be found from page 164 to 172—"May we be active under thy divine light, and dwell in thy truth—enable us to be faithful to thee—Take us under the shadow of thy protection, and to thy service and glory may we consecrate our hearts—May we always have faith in thee, and hope in salvation."—"Formed as thy temple, and enriched with thy wisdom, we look up to thee to inspire us with understanding, with science, with virtue, with all that can dignify, refine, and exalt our nature and render the temple at least not wholly unworthy of its sacred inhabitant." "May brotherly love and charity always abound among us, and when we have finished our work here below let our transition be from this earthly tabernacle to the heavenly temple above—there among thy jewels may we appear in thy glory, for ever and ever—May thy Kingdom come—may thy will be done," &c. "Especially would we at this time render thee our thanksgiving and praise for the institution." "Give us grace diligently to search thy word in the book of nature wherein the duties of our high vocation are inculcated with divine authority." "Let all our actions prove to an admiring world that our lives are sincerely dedicated to thee our God, and to the relief of our fellow creatures; and finally when we yield up our breath to thee, may we be admitted into that sublime and eternal Lodge, where happiness reigns without alloy, and where around the throne of the great Jehovah we shall sing hallelujahs to his name."

From the foregoing can any rational being believe one moment Mr. B. when he says, "I never had a thought that masonry was religion," when every temper and disposition that is necessary for the soul to possess, is expressed in those sublime ejaculations to the Author of our existence, with Mr. B.'s acknowledgment of its divine origin? I have not pretended to quote the half of those passages in Mr. B.'s book that go to show conclusively that Mr. B. did once think masonry divine. In two verses in his poetry at the close of his book, he expressly calls masonry a divine art, not less than three times. But Mr. B. may say that the composition is not his own. Granted—but he has introduced this poetry into his book as authentick—besides, to one unacquainted, the lines would appear to be his own production; for he has forgotten to let his readers know that they were borrowed. But happily for the sake of the case, we are furnished with a substantial proof that Mr. B. did once view the institution of masonry divine. In a small catch-penny work of Mr. B.'s, addressed to masons, (by which he obtained from the lodges and chapters in this state, hundreds of dollars) he says, "Here my imagination glows, and I seize and clothe myself in the vestments of one of our poets, and close my address with his dictions."

"Hail masonry divine!
Glory of ages shine."

Long mayest thou reign—
Where thy lodges stand
May they have great command,
And always grow the laud,
Thou art divine."

And the last line of the next verse is "Thou art divine." Hence it seems that there was a time when Mr. B. thought at least that the institution was divine; and of course there must be religion in it—but now he says he never believed it. How are these inconsistencies to be reconciled? Not upon any fair ground of reasoning. Mr. B. further says, "Some terms in the obligations I never liked." I would request him to look at the 14th page of that book, out of which so much has been quoted, where, speaking of the introduction of a candidate, he says, "He may be informed by those whom he can believe, that the obligation which he is to take is perfectly moral and compatible with the principles of christianity, civil society and good government." I think it would be well for Mr. Bradley to point out such part of his obligations that he does not like, which he says is perfectly moral and compatible with the principles of christianity, civil society and good government—for it may be there is some thing in morality, christianity, civil society and good government that is corrupt, which the wisdom of the honest Elder has discovered; and if so, the world ought to know it. But in the 169th page we find the Rev. gentleman giving fervent thanks to his Heavenly Father for the institution, and that he would keep the members thereof steadfast in their obligations, &c. Hear his words: "We thank thee that the few here assembled before thee have been favoured with new inducements, and laid under new and stronger obligations to virtue and holiness. May these obligations, O blessed Father, have their full effect upon us."

Will not Mr. B. shudder when he reflects on the moral depravity of human nature—that the adversary of men and goodness should prompt him to say that he did not like obligations that would lead him to virtue and holiness. Perhaps it is time for him to follow the example of his prototype—let him cry out, "I have sinned," and cast down the purchase money, &c. That declaration, "But masonry is a human, cunningly formed system of deception," does not so very well accord with the writings and publick speeches of Mr. B. and I think that in this place at least, we may well apply the old adage, that "A ——— ought to have the best memory."

But if we were to judge of masonry from the conduct of some of its members we might join with Mr. B. in many of his remarks. He has given us a long catalogue of questions to answer which is intended to implicate many of the fraternity; but he has neglected to ask some other questions of equal importance—namely:—

Who was it that wrote the book entitled "Some of the beauties of Freemasonry," which was intended as a rival to S. Webb's Monitor, a standard work throughout the union, the principal or the whole of which was copied into said book? Ans. J. Bradley. Who was it that rejected this book on account of the unprincipled conduct of its author in attempting to rival his brother in the merit due him for his labour; and also for copying one whole chapter of S. Town's "Speculative Freemasonry?" Ans. The Grand Chapter of N. Y. For this book its author received nearly $2,000. It was emblazoned with all the embellishments and true features of christianity, brotherly love, relief and truth; and for the express purpose, (if we are to believe his own words,) to make it sell well—for he says in one word that there is no religion in it. Who was it that wrote a catch-penny address to masons—the cost of which was not more than 6 cents, and sold them for 25 cents—a mere castle built in the air, and after obtaining the real object, which was cash (the amount of which was several hundred of dollars) received almost from every lodge and chapter in the state, then abandoned his visionary project and decamped to parts then unknown? Ans. J. Bradley.

The foregoing is a sad picture of the depravity of human nature. We learn from Mr. B. that for about 13 years, while ministering at the altar in holy things, that he was an active and zealous mason; endeavouring by writing and his public eulogies to make the people believe that the institution was holy. Not until a very recent date has he discovered the impropriety of secret societies; and that obligations taken in such societies are not binding, notwithstanding such obligations are (if we are to believe Mr. B.) “perfectly moral and compatible with the principles of christianity, civil society and good government.” Can an honest community render one excuse for Mr. B. for saying that he never thought there was any religion in masonry after fairly canvassing all of his writings upon the institution? No—They must say that he played the hypocrite in high style for about 13 or 14 years; or that he has told that which was not true in his renunciation.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

CELEBRATION.

Thomas Wildey, Grand Sire of the Grand Lodge of the order of Independent Odd Fellows in the United States, accompanied by the moveable committee of the G. L. of the U. S., arrived in this city on Wednesday, the 24th ult. on their quadrennial visiting tour through the Union. The members of the several lodges in the city assembled at the room of Hope Lodge, No. 3, where the G. S. was received with appropriate honours. On Thursday evening following, a splendid supper, in honour of the occasion, was served up at the United States Hotel, under the direction of a committee appointed for the purpose, to which about sixty guests, principally brethren of the order, did ample justice. After the cloth had been removed and wine substituted, the following toasts were drank:—

1. The Grand Sire of the U. S. The principles of Odd Fellowship are practically illustrated in his unceasing parental exertions to promote the advancement and prosperity of the order.

2. Our motto—“Friendship, Love and Truth.” The three links in Odd Fellowship—the fraternal tie, which binds the hand and heart to each other.

3. Hope, Philanthropic, and Clinton—the three lodges of Odd Fellows in the city. May the purity of their principles be as imperishable as their names.

4. Charity. The ruling principle of our order.

5. Odd Fellows throughout the globe. Although strangers to each other in language and country, when we meet, we welcome each other as brothers.

6. May it be the pride of every Odd Fellow, that he has a heart to feel for, and a hand to alleviate, the sufferings of his fellows.

7. Ourselves.

“Let us send round the bowl and be happy awhile—

May we never meet worse in our pilgrimage here,

Than the tear that enjoyment can gild with a smile,

And the smile that compassion can turn to a tear.”

8. Odd Fellows in America. May they never be wanting in feelings of gratitude to him,* who first planted the seeds of “Friendship, Love and Truth,” in the western hemisphere.

9. May all the odds be evened—half of the evens be odd—and both odds and evens live happy.

10. The Fair Sex. May they always find a heart in the hand of an Odd Fellow.

Several appropriate volunteers were given, but as they were not submitted in writing, they are necessarily omitted. We recollect one, however, which we think will be understood by many who do not belong to the order:

“Political Antimasonry—The odds are decidedly against it.”

*Thomas Wildey, G. S. of the G. L. of the U. S.

The festivities of the evening were peculiarly marked with that spirit of fellow-feeling which is a characteristic of the order, and nothing occurred which could be a source of after regret.

ENCAMPMENT OF ODD FELLOWS.

The Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of the state of New-York commenced its sitting on the 24th ult. and after having been in session several days, adopted such measures as were deemed best calculated to promote the welfare and increase the usefulness of the order. The Grand Sire, in conjunction with the G. L., instituted an Encampment of Patriarchs, and elected and installed their respective officers, on Saturday evening, in presence of the members of the several lodges, assembled at the spacious room of Clinton Lodge, No. 7.

The following persons were elected officers for the ensuing year:

G. M. and P. G. Russell Watts, G. P.; P. G. John O. Cole, G. H. P.; P. G. Daniel P. Marshall, S. W.; P. G. Murdock M'Pherson, S.; P. G. George Kane, J. W.; P. G. Philip Johnson, T.; P. G. Joseph Barton, G.

The G. S. accompanied by the moveable committee, left this city on Monday last, by way of New-York, for Boston.

Officers of Clinton Lodge of Odd Fellows, No. 7, elected June 26, 1829—

John F. Porter, M. N. G.; Martin Gaylord, V. G.; John Groesbeck, Warden; Isaac L. Welsh, Secretary; Roland Adams, Treasurer.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From Brogniart's Works

THE BOTANY OF THE ANTEDILUVIAN WORLD.

According to the most recent investigations of the celebrated French savant Adolphus Brogniart the son, the vegetation of the antediluvian world corresponds with the three epochs of the successive formation of the soil or surface of the earth, from the earliest times of the creation to the great flood.

To the first epoch—which is contemporary with the most ancient and most simple formation of the earth, and reaches to the appearance and configuration of the coal strata—belongs a number of plants, the structure of which is simple in the highest degree. These plants are remarkable on account of their scarcity and the extraordinary size of their dimensions. Whilst our present vegetable world numbers at least 200 different families, the above mentioned earliest stage was limited to six families. On the other hand, the ferns, which now grow but from 20 to 25 feet in length, attained at that period, an altitude from 40 to 50 feet. Brogniart is of opinion that the formation of coals, which marks the close of this period of vegetation, arose out of the destruction of the most ancient vegetable world. He considers it as an undoubted and indubitable fact, that life, on the surface of the earth, commenced with the vegetable kingdom, and that animals without vertebral spines (spinæ vertebrales) followed. The ocean probably contained not any fishes at that period.

The second epoch of this antediluvian vegetation, corresponding in a geological respect with the formation of sand stone (called gres, in French), and limestone and sands with the formation of clay, comprises, in the first place, a number of large land plants, found amongst these strata, but in too trifling a quantity to give a decisive character to the vegetation of that period, and afterwards a series of plants, found amongst limestones and their remains, especially amongst the limestone of Mount Jura. The cryptogama were predominant; but, on the other hand, not a vestige could be found of palms, or dicotyledon plants, of our times. No mammalia or viviparous animals, existed yet either on the land or in the sea. The only animals with vertebral spines were reptiles, and these differed much from the present in their spines and size; and amongst which, we must number those specific creatures, destined by nature both to fly and to swim, the plerodatyia, plesiaura, and ichtyosaura.

The third and last epoch of antediluvian vegetation, which is far more interesting than the first and second, and is distinguished from the latter by limestone formations, containing some vestiges of marine plants, corresponding with the period when the last irruptions of the water took place, betwixt which these enormous animals were engendered, the remains of which have been so accurately distinguished in modern times; such as the paleotherion, the anoplotherian, and other species, is now wholly extinct; and, after these, the antediluvian elephant and other contemporary generations of animals. The plants belonging to this period are divided into two different mountain species, one of which was formed by precipitations and sediments after the irruptions of the sea, and the other by inundations of fresh water. These plants correspond, in a great proportion, with those at present existing. The animal world attained, during this period, the highest degree of perfection, but man formed as yet no part of it.

THE REPOSITORY.

From Mr. Jefferson's Memoirs and Correspondence.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

It appearing in the course of these debates that the colonies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and South Carolina, were not yet matured for falling from the parent stem, but that they were fast advancing to that state, it was thought most prudent to wait a while for them, and to postpone the final decision to July 1st, but, that this might occasion as little delay as possible, a committee was appointed to prepare a Declaration of Independence. The committee were John Adams, Dr. Franklin, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston and myself. Committees were also appointed, at the same time, to prepare a plan of confederation for the colonies, and to state the terms proper to be proposed for foreign alliance. The committee for drawing the Declaration of Independence, desired me to do it. It was accordingly done, and being approved by them, I reported it to the House on Friday, the 28th of June, when it was read and ordered to lie on the table. On Monday, the 1st of July, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the original motion made by the delegates of Virginia, which, being again debated through the day, was carried in the affirmative by the votes of New Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia. South Carolina and Pennsylvania voted against it. Delaware had but two members present, and they were divided. The delegates from New York declared they were for it themselves, and were assured their constituents were for it; but that their instructions having been drawn near a twelvemonth before, when reconciliation was still the general object, they were enjoined by them to do nothing which should impede that object. They therefore thought themselves not justifiable in voting on either side, and asked leave to withdraw from the question; which was given them. The committee rose and reported their resolution to the House. Mr. Edward Rutledge, of South Carolina, then requested the determination might be put off to the next day, as he believed his colleagues, though they disapproved of the resolution, would then join in for the sake of unanimity. The ultimate question, whether the House would agree to the resolution of the Committee, was accordingly postponed to the next day, when it was again moved, and South Carolina concurred in voting for it. In the mean time, a third member had come post from the Delaware counties, and turned the vote of that colony in favour of the resolution. Members of a different sentiment attending from Pennsylvania also, her vote was changed, so that the whole twelve colonies who were authorized to vote at all, gave their voices for it; and, within a few days, the Convention of New York approved of it, and thus supplied the void occasioned by the withdrawing of her delegates from the vote.

Congress proceeded the same day to consider the Declaration of Independence, which had been reported and laid on the table the Friday preceding, and on Monday referred to a Committee of the whole. The pusillanimous idea that we had friends in England worth keeping terms with, still haunted the minds of many. For this reason, those passages which conveyed censures on the people of England were struck out, lest they should give them offence. The clause, too, reprobating the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa, was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it. Our northern brethren also, I believe, felt a little tender under their censures; for though their people had very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others. The debates having taken up the greater parts of the 2d, 3d, and 4th, days of July, were, on the evening of the last, closed; the Declaration was reported by the Committee, agreed to by the House, and signed by every member present except Mr. Dickinson. As the sentiments of men are known not only by what they receive, but what they reject also, I state the form of the Declaration as originally reported, &c. &c.

CITY AND COUNTRY LIFE.

Shepherd—May is a merry month, and I ken na whether the smiles or the frowns on her face be the mair beautifu'—just like a haughty damsel, in the pride o' her teens, sometimes flingin' a scornfu' look to you over her shoulther, as if she despised a' mankind; an' then a' at ance, as if touched by gentle thochts, relaxin' intil a burst o' smiles, like the sun on a half-stormy day, comin' out suddenly frae amang the breakin' clouds, and changing at ance earth into heaven. O, Sir, but the lodge is a bonny place noo!

North.—I love suburban retirement, James, even more than the remotest rural solitude. In old age one needs to have the neighbourhood of human beings to lean upon—and in the stillness of awakening morn or hushing eve, my spirit yearns towards the hum of the city, and finds a relief from all o'er-mastering thoughts, in its fellowship with the busy multitudes sailing along the many streams of life, too near to be wholly forgotten, and yet far enough off not to harass or disturb. In my most world-sick dreams I never longed to be a hermit in his cave. Mine eyes have still loved the smoke of human dwellings—and when my infirmities keep me from church, sitting here in this arbor, with Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," perhaps, on the table before me, how solemn, how sublime, the sound of the sabbath-bells! Whether the towers and spires of the house of worship are shining in the sunlight, or heard each in its region of the consecrated city, through a softening weight of mist or clouds from the windy sea!

Shepherd.—For my ain part, Mr. North, though I loe the lochs and moors, and mountains, as well as do the wild swans, the whapws, and the red deer, yet could I, were there a necessity for't, be every bit as happy in a flat in any timmer tenement in the darkest lane o' Auld Reekie, as in Mount Benger it sell, that blinks sae bonnily on its ain green knowe on the broad bosom o' natur. Wherever duty c's him and binds him down, there may a man by happy—ay, even at the bottom o' a coal-pit, Sir, that rins a mile aneath the sea, wi' waves an' ships roarin' a thousan' fathom over the shaft.

North.—The philosophy of human life!

Shepherd.—Better still—it's religion. Wo for us were there not great happiness and great virtue in toons and cities! Let but the faculties o' the mind be occupied for sake o' the affections o' the heart, and your ee may shine as cheerfully on a smoky dead brick wa', within three yards o' your nose, as on a ledge o' living rock formin' an amphitheatre round a loch or an arm o' the sea. Wad I loe my wife and my weans the less in the grass-market than in the forest? Wad I be affected ither wise by burying ane o' them—should it so please God—in Yarrow kirk-yard than in the Greyfriars? If my sons and my daughters turn out weel in life, what matters it to me if they leeve by the silver streams or the dry Nor-loch? Vice and misery as readily—as inevitably—befa's mortal creatures in the sprinkled domiciles, that frae the green earth look up through amang trees to the blue heavens, as in the dungeon-like dwellings, crooded ane aboon anither, in closes where its aye a sort o' glimmerin' night.

And Death visits them a' alike wi' as sure a foot and as pitiless an ee. And whenever, and wherever he comes, there's an end o' a' distinctions, o' a differences o' outward and material things. Then we mair a' alike look for comfort to ae source—and that's no the skies theirsells, beautifu' tho' they may be, canopyin' the dewy earth wi' a curtain wrought into endless figures, a' bricht wi' the rainbow hues, or amait hidden by houses frae the sicht o' them that are weepin' amang the dim city lanes—for what is't in either case but a mere congregation o' vapours? But the mourner mair be able, wi' the eyes o' faith, to pierce through it a' else of his mournin' there will be no end—nay, nay, Sir, the mair beautifu' may be the tent in which he tabernacles, the mair hideous the hell within his heart! The contrast between the strife o' his ain distracted spirit, and the calm o' the peace-fu' earth may itherwise drive him mad, or, if not, make him curse the hour when he was born into a warld in vain so beautifu'. CAPTAIN HALL.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, &c.

One Capt. Basil Hall, of the British navy, proposes to publish a book about us, having passed through our country, eyes and ears open and pencil in hand, candidly notifying every body that he was about making a book! This gentleman has acquired a certain notoriety which it is not perfectly easy to account for—though it is perfectly evident that he mistakes it for fame. His former books have been interesting more from their subject than their execution, and one of them, about a certain fool's Paradise, called the Loochoo Islands, has been shewn to be very blundering. However, when here he attracted great attention, and was received very hospitably; and we do not think too hospitably. He was found, upon close inspection, not to be a very great Lion, but was feasted about, and all his comings and goings duly announced, partly because that is a way we have when any body comes from over the water to honour our poor republic, and partly by way of getting well out of—or rather, well into, his 'book.' This last motive the captain was up to; and it was excellent fun to see him at a dinner table, for instance, watch our eminent men, and note some saying which might be just well enough for the occasion, and then utter his 'ah, very fair, very fair indeed—I will certainly put that into my book,' with an air that said, 'you are really an excellent, hearty set of people, and some of you shall be immortalized; you shall be read and talked about in England, for you really do deserve it.' This was all very well—but we had nearly forgotten it, when we happened to meet with an extract from a speech of his lately uttered somewhere in England, wherein he takes occasion to speak of this country: probably, by way of giving his hearers a foretaste of his book! He seemed to think that the principal difference between this country and Great Britain lies in their more perfect liberty, and particularly in the greater freedom of the English press. This sounds rather absurd, and we dare say seemed a little paradoxical to some of his hearers; but there is a sense in which it is true. There is in England, perhaps, in all the walks of English life, and certainly in the English Press, a 'freedom' of which there are no examples here. It is a freedom from restraints which none can exempt themselves from in this country. A freedom from decency, from regard to the rights and feelings of another, from veracity, and indeed from all pretension to these qualities. The public have been shocked with the slanderous and unprincipled personalities which have disgraced some of the papers published in this country; but we are confident that no American editor ever for a moment thought of giving utterance to statements and allusions so enormously gross and indecent, and assaults, so ferocious, as may be found frequently in the 'Age,' or the 'John Bull,' or in Blackwood's Magazine. Sir James Macintosh says somewhere, 'the perfection of freedom is the perfection of restraint.' We do not think much of this saying—paradoxes are seldom worth much—but there is a sort of truth about it. The great object of prohibition is to prevent men from harming or unduly interfering with each other. The more effectually a man is restrained from injuring his neighbour, or unjustifiably interfering with his conduct, the more perfectly his neighbour enjoys his freedom. It is thus that we reconcile the greater license with the less liberty of England. We are by no means disposed to think that our press is too free, that the checks which operate against it are of feeble or sluggish action, and need to be fortified or stimulated. But neither do we believe that the press of this country has passed from liberty to license, nor do we desire it should. With perfect cheerfulness and without one emotion of envy, we can see such men as Captain Hall escape from the restraint and galling fetters we endure and go to the enjoyment of that excess of liberty which awaits him at home.

THE DEAF AND DUMB.

To enter this world without a welcome—to leave it without an adieu—to suffer and to be unable to communicate your suffering—to stand a sad and silent monument amid the joys of others, which you cannot understand nor conceive of—to be shut out of life—to carry within your own bosom the buried seeds of happiness, which are never to grow, of intellect which is never to burst forth, of usefulness which is never to germinate—to find even your presence afflictive, and not know whether you excite compassion or horror; a whole existence without one cheering sound—without one welcome accent—without one exhilarating thought—without one idea of the present—without one recollection of the past—without one hope of the future. O! what a cloud of wretchedness covers, surrounds, and overwhelms such a deplorable victim of sorrow.

Now to throw over such a benighted being the sweet rays of intelligence,—to open the intellect, and let it gush forth in streams of light and joy—to rouse the affections that they may know and love God, the giver of all things, merciful in his chastisements—to enlighten the soul that it may see its origin and destiny—to cause the lips to smile,—although they cannot speak—the eye to glisten with other emotions than those of sorrow—and the mind to understand, although it cannot hear. O! what a beautiful supplement to the benevolence of Heaven!

THE GREAT TUN OF KONIGSTEIN.

One of the greatest curiosities in the neighbourhood of Dresden, is the great tun, erected at fort Konigstein, by general Kyaw, the height of which is 17 Dresden ells, and its diameter at the bung, 12 ells. This vast vessel, which is always replenished with excellent wine, is capable of containing 3709 hogsheads; and on its head, is a plate with a latin inscription, to the following purport:

"Welcome, traveller, and admire this monument dedicated to festivity, in order to exhilarate the mind with a glass, in the year 1725, by Frederick Augustus, king of Poland and elector of Saxony, the father of his country, the Titus of the age, the delight of mankind. Therefore drink to the health of the sovereign, the country, the electoral family, and baron Kyaw, governor of Konigstein; and if thou art able, according to the dignity of this cask, the most capacious of all casks, drink to the prosperity of the whole universe—and so farewell.

No two things differ more than hurry and despatch. Hurry is the mark of a weak mind, despatch of a strong one. A weak man in office, like a squirrel in a cage, is labouring eternally, but to no purpose, and in constant motion, without getting on a jot; like a turnstile, he is in every body's way, but stops nobody; he talks a great deal but says very little; looks into every thing, but sees into nothing; and has a hundred irons in the fire, but very few of them are hot, and with those few that are, he openly burns his fingers.

ELEGANT COMPLIMENT.

A French officer, having arrived at the court of Vienna, the empress, knowing that he had seen the Princess de , asked him if he thought this princess was, as reported, the handsomest person in the world? "Madam," replied the officer, "I thought so yesterday."

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Collegians.

THE GALLYOWEN HAIR CUTTER.

He had scarcely taken his seat before the toilet, when a soft tap at the door, and the sound of a small, squeaking voice, announced the arrival of the hair cutter. On looking round him, Hardress beheld a small, thin faced, red haired little man, with a tailor's shears dangling from his finger, bowing and smiling with a timid and conciliating air. In an evil hour for his patience, Hardress consented that he should commence operations.

"The piatez were very airly this year, sir," he he modestly began, after he had wrapped a check apron about the neck of Hardress, and made the other necessary arrangements.

"Very early indeed. You needn't cut so fast."

"Very airly, sir. The white eyes especially. Them white eyes are fine piatez. For the first four months I wouldnt ax a better piate than a white eye, with a bit o' butter, or a piggin of milk, or a bit o' bacon, if one had it; but after that the meal goes out of 'em, and they gets wet and bad. The cups ar'nt so good in the beginning o' the season, but they hould better. Turn your head more to the light, sir, if you please. The cups indeed are a fine substantial lasting piate. There's great nutriment in 'em for poor people, that would have nothen else with them but themselves, or a grain of salt. There's no piate that eats better, when you have nothen but a bit o' the little one (as they say) to eat with a bit o' the big. No piate that eats so sweet with point."

"With point?" Hardress replied, a little amused by this fluent discussion of the poor hair cutter, upon the varieties of a dish, which, from his childhood, had formed almost his only article of nutriment; and on which he expatiated with as much cognoscence and satisfaction, as a fashionable gourmand might do on culinary productions of Eustache Ude. "What is point?"

"Don't you know what that is, sir? I'll tell you in a minute. A joke that them that has nothen to do, and plenty to eat, make upon the poor people that have nothen to eat and plenty to do. That is, when there's dry piatez on the table, and enough of hungry people about it, and the family would have, only one bit o' bacon hanging up above their heads, they'd peel a piate first, and then they'd point it up at the bacon, and they'd fancy within their own mind that it would have the taste o' the mait when they'd beaten after. That's what they call point, sir. A cheap sort o' diet it is, lord help us, that's plenty enough among the poor people in this country. A great plan for making a small bit of pork go a long way in a large family."

"Indeed it is but a slender sort of food. Those scissors you have are dreadful ones."

"Terrible, sir, I sent my own over to the forge before I left home, to have an eye put in; only for that I'd be smarter, a deal. Slender food it is, indeed! There's a deal o' poor people here in Ireland, sir, that are run so hard at times, that the wind of a bit o' mait is as good to 'em, as the mait itself to them that would be used to it. The piatez are every thing, the kitchen little or nothing. But there's a sort o' piatez, (I don't know did your honour ever see 'em?) that's gotten greatly in vogue now among 'em, an is killing half the country; the white piatez, a piate that has great produce, an' requires but little manure, an' will grow in very poor land; but has no more strength or nourishment in it, than if you had boiled a handful o' saw dust and made gruel of it, or put a bit of a deal board between your teeth, and thought to make a breakfast out of it. The black bulls themselves are better. Indeed the black bulls are a deal a better piate than they're thought. When you'd peel 'em, they look as black as indigo, an' you have no mind to 'em at all; but I declare they're very sweet in the mouth, an' very strengthening. The English reds are a nate piate, too, an' the apple piate, (I don't know what made 'em be given up) an' the kidney (though delicate of rearing), but give me the cups for all, that will hould the meal in 'em to the last, and won't require any intricket tillage. Let a man have a middling sized pit o' the cups again' the winter, a small caish (pig) to pay his rent, an' a handful o' turf behind the doore, an he can defy the world."

"You know as much, I think," said Hardress, "of farming, as of hair cutting."

"Oych, if I had nothen to depend upon but what heads come across me this way, sir, I'd be in a poor way, enough. But I have a little spot o' ground besides."

"And a good taste for the produce."

"'Twas kind father for me to have that same. Did you ever hear tell, sir, of what they call limestone broth?"

"Never."

"'Twas my father first made it. I'll tell you the story, sir, if you'll turn your head this way a minute."

Hardress had no choice but to listen.

"My father went once upon a time about the country, in the idle season, seeing would he make a penny at all by cutting hair, or setting razurs or penknives, or any other job that would fall in his way. Well, an good—he was one day walking alone in the mountain of Kerry, without a hai'pny in his pocket, (for though he travelled a foot, it cost him more than he earned,) and knowing there was but little love for a county Limerick man in the place where he was, an' being half perished with the hunger, an' evening drawing nigh, he did n't know well what to do with himself till morning. Very good, he went along the wild road, an' if he did he soon see a farm house, at a little distance, of one side; a snug looking place with the smoke curling up out of the chimney an' all tokens of good living inside. Well, some people would live where a fox would starve. What do you think did my father do? He would n't beg, (a thing one of our people have never done yet, thank heaven!) an' he had n't the money to buy a thing, so what does he do? He takes a couple of the big limestones, that were lying on the road, in his two hands, an' away with him to the house."

"Lord save all here!" says he. "And you kindly," says they. "I'm come to you," says he, this way, looking at the two limestones, "to know would you let me make a little limestone broth over your fire until I'll make my dinner? 'Limestone broth!' says they to him again, 'what's that eroo?'"

"Broth made o' lime stones," says he, 'what else?'"

"We never heard of such a thing," says they. "Why then you may hear it now," says he, 'and see it also, if you'll gi' me a pot an' a couple o' quarts o' sot water.'"

"You can have it an' welcome," says they. So they put down the pot an' the water, and my father went over and tuk a chair hard by the pleasant fire for himself, and put down his two limestones to boil, an' kep stirring them round like stirabout. Very good, well, by an' by when the water began to boil, 'tis thickening finely," says my father; 'now if it had a grain o' salt at all, 't would be a great improvement to it.'"

"Raich down the salt box, Nell," says the man o' the house to his wife. "O that 's the very thing just," says my father, shaking some of it into the pot. So he stirred it again a while, looking as sober as a minister. By an' by, he takes the spoon he had stirring it, an' tastes it. 'It's very good now,' says he, 'although it wants something yet.'"

"What is it," says they. "Oych, wisha nothing," says he, 'may be 't is only fancy o' me.'"

"If it's any thing we can give you," says they, 'you're welcome to it.'"

"'Tis very good as it is," says he, 'but when I'm at home, I find it gives it a fine bit a flavour just to boil a little knuckle o' bacon or mutton trotters, or any thing that way along with it.'"

"Raich hether that bone o' sheep's head we had at dinner yesterday, Nell," says the man o' the house. "Oych, don't mind it," says my father, 'let it be as it is.'"

"Sure if it improves it, you may as well," says they. "Baitheashin!" says my father, putting it down. So after boiling it a good piece longer, 'tis a fine limestone broth," says he, 'as ever was tasted, an' if a man had a few piatez,' says he, looking at a pot in the chimney corner, 'he could n't desire a better dinner.'"

They gave him the piatez, and he made a good dinner of themselves an' the broth, not forgetting the bone, which he polished equal to chanev, before he let it go. The people tasted it, an' thought it as good as any mutton broth in the world."

NOSES.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ORGANS OF SCENT.

BY WILLIAM WADD, ESQ. F. L. S.

"Non eucicque: datum est habere nasum."—Martial.
 "I have a nose."—Fraby.

It has often struck me as a defect in our anatomical teachers, that in describing that prominent feature of the human face, the organ of the scent, they generalize too much, and have but one term for the symmetrical arch, arising majestically, or the tiny atom, scarcely equal to the weight of a barnacle—a very dot of flesh! Nor is the dissimilarity between the invisible functions of the organ, and the visible varieties of its external structure, less worthy of remark. With some, the sense of smelling is so dull, as not to distinguish hyacinths from assafoetida; they would even pass the Small-Pox Hospital, and Maiden-lane, without noticing the snackers; whilst others, detecting instantly the slightest particle of offensive matter, hurry past the apothecaries, and get into an agony of sternutation, at fifty yards from Fribourg's.

Shakspeare, who was a minute observer of the anatomical and physiological varieties of the human frame, did not allow this dissimilarity to pass unnoticed; and, moreover, he starts a query that has never been satisfactorily answered, from his time to the present; viz: "Canst thou tell why one's nose stands i' the middle of one's face?" And his nice discrimination about noses extend also to shape and colour,—from the "Red-nosed inn-keeper of Dav'ntry,"† and the "Malmsy-nosed knave, Bardolph,"‡ to him in Henry V., "whose nose was sharp as a pen!"

This celebrated "Malmsy-nose" possessed properties unknown to the same feature now-a-days. It was adapted to practical utility, in its application to domestick purposes, and moral instruction, by that great admirer and competent judge of its virtues, Sir John Falstaff, to whose sheets it did the office of a warming-pan;§ and who made as good use of it as some men do of a death's head, or a memento mori: "I never see it," said he, "but I think upon hell fire." It stands almost unrivalled in history, and ranks at least with that which gave a cognomen to Ovid,|| and the one to which the celebrated violoncello player, Cervetto, owed the sobriquet of Nosey. This epithet reminds me of another nose of theatrical notoriety, whose rubicund tint, when it interfered with the costume of a sober character which its owner was enacting, was moderated by his wife, who, with laudable anxiety to keep down its "rosy hue," was constantly behind the scenes with a powder puff, which she was accustomed to apply, ejaculating, "Od rot it, George! how you do rub your nose! Come here, and let me powder it. Do you think Alexander the Great had such a nose?"

Nor would I omit to mention one, contemporary almost with the above, by which the publick peace was said to be endangered, as recorded by a poet of the day, who states,—

"Amongst the crowds, not one in ten

Ere saw a thing so rare;

Its size surprised all the men,

Its charms attract the fair.

'Tis wonderful to see the folk,

Who at the nose do gaze,

All grin and laugh, and sneer and joke,

And gap in such amaze.

The children, whom the sight doth please,

Their little fingers point,

Wishing to give it one good squeeze,

And pull it out of joint."

Much more is said by the poet in its praise; at last he falls into a moral strain:

"For many, as you may suppose,

'Gainst nature loudly bawled—

That one man should have such a nose,

Whilst some have none at all."

And then concludes with some excellent sentiments:—

"Though ev'ry man's a nat'ral right

To show a moderate nose,

Yet surely 'tis a piece of spite

To spoil the world's repose."

* Lear.
 † Henry IV. ii. 1.
 ‡ Henry V. ii. 1.
 § Ovidius Naso was the man; and why, indeed, Naso; but for smelling out the odorous flowers of fancy? says Holofernes, the school-master, in Love's Labour Lost.

"The wrong to exhibit such a show,
Though you may think it fun,
Yet still, good sir, you little know
What evil it has done.

What quarrels have from hence begun!
What anger and what strife!
What blows have pass'd 'tween man and man!
What kicks 'tween man and wife!

No longer, then, thyself disgrace,
In quest of beauty's fauce;
No longer, then, expose thy face,
To get thy nose a name.

Take it away, if thou art wise,
And keep it safe at home,
Amongst thy curiosities
Of ancient Greece and Rome."

Shakspeare would have thought it high treason, for he says,—

"Down with the nose, take the bridge quite away
Of him, that's particular to forefend
Smells from the general weal."

There may have been many other such noses that have escaped observation,—“born to blush unseen:” enough, however, I have here stated of those my recollection furnishes me with at the moment, to establish the fact of variety, and to lead curious physiologists to a scientific classification of this prominent and well-deserving feature of the human face. I would recommend a proper distinction being observed between functional varieties, and those which arise from size, shape, or colour, of which, in a cursory way, may be enumerated first,—

SHAPE.*
Roman. Grecian.	Snub. Pug.	Flat. Sharp.	Bottle nose. Parrotlike nose.
COLOUR.
Red. Ruby.	Malmsey. Claret.	Purple. Copper.

Now, what does all this come to? Cui bono? A great deal for surgery; let us examine what may be done;—we know that noses may be supplied,—may not, therefore, a small one be enlarged, and a large one made small? We have seen a person with a bunch of noses, but can only, on the authority of Shakspeare, quote one “who had a thousand.”

For a great length of time nothing was admired in the world but Roman noses,—and then not a word was heard about them, till William III. brought them again into fashion.

People occasionally possess the power of voluntary action with the muscles of the nose, and can move it horizontally, or to the right and left,—draw it up or protrude it,—so as to make it take any position you please. Painters have been provokingly deceived by this stratagem, and have in vain attempted the portraits of such persons, who were able at every instant to produce a new physiognomy.

One of the qualifications for the Ugly Club was a nose eminently miscalculated, whether as to length or breadth,—the thickest skin had preference.

Hitherto we have only considered external appearances; we must now notice its functional and other properties.

With some persons, the nose is a sort of barometer,—a certain state of atmosphere is invariably announced to them by an agreeable sensation of coldness at the tip.

Zimmerman used to draw conclusions, as to a man's temperament, from his nose! Not indeed from its size or form, but from the peculiar sensibility of the organ.

Cardan considered acuteness of smell as a proof of penetrating genius, and a lively imagination.

Halier could distinguish perspiration at ten yards' distance.

There have been instances on record of blind people who were able to discover colours by the touch; and deaf and dumb, who could feel sounds by placing their hand upon the speaker's mouth; this, however, is not more astonishing, than that the sense of smelling should be so acute, as to enable some persons to judge by it the quality of metals. Martial mentions a person, named Mamurra, who consulted only his nose, to ascertain whether the copper that was brought to him were true Corinthian. There have been Indian merchants who, if a piece of money were given them, by applying their nose to it, defined its quality to a nicety, without touchstone, balance, or aqua-fortis. Europeans, also, are to be found whose sense of smelling is equally delicate and perfect.

Marco-Marci speaks of a monk at Prague, who, when any thing was brought him, distinguished, by its smell, with as much certainty as the best nosed dog, to whom it belonged, or by whom it had been handled. It was also said of him, that he could accurately distinguish, in this manner, the virtuous from the vicious. He was much devoted to the study of natural philosophy; and, among other things, had undertaken to oblige the world with precepts on the sense of smelling, like those who have on optics and acousticks, by distributing into certain classes a great number of smells, to all of which he had given names; but an untimely death cut him off in the midst of these curious researches.

The guides who accompany travellers on the route from Smyrna or Aleppo, to Babylon, have no other signs in the midst of the deserts, to discover their distance from the place of destination, than the smell of the sand alone, by which they determine with certainty. Perhaps they judge by the odour exhaled from small plants, or roots, intermixed with the sand.

Physicians, in visiting the sick, have been known to form a prognostick, before having seen the patient, from the effluvia of the sick-room. Those who are in the habit of visiting the insane, know the peculiar odour that characterises that dire calamity; and it was remarked of the plague, that it had “a scent of the flavour of mellow apples.”

It is said that monkeys possess this power of discrimination in a very eminent degree. A story is told of a lady who had a pet of this description, whom she made her constant companion, and who suddenly, without any apparent cause, forsook her, and could not be persuaded to re-enter her chamber. The lady was at that time infected with measles, which shortly after appeared upon her; but, on her perfect recovery, the monkey returned to her with his usual familiarity. Some time after, the same lady caught cold, and was apparently very ill, but without fever. The monkey, as far as might be judged from his appearance, seemed to condole with his sick mistress, and to understand the difference of her distempers, by the confidence with which he remained in attendance upon her.

It has even been said, that the sagacity of some dogs has led them to prognosticate the fatal termination of the disease. “Whilst I lived at Ripon,” says a learned doctor, “I took notice of a little dog, of a chesnut colour, that very often boded the death of sick persons, without being once, for aught I could learn, mistaken. Every time he barked in the night under the windows of any one whose sickness did not even appear dangerous, it happened, infallibly, that the sick person died that week. I know also,” observes the same author, “a man bit by a mad dog, who could distinguish his friends at a considerable distance by the smell, before even he could distinguish them by sight.”

So early as the second century, the supplying the deficiency of a lost nose became an object of professional consideration; and the Greeks gave the name Kolobomata,* to those who required such an operation. Taliacotus was the first who treated it scientifically; and, from his time, the art of Addition became one of the branches of surgery; and, under the title “De Decorations,” formed a very interesting chapter.

Although Taliacotus has the credit of bringing the art of nose-making into fashion, and being the first to write on the mode and manner of performing the operation, yet it appears that one Branca had been in the habit of performing it long before, as we learn from an ancient author, whose name must, in this instance, be considered as the highest authority, being no less a person than Nosomus.

Why the magistracy of Bologna should have conferred the high honour of a statue on Taliacotus it is difficult to understand,—unless the loss of the nose was of more frequent occurrence than in those days, from the barbarity of warfare and civil punishment; for an old law of the Lombards assigned the loss of the nose as a punishment for theft; and the captives in war were equally spoiled for snuff-takers.

That this was no uncommon dilemma with Italian gentlemen in the fifteenth century, appears by the style in which a Neapolitan poet writes to the noseless Orpianus:—“If,” says he, “you would have your nose restored, come to me—truly the thing is wonderful. Be assured that, if you come, you may go home again with as much nose as you please.”

It does not, however, appear that the nasal operation made any impression on our ancient English surgeons. Wiseman does not even mention it, though slitting the nose, and cutting off the ears, was a common mode of punishing political delinquents in his time; and it is said that Pryne, whose ears were cut off, had new ones made, “a la Taliacotus.” The fact is, that the operation was misunderstood, and disbelieved, as we know by the jocose manner in which it is alluded to by Butler. It has, however, been successfully revived, and performed, by Mr. Carpué.

Connected with the varieties of the organ of scent, is the well-known story of that extraordinary lusus, the Pig-faced Lady.

ABORIGINAL LITERATURE.

KNAPP'S LECTURES.

A series of lectures on American Literature, delivered, last winter, at the city of Washington, by Samuel L. Knapp, Esq. are preparing for publication in this city. The design of those lectures, we understand, is, by means of a historical and critical view of our literature, from its earliest beginnings, and a comparison of its condition with that of other countries, at the same period, or in similar stages of their national existence, to show the decided possession of strong literary talent in our countrymen—to show that they have always been equal to the occasion—that whatever literary efforts the times or the state of the country demanded have been made, not feebly, nor merely respectably, but vigorously, powerfully, and with the stamp of genius upon them. A considerable degree of historical research, and study of writers little known, is, of course, necessary to the successful execution of this work, and the love of the author for investigations of this nature is a great advantage in his favour. We have seen the first lecture. It opens the view which the author proposes to take of our literature, by some remarks on the language which is the vehicle of that literature, and to the perfection of which it must owe much of the strength of its impression upon the minds of those to whom it is addressed. At the close is the following narrative of a surprising exertion of aboriginal genius, which we copy as both intrinsically curious and well related. [N. Y. E. Post.]

The study of the languages is not, in this country, confined to a few learned men, but is pursued by many of those engaged in professional business. Duponceau and Pickering have written learnedly on this subject; and many others, who have as yet offered nothing to the publick, have, with them, in addition to their labours in the common track, made considerable progress in the examination of the languages spoken by the North American Indians; and it is now fully believed that this examination will afford the only clue to their origin, if ever one is found.

The Indians themselves are becoming philologists and grammarians, and exciting the wonder of the world by the invention of letters. The invention of the Cherokee alphabet has excited the astonishment of the philosopher in this country and in Europe; but as I have not as yet seen any satisfactory account of the progress and history of this greatest effort of genius of the present day, I will state what I know of it, from the lips of the inventor himself.

In the winter of 1828, a delegate of the Cherokees visited the city of Washington, in order to make a treaty with the United States, and among them was See-quah-yah, the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet. His English name was George Guess; he was a half-blood, but had never, from his own account, spoken a single word of English up to the time of his invention, nor since. Prompted by my own curiosity, and urged by several literary friends, I applied to See-quah-yah, through the medium of two interpreters—one a half-blood, Caph Roger, and the other a full blood chief, whose assumed English name was John Maw, to relate to me, as minutely as possible, the mental operations and all the facts in his discovery. He cheerfully complied with my request, and gave very deliberate satisfactory answers to every question, and was at the same time careful to know from the interpreter if I distinctly understood his answers. No

* Lavater considers the nose as the fulcrum of the brain; and describes it as a piece of Gothic architecture. “It is in the nose that the arch of the forehead properly rests, the weight of which, but for this, would mercilessly crush the cheeks and the mouth.” He enters into the philosophy of noses with diverting enthusiasm, and finally concludes, “Non cuique datum est habere nasum:”—it is not every one's good fortune to have a nose. A sharp nose has been considered the visible mark of a shrew.

* We have no Greek.

stoick could have been more grave in his demeanour than was See-quah-yah; he pondered, according to the Indian custom, for a considerable time after each question was put, before he made his reply, and often took a whiff of his calumet, while reflecting on an answer. The details of the examination are too long for the closing paragraph of this lecture; but the substance of it was this—That he, (See-quah-yah) was now about sixty-five years old, but could not precisely say—that in early life he was gay and talkative, and although he never attempted to speak in council but once, yet was often, from the strength of his memory, his easy colloquial powers and ready command of his vernacular, a story-teller of the convivial party. His reputation for talents of every kind, gave him some distinction when he was quite young, so long ago as St. Clair's defeat. In this campaign, or some one that soon followed it, a letter was found on the person of a prisoner, which was wrongly read by him to the Indians. In some of their deliberations on this subject the question arose among them whether this mysterious power of "the talking leaf" was the gift of the Great Spirit to the white man, or a discovery of the white man himself? Most of his companions were of the former opinion, while he as strenuously maintained the latter. This frequently became a subject of contemplation with him afterwards, as well as many other things which he knew; or had heard, that the white man could do; but he never sat down seriously to reflect on the subject, until a swelling on his knee confined him to his cabin, and which, at length, made him a cripple for life, by shortening the diseased leg. Deprived of the excitements of war and the pleasures of the chase, in the long nights of his confinement his mind was again directed to the mystery of the power of speaking by letters, the very name of which, of course, was not to be found in his language. From the cries of wild beasts, from the talents of the mocking-bird, from the voices of his children and his companions, he knew that feelings and passions were conveyed by different sounds from one intelligent being to another. The thought struck him to try to ascertain all the sounds in the Cherokee language. His own ear was not remarkably discriminating, and he called to his aid the more acute ears of his wife and children. He found great assistance from them. When he thought that he had distinguished all the different sounds in their language, he attempted to use pictorial signs, images of birds and beasts, to convey these sounds to others or to mark them in his own mind. He soon dropped this method, as difficult or impossible, and tried arbitrary signs, without any regard to appearances, except such as might assist him in recollecting them, and distinguishing them from each other. At first these signs were very numerous; and when he got so far as to think his invention was nearly accomplished, he had about two hundred characters in his alphabet. By the aid of his daughter, who seemed to enter in the genius of his labours, he reduced them, at last, to eighty-six, the number he now uses. He then set to work to make these characters more comely to the eye, and succeeded—as yet he had not the knowledge of the pen as an instrument; but made his characters on a piece of bark, with a knife or a nail. At this time he sent to the Indian agent, as some trader in the nation, for paper and pen. His ink was easily made from some of the bark of the forest trees, whose colouring properties he had previously known—and after seeing the construction of the pen, he soon learned to make one, but at first he made it without a slit; this inconvenience was, however, quickly removed by his sagacity. His next difficulty was to make his invention known to his countrymen; for by this time he had become so abstracted from his tribe and their usual pursuits, that he was viewed with an eye of suspicion. His former companions passed his wigwam without entering it, and mentioned his name as one who was practising improper spells, for notoriety of mischievous purposes, and he seems to think that he should have been hardly dealt with, if his docile and unambitious disposition had not been so generally acknowledged by his tribe—at length he summoned some of the most distinguished of his nation, in order to make his communication to them—and after giving them the best explanation of his discovery that he could, stripping it of all supernatural influence, he proceeded to demonstrate to them, in good earnest, that he had made a discovery. His daughter, who was now his only pupil, was ordered to go out of hearing, while he requested his friends to name a word or sentiment which he put down, and then she was called in and read it to them; then the father retired and the daughter wrote; the Indians were wonder-struck; but not entirely satisfied. See-quah-yah then proposed that the tribe should select several youths from among their brightest young men, that he might communicate the mystery to them. This was at length agreed to, although there was some lurking suspicion of necromancy in the whole business. John Maw, (his Indian name I have forgotten) a full-blood, with several others, were selected for this purpose. The tribe watched the youths for several months with anxiety, and when they offered themselves for examination, the feelings of all were wrought up to the highest pitch. The youths were separated from their master, and from each other, and watched with great care. The uninitiated directed what master and pupil should write to each other, and these tests were viewed in such a manner as not only to destroy their infidelity, but most firmly to fix their faith. The Indians, on this, ordered a great feast and made See-quah-yah conspicuous at it. How nearly is man alike in every age! Pythagoras did the same on the discovery of an important principle in geometry. See-quah-yah became at once school-master, professor, philosopher, and a chief. His countrymen were proud of his talents, and held him in reverence as one favoured by the Great Spirit. The inventions of early times were shrouded in mystery. See-quah-yah disdained all quackery. He did not stop here, but carried his discoveries to numbers. He of course knew nothing of the Arabick digits, nor of the power of Roman letters in the science. The Cherokees had mental numerals to one hundred, and had words of all numbers up to that, but they had no signs or characters to assist them in enumerating, adding, subtracting, multiplying or dividing. He reflected upon this until he had created their elementary principle in his mind, but he was at first obliged to make words to express his meaning, and then signs to explain it. By this process he soon had a clear conception of numbers up to a million. His great difficulty was at the threshold, to fix the powers of his signs according to their plates. When this was overcome, his next step was in adding up his different numbers in order to put down the fraction of the decimal and give the whole number to his next place—but when I knew him he had overcome all these difficulties, and was quite a ready arithmetician in the fundamental rules. This was the result of my interview, and I can safely say that I have seldom met a man of more shrewdness than See-quah-yah. He adhered to all the customs of his country, and when his associate chiefs on the mission, assumed our costume, he was dressed in all respects like an Indian. See-quah-yah is a man of diversified talents; he passes from metaphysical and philosophical investigation to mechanical occupations, with the greatest ease. The only practical mechanics he was acquainted with, were a few bungling blacksmiths, who could make a rough tomahawk, or tinker the lock of a rifle; yet he became a white and silver smith, without any instruction, and made spears and silver spoons with neatness and skill, to the great admiration of people of the Cherokee nation. See-quah-yah has also a great taste for painting. He mixes his colours with skill, taking all the art and science of his tribe upon the subject, he added to it many chemical experiments of his own, and some of them were very successful, and would be worth being known to our painters. For his drawings he had no model but what nature furnished; and he often copied them with astonishing faithfulness. His resemblances of the human form, if it true, are coarse, but often spirited and correct, and he gave action and sometimes grace to his representations of animals. He had never seen a camel hair pencil when he made use of the hair of wild animals for his brushes. Some of his productions discover a considerable practical knowledge of perspective; but he could not have formed rules for this. The painters in the early ages were many years coming to the knowledge of this part of their art; and even now they are more successful in the art than perfect in the rules of it. The manners of the American Cadmus are the most easy, and his habits those of the most assiduous scholar, and his disposition is more lively than that of any Indian I ever saw. He understood and felt the advantages the white man had long enjoyed, of having the accumulations of every branch of knowledge, from generation to generation, by means of written language, while the red man could only commit his thoughts to uncertain tradition. He reasoned correctly when he urged this to his friends as the cause why the red man made so few advances in knowledge in comparison with us, and to remedy this was one of his great aims, and one which he has accomplished beyond that of any other man living, or perhaps any other who ever existed in a rude state of nature.

It perhaps may not be known that the government of the United States had a fount of type cut for his alphabet, and that a newspaper, printed partly in the Cherokee language, and partly in the English, has been established at New Echota, and is characterized by decency and good sense; and thus many of the Cherokees are able to read both languages. After putting these remarks to paper, I had the pleasure of seeing the head chief of the Cherokees, who confirmed the statement of See-quah-yah and added that he was an Indian of the strictest veracity and sobriety. The western wilderness is not only to blossom like the rose; but there man has started up and proved that he has not degenerated since the primitive days of Crops, and the romantick ages of wonderful effort and god-like renown.

ALAS, POOR YORICK! The long threatened Pennsylvania anti-masonick state convention had its being at Harrisburgh on the 25th ult.; and ended, if possible, still more contemptibly than the pitiful display of "mightiness" made in this state last winter. That state contains upwards of fifty counties, only twelve of which were represented; and the meetings at which the delegates were chosen, were each attended, on an average, by less than twenty-five persons! A most impartial representation of the opinions of a million and a half of people! The Jacks must be a numerous race in Pennsylvania.

The experiment in conventions has now been pretty well tried; and instead of building up the fortunes of the experiment rs, it has defeated them with their own weapons. Frank Granger's national convention looks "rather blue," we think; we really have a feeling of sympathy for the patriotic nerves of that excessively disinterested gentleman. How nobly and magnanimously he "sacrifices himself" for the "public interest!" Shade of Leonidas!—pray be so kind as to be jealous of thy reputation.

The great Mr. Frederick Whittlesey, of Rochester, too, was at Harrisburgh. He was sent there by the celebrated central committee, which august body, as we understand, has started him in the missionary business, in opposition to Solomon Southwick. Mr. Whittlesey however is not capable of doing much, any where; he can talk a little sentiment, and try to eulogize and immortalize the extraordinary labours of the central committee, and then he must stop. Now, Solomon can talk, and make a noise, and though nobody cares about it, it does well enough for a farce, and the scene passes off with some spirit. The exchange will be a bad one.

Two of the members of this state convention recanted anti-masonry in speeches to that body, and withdrew from it. They declared the convention a political manoeuvre—got up under false pretences, for the accomplishment of purposes of which neither they nor their constituents could approve. But the remainder, true to their character, stuck together, and after much trouble and clashing of interests, closed their labours by nominating Samuel Ritner as a candidate for governor! It is supposed Mr. Ritner will receive two or three hundred votes, if he consents to run.

To-day has come, as Major Noah says of St. Valentine's day, because it comes once a year. It being a day on which men feel particularly independent, there can be little doubt many will be considerably puzzled to determine on the best method of displaying their perfect freedom from all civil, moral and religious restraints. Some will get gloriously fuddled, and then they will be free from all sober thinking, and mayhap, too, free from the capability of remaining upright. Others, perhaps, will kick up a row, to manifest their entire freedom from the restraints of civility and a peace-loving disposition; and if perchance a friendly shoulder-tapper should afford them protection within the walls of a certain habitation, not the most agreeable in the world, they will be very free from the dangerous allurements of the world without; and on the morrow they may discover that something from which they are perfectly free, is needed to declare them independent of the vile hold of the law. Those who have plenty of money will be free from the grinding grip of poverty, of which unfortunate sufferers are uncommonly sensible on the festival of independence; and those who have no money will be free from the anxieties and perplexities of wealth, and enjoy, according to Solomon's "Pleasures of Poverty," a comfortable degree of felicity. Those who patronize the temperate society to-day will be free from the headache in the morning; and those who do not, will undoubtedly be independent of that freedom. We advise the reader to be a sober and staid citizen, and as a reward promise him the free use of his faculties to begin the next week with.

THEATRE. Mr. Booth played Richard III. on Thursday evening to a more numerous audience than we have seen at the theatre at any time before, the present season. The managers certainly deserve a far better support than they have hitherto received. At great expense and trouble they have connected with their company some of the most celebrated actors in the country; and it may be safely said that at present there is as much (perhaps more) talent upon the Albany boards as upon those of any theatre in the Union. We are confident, too, that encouragement, when received, is appreciated as it should be, and is a stimulus to further exertion. Let those, then, who would see the drama flourish, support it, now that support may confer upon it a decided and lasting benefit; and let them do something too, to regenerate the character of the city, for its want of taste has become a proverb. A paragraph maker may talk of a "liberal" and a "discriminating" community; but if the theatre be unattended—if every one, however meritorious, who appeals to the public for support, is neglected, can it be said, with any justice, that they are liberal? and if merit and genius which is encouraged and fostered with peculiar care and solicitude in every other quarter, is here, and here alone, unheeded, or lorded over by shallow and imperious criticism, can it be said the community is discerning? Out upon such liberality and discernment! Faith, these words must have changed their meaning, or they are vilely used.

A Boston anti-masonick editor is fearful, lest we should publish a history of the Morgan excitement. He seems, to be very desirous that post should be buried in oblivion.

Solomon Southwick says, he is determined to thunder a little in Hudson, to-day. May heaven protect all feminine nerves.

Mr. Jefferson's Memoirs are issued, or "are being issued" from the press. The reader will find an interesting extract, concerning the Declaration of Independence, on our third page. We shall give further extracts hereafter.

Quid Pro Quo, by Q. and Melancholy, by C. C. of Randolph, Vt. shall be inserted in our next.

The Cincinnati Chronicle says there are no loungers in that place. What a paradise it must be.

From the Buffalo Journal.

THE DENIAL. In our paper of the 9th inst. we exposed the fact that the anti-masons were spreading a report that colonel King was not dead but had eloped, leaving his wife and children to mourn their loss over an empty coffin. Such at that time was the report circulated in Niagara, Monroe, Chautauque and Erie counties, by the anti-masons, and they gloried in the narration of the brutal tale, until they were met by a general frown of public indignation at so foul an imputation. Then an effort became necessary to escape the impending odium, and on the 16th inst. the following appeared in the Buffalo Patriot: "The last Journal accuses the anti-masons of asserting that colonel King is not dead—that the masons induced him to abscond; after which, to save his bail, the friends assembled and buried an empty coffin. This we believe to be a malicious libel. We have never heard any such assertions from anti-masons, nor have we seen it alluded to in one anti-masonick newspaper." On such authority, a disgraceful fact, notorious through several counties, is attempted to be disproved. When we penned our article on the 9th inst. we had before us the Chautauque Phoenix, published six days before, which held the following language upon the death of colonel King: "We would not disturb the clouds of the valley, nor wound the friends of the deceased by groundless surmises, but we should not be surprised to find even this a manoeuvre of the art-concealing and wonder-working art of freemasonry. Credulity's utmost stretch could hardly grasp such a belief, yet this would be no more surprising than what has already transpired." It will be soon enough for the public to discredit the disgraceful agency of anti-masons, in circulating this sacrilegious calumny, when their papers cease to publish it, and when men of truth and character shall confront it from other and better motives than to secure the weekly wages of their hireling employment.

The slander has been abandoned here from necessity, but it is still promulgated by anti-masons elsewhere. The same Chautauque Phoenix, on the 17th inst. significantly revives it thus: "We would not disturb the ashes of colonel King, if he is dead;" and it has lost none of its currency in some of the eastern counties, where we know it still circulates, upon anti-masonick authority, garnished with all the heart-sickening detail which accompanied its original fabrication.

ITEMS.

CHARACTERISTIC. During the sitting of the court in this village last week, a flaming political anti-mason, who was harranguing on the subject, declared that there never was a mason who was a good man. He was asked by a gentleman present what he thought of general Washington—whether he was not a good man. He replied "No—Washington was a perjured scoundrel, and I can prove it." He was asked for his proof, and he then said, "Washington swore allegiance to the king of Great Britain, and afterwards rebelled against him!" Such was the disgust and abhorrence of the bystanders, that the word TORY instantly fell from the lips of several. This slanderer of the Father of his country, seeing the patriotic indignation which his foul language had excited, thought it prudent to sneak off and join his brother Tories. [Norwich Jour.]

New Societies. It is said, that it is in contemplation to establish an Anti-eating-over-too-much-society—for gluttony kills as many, nay more, thousands than intemperance, though its immediate effects are not so demoralizing.

An Anti-tobacco-society is also on foot. We are incorrigible; we love the Indian weed, we will puff and chew it, let come what will. [N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.]

It is said that a worthy gentleman in New-Haven, Conn. has ordered a fine apple orchard to be cut down, because the fruit may be converted into an article to promote intemperance. Verily in this age of Anti-Societies, we may soon see the worthies of the land in league, to establish an Anti-Apple and Anti-Rye Society. Every time and age has its mania: We hope the world will sober down before doomsday. [Ibid.]

Southwickiana. We learn from Solomon's Observer, that the freemasons have taken to murdering horses! Solomon may now consider himself safe. When they kill him they will make way with a long eared animal. [Ibid.]

Anti-masonick gin, still holds its own in the west, being sold at three cents a glass. The anti-masonick razors are falling into disuse, as it is found out that they make no great shave. [Ibid.]

We observe, in a country paper, several songs, set to music, advertised, and amongst them is the following: "Softly waft ye southern breeches." Breeches would do quite as well. [Ibid.]

Pap. The Penn Yan Democrat copies one of our compliments to Solomon Southwick, and credits it "N. York Pap." We suspect it is any thing but pap to Solomon. [Ibid.]

A paragraph is going the rounds of the anti-masonick papers, stating that the "venerable Roger Williams of Rhode Island, is out against freemasonry." The "venerable Roger Williams," after a life of singular activity, died about one hundred and forty-five years ago! so that he must be "out," as to all terrestrial institutions. We have however, too much veneration for his character, to suppose that if alive, he could so far degrade himself as to become a follower of Solomon Southwick. [Saratoga Sen.]

DUTCH VICTORIES IN AFRICA. On the 2d of Oct. the Dutch forces at Elmina Castle, under Sir Frederick Last, obtained a great victory over 8000 Franteses, &c. who attacked that fortress.—On the 19th he obtained a still more glorious victory over 20,000 natives, under the king of Dinkira. The whole army was defeated with immense loss; their camps were burnt, and their provisions, &c. taken.—The natives of Elmina town and castle assisted the Dutch—the women, dressed in white, carried ammunition, and removed the wounded. The natives cut off the heads of the prisoners. [Boston Palladium.]

Death of the Queen of Spain. Captain Snow, of the ship States, who arrived at Baltimore on Tuesday evening from Genoa, and last from Gibraltar, states that on the day he sailed, 24th May, news was received from Madrid of the death of the Queen of Spain, and that minute guns were firing all day, and the flags on the castles and shipping were flying at half mast.

FOURTH OF JULY.

Order of Arrangement, as adopted by the Committee of the Common Council, and the Military Officers.

The Day to be announced by a gun at day-break. At sun-rise a salute of 13 guns, and the ringing of the bells of the several churches in the city.

At half past 10 o'clock, the Citizens, Societies, and military, will assemble at the Mansion House and City Hotel, in North Market street. At eleven o'clock, on the firing of a signal gun, the bells of the different churches will commence ringing, and the procession will move in the following order:—

Captain McCabe's Company of Horse Artillery,
Capt. Watson's Albany Republican Artillery,
Capt. Fry's Albany Independent Volunteers,
Capt. Groesbeck's Washington Guards,
Capt. Wright's National Guards,
Capt. Fassett's Governor's Guards,
Capt. Deuel's City Guards,
Officers of the United States' Army,
Military Academy,
Orator and Reader,
Revolutionary Society,
The Rev'd Clergy.

Executive of the State of New York and Suit,
Common Council, preceded by the Sheriff and his Officers,
Heads of the different Departments of State,
Chancellor, Judges of the Supreme, Circuit, and County Courts,
Representatives in Congress and State Legislature,
Societies, according to their order,
Citizens and Strangers.

The whole under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Van Schaick, of the 6th N. Y. Artillery, assisted by Captain Fry of the Light Infantry, and Adjutant Ryce, of the 9th Rifle.

The procession will move through North Market, State, North Pearl, Columbia, and Montgomery streets, to the Third Presbyterian church; when, order being restored, the exercises will be as follows:—

Prayer, by the Rev. Mr. Williams,
Reading of the Declaration of Independence, by Orlando Meade, esq.
Oration, by Thomas W. Hartman, esq.,
Benediction, by the Rev. Mr. —.

After the exercises at the church, the procession will again form, and move through Montgomery, Orange, North Market, and State streets, to the Capitol, where the military will fire a feu-de-joie. After which the military will move through State, South Pearl, J. Davis, and South Market streets, to the Mansion House, where they will be dismissed.

At sun-set a salute by the Artillery.
John Cassidy, Cornelius Egberts, James Gibbons, committee on the part of the Corporation.

Capt. McCabe, Watson, Fry, Groesbeck, Wright, Fassett, Deuel, committee on the part of the Military.
Albany, July 4, 1827.

Arrangements for celebrating the 33d Anniversary of American Independence, by the Albany Apprentices' Society.

Order of the day.

At 9 o'clock, A. M. the members will assemble in front of the Lancaster school house. At 10 o'clock, they will proceed to the Mansion House to join in the procession, in the following order:—

The Marshal of the Day.

The Officers of the Society.

Orator and Reader.

Members of the Society in double file.

On leaving the procession at the church, the society will proceed through the principal streets in the city to their Session Room, where the following exercises will take place:—

Prayer by a Clergyman.

Declaration of Independence by a Member.

Oration by a Member.

Prayer and Benediction.

A proper person will be stationed at the door, with instructions to admit such ladies as may wish to honour the ceremonies with their presence, and also to admit the honorary members of the society. The honorary members consist of the Clergy, Hon. the Corporation, Trustees of the Albany Apprentices' Library, Editors of newspapers, and Officers of the Academy.

TO PRINTERS. FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY, Albany, N. Y. The proprietors of this establishment have lately made additions to their assortment, and are prepared, on very short notice, to execute orders for entire offices for Job, Newspaper, or Book Printing. Their variety of Job, Fancy, and Book Letter, is as great as any other foundry in the United States. The style of the large and small letter is modern, and of the most elegant kind, having been cut by the most skillful artists in the country. Points of letter and printing materials, for distant places, will be put up with such care as to ensure purchasers against delays for sorts or additions. The prices are uniform with the present prices of the New-York, Philadelphia, and Boston foundries.

Orders from the South will be promptly executed, and articles shipped from New York. A. W. KINSELY & Co.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

THE MISANTHROPE AND THE YOUTH.

MISANTHROPE.

No longer will I bear this loathed existence;
This kindly steel shall free me from the load,
And end at once my misery and my life.

YOUTH.

Stay, stay thy hand, rash man! why would'st thou rush,
Unbidden, into thy Creator's presence? why
Dash from thy lips the cup of offered bliss,
Reject the thousand pleasures life would yield,
And headlong plunge into eternity.

MISANTHROPE.

Talk not to me of bliss, thou foolish youth,
Happiness from this dark bosom is estranged.
What lovely object is there here on earth
To charm me to a longer stay! What now
Of pleasure or of interest seest thou here,
To soothe the wretched and fallen life?

YOUTH.

What! Look around thee! Seest thou not
All nature fair inviting to content,
To happiness, to peace? Behold the earth,
In her gay robe of summer green arrayed,
Displays her loveliest charms. Behold the grove,
Where, through the vistas of the trees,
Winds the cool path in pleasing labyrinth.
The grateful canopy of green above
Shields from the ardours of the fervid sun—
Light zephyrs fan with flying-wing the air,
And whisper peace and quiet to the soul.
There through the midst the rippling streamlet runs,
With grateful murmurs in the verdant banks.
The sportive trout darts through the waters clear,
Rejoicing in its liquid element. Above,
Perched on the waving branch, or on the wing,
Carrol the merry birds, whose lively song
Denotes their joy and rapture. Think'st thou then
That 'mid a scene like that, where every sight
Is pleasing to the eye, and every sound
Is melody, pale, gnawing care can enter?
Surrounded by such scenes should man despond,
Admit within his breast dull melancholy,
Or here exist with other than delight?
And look abroad on all of nature's works,
On the full harmony of the universe,
On the alternate seasons, aptly made,
To fill with grateful change the varied year,
And minister to man's enjoyment.

MISANTHROPE.

Yes,

And to his misery too—for, not a year,
Nor changing season, not a month,
Or single day escapes to join the throng,
The Eternity of what have passed before,
But brings some blighting evil in its train.
Now pestilence with poisonous breath invades
The mourning nations—now dire war
Shakes fierce on high his blood-stained brand—
And in the quiet of the calmest peace,
Or in the healthiest air, devoted man
Can ne'er assure himself a day of life.
But what to me are nature's beauties? What
The gaudy hues in which she clothes her works,
When my cold eye has lost its sense of joy,
And brings no pleasing image to the mind:
And when no sounds, howe'er harmonious, charm
And ravish now, as once, my treacherous ear.

YOUTH.

Turn to thy fellow beings then,
And seek from social intercourse thy joy.
Pour forth thy sorrows to the trusty ear
Of some dear friend. List to his sympathy,
And be consoled. Seek lovely woman too,
Confiding, kind, and true—forget thy griefs
In her bewitching smile. Can man exist

Amidst the kind, the friendly, and the gay,
And not feel pleasure?

MISANTHROPE.

'T is in vain to talk

Of pleasure to a mind diseased.
There was a time when I too felt these joys,
When life's young morning cheered me with its smiles—
When the warm hand of friendship greeted me
With cordial welcome—when I too enjoyed
The social circle—when—but why recount
Pleasures that from me have gone for ever?
All, all is dull, and cold, and cheerless now.
My friends! where are they? Some are gone
To that still bourne whence none return;
Snatched by the hand of death from my embrace—
Never more to be beheld—And some have proved
Fickle and false to friendship's sacred ties—
But let it pass—I care not—all are false
When interest calls on them to be so.
Friendship and faith, philanthropy and love,
Are merely names, and find no welcome in
The cold and selfish bosoms of mankind.

YOUTH.

Dark, wretched man! I can but pity thee—
Since to thy dark mind, all that is good,
And lovely, and endearing, is estranged,
While, like a faithless mirror, it reflects
Distorted every object—Yet still live—
And live in hope, that yet will pass away
This cloud so black and fearful, from your soul;
Leaving it open once again to feel
The genial warmth of social happiness.

STANZAS.

To a Young Lady who requested the Writer to tell her Fortune.

Nay, maiden, nay—ne'er should Sorrow
Blanch that pure and joyous brow—
Ne'er should Grief with envy borrow
Aught from thy bright beauty now:—
For youth's glad morn is fair to thee,
And not a wave sweeps life's smooth sea—
But time will smite with mildewed wing,
And age may prove the adder's sting.
That blue eye which beams so brightly,
Ne'er should lose its thrilling hue;
That pure heart which beats so lightly—
Never may it prove untrue:
But beauty soon will pass away
Like dew drops on a summer day;
Years—withering years, may wring that heart,
And woe may soon its sting impart.

That fresh cheek now blooms with roses,
And that lip retains its thrill—
On that forehead now reposes,
Like the sunbeam on the rill,
Thy auburn hair so fair and bright,
Upon its snowy throne of white:—
But shall I unto thee reveal
That Grief will all these beauties steal?

Shall I tell thee life is shaded
With the gloomy clouds of woe—
That thy youth will soon be faded—
That Time's scathe is sure though slow?—
Maiden! seek not to lift the veil
That makes the iron-hearted quail—
For life may prove a darkened shade
Till thou art in the cold grave laid!

THE IMAGE OF THE DEAD.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

TO —.

True indeed it is
That they whom Death has hidden from our sight,
Are worthiest of the mind's regard; with them
The Future cannot contradict the Past,
Mortality's last exercise and proof
Is undergone.

Wordsworth.

The love where Death has set his seal,
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow.

Byron

I call thee blest!—though now the voice be fled,
Which to thy soul brought dayspring with its tone,
And o'er the gentle eyes though dust be spread,
Eyes that ne'er looked on thine but light was thrown Far through thy breast:

And though the music of thy life be broken,
Or changed in every chord, since He is gone,
Feeling all this, ev'n yet, by many a token,
O thou, the deeply, but the brightly lone!
I call thee blest.

For in thy heart there is a holy spot,
As 'mid the waste an isle of Fount and Palm,
Forever gone!—the world's breath enters not,
The passion tempest may not break its calm:
'T is thine, all thine!

Thither, in trust unbaffled, mayest thou turn,
From weary words, cold greetings, heartless eyes.
Quenching thy soul's thirst at the hidden urn,
That filled with waters of sweet Memory lies
In its own shrine.

Thou hast thy home!—there is no power in change
To reach that Temple of the Past;—no sway
In all Time brings of sudden, dark or strange,
To sweep the still transparent peace away
From its hushed air.

And O that glorious Image of the Dead!
Sole thing whereon a deathless love may rest,
And in deep faith and dreamy worship shed
Its high gift fearlessly!—I call thee blest,
If only there!

Blest, for the Beautiful within thee dwelling,
Never to fade!—a refuge from distrust,
And spring of purer life, still freshly swelling,
To clothe the barrenness of earthly dust,
With flowers divine.

And thou hast been beloved!—it is no dream,
No false mirage for thee, the fervent love,
The Rainbow still unreach'd, th' ideal gleam,
That ever seems before, beyond, above,
Far off to shine.

But thou, from all the daughters of the earth
Singled and marked, hast known its home and place.
And the high memory of its holy worth
To this our life a glory and a grace

For thee hath given.

And art thou not still fondly, truly loved?
Thou art!—the love his spirit bore away
Was not for earth!—a treasure but removed,
A bright bird parted for a clearer day—
Thine still in Heaven!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN APPEAL.

TO THE CITIZENS OF THE STATE OF VERMONT.

The undersigned are a committee of Masons appointed by a convention representing the Masonick district of Addison and part of the district of Windsor, to submit to you some observations upon the subject of the excitement now existing in relation to freemasonry.

All of us have been for several years members of the society of masons. Most of us have been so for a very long period of time, and profess to be perfectly familiar with the principles and practices of the society, as they have existed in this State;—and believe them to have been the same among us as those who have universally prevailed wherever the society has existed. Since we have been masons we have had many opportunities of intercourse with intelligent members of the society from England, Ireland and Scotland; occasionally with those from the continent of Europe, and very frequently with those from the different states of this union. As far as our examination has extended, we have not been able to discover any important difference between their practices and principles and our own.

We do not intend, upon the present occasion, to enter into any discussion upon the antiquity of freemasonry. Our enemies have undertaken to instruct the world on this point. Some of them have very charitably assigned our origin to the Dionysian and Eleusinian games of Greece; others to the period of the Crusades; a third class to a combination among the serfs of Europe against the feudal barons of former times, and a fourth to a combination among the mechanicks of the Netherlands. We leave the supporters of these different theories to the enjoyment of their own opinions. It is sufficient for us to believe that the true principles of Masonry are as old as human benevolence, and none the worse that age has sanctioned and sustained them.

In Great Britain, the country from which most of us descended, and with whose history we are best acquainted, freemasonry has long existed unmolested, and every inquiry which the jealousy of its government has made upon the subject, has terminated in brightening its claims to the good opinion of mankind. In many of the countries upon the Continent of Europe also, it has existed undisturbed, and more than one of the crowned heads of that continent have promoted its objects and patronized its assemblies. The Abbe Barruel, Professor Robison and Thomas Paine, in vain circulated their slanders against it. Its peaceful character and well known virtues disarmed their shafts of all power to do it injury.

In two of the most despotick states of Europe the strong arm of power has indeed been levelled at the order, and its meetings have been suppressed. The ambitious Alexander, and the imbecile Ferdinand, pretended to fear a combination against their thrones from the secret meetings of the society; but the world has not yet been favoured with any evidence of the fact, save the unstained assertions of one of the greatest tyrants and one of the most consummate bigots that ever existed. The assertion itself, must be, to every reflecting man, a self evident absurdity. Our doors are open to government officers as well as to other men, and there is not a nation in Christendom where some one of them are not to be found among our members. To breath such a subject therefore within the walls of a lodge would involve a certain discovery, and as certain ruin.

Previous to the two last years the march of masonry in the United States has been steady and uninterrupted. If it has had enemies they have not avowed themselves. From its first organization among us, many of our wisest and best men, many of our most tried patriots, have become members of its lodges, have shared its honours and participated in its objects;—and no fact has ever yet been pointed out to show that it has interfered with the rights of any man. Since the occurrence of certain well known acts in the State of New York, alleged to have been committed by masons with the sanction of the society, and since their investigation in the courts of justice, publick attention has been much excited, and masonry and masons have been viewed with extreme jealousy and treated with unjustifiable severity. No pains have been taken to distinguish between the unauthorized acts of a few individuals and the merits of the society at large, and no distinction between a society, as such, and the characters of its individual members. The circumstances alluded to are taken as a test of the true character of the society, and the watchword of its new enemies is that it must and shall be put down, right or wrong.

Until within a very recent period, this excitement has been felt but slightly in the section of country in which we live. The last four months however have seen it burst upon us like the sudden explosion of a volcano. With scarcely an intimation of its approach, it was suddenly found spreading the seeds of discord in families, in churches and in societies. Constantly kept alive by a few artful leaders, whose motives are too obvious to be mistaken, the country was on fire with it almost before masons thought of its existence. The individual proscription and persecution which are following in its trains, are bitter as an Indian's hatred and unrelenting as death itself. The maniac fury of the deluded believers in witchcraft of former times, was, in comparison with this, but the gentle breeze of Italy to the hurricane of the tropicks. Those who have been led away by it appear hardly satisfied that any man should keep clear of the infection; and they have attached the cant appellation of "Jack Mason" to every man, not a mason, who will not enter into their views and join in their denunciations.

Many members of our society have been opposed at the polls, without any other assignable reason than that they were masons; they have been hunted down to the jury box and from that most studiously excluded. The dresses worn by us on some of our festivals have been seized on with avidity to sustain the charge of heresy and popery, as if our outer garments were of more consequence than the moral habiliments of the heart. We have been denounced because we wear the costumes for symbolick purposes that were worn by the Kings and Priests once commissioned by God to reveal his will. Every thing we say or do is tortured till it assumes a shape fit for the purposes of calumny. Many of our brethren in a sister state have been assailed in their business, and tradesmen and mechanicks have been deprived of their bread. In a recent instance also, the solemnity of the funeral occasion and the last rites to the dead in closing the mouth of the grave, have been, by our relentless pursuers, most barbarously disturbed and most wantonly violated. The atabal is indeed sounded, the war cry is up, and the watchword is the extermination of masonry. This is a great demand and society is invoked to join in the sacrifice. Masonry, which has stood for ages, constantly walking in the paths of peace, which uses not the sword to propagate its doctrines, nor threats or solicitations to increase its numbers; an institution that has always been acquitted of the charges preferred against it; masonry, which has so often sustained "sinking nature, struggling against a world's vicissitude;" which in fine aims only at the amelioration of human suffering, is now called on to surrender;—The herald is at the gates.

With this feeling prevailing to a great extent among us, we have considered it to be a duty to address the publick. We claim to be as good citizens as our accusers, and avow ourselves under no obligation to the society of masons or any other, which interferes with our duties to God and our country. We do not expect to satisfy our enemies;—we can not anticipate that the light of reason will have any effect upon men who have volunteered in a crusade for our destruction, and many of whom are evidently governed by sinister views of their own. We would not attempt to arrest the attention of a madman, and we well know that the profligate politician and the interested hypocrite are beyond the pale of reason and of justice. We address ourselves only to those who are dispassionate and unprejudiced, and who honestly wish to know the truth.

We propose to notice some of the leading charges made against us by our enemies. And first in importance is the abduction and murder, (if he be murdered, which is not yet proved,) of William Morgan. Of the history of this transaction we know just as much as the rest of the world, and no more. Our sources of information are the same as theirs—the publick journals of the times. We know no others. The report industriously circulated that this transaction was planned by a general understanding among the masons of the United States, and that the lodges of Vermont furnished their quota of men to assist in the execution, is a wilful and malicious slander, without the least shadow of foundation. We are members of different lodges, many of us are members of the Grand Lodge of this State; and we here publicly and solemnly avow, that we never heard either of William Morgan or his book, except through the medium of the publick newspapers. Of our opinions of his abduction we are free to speak. By whomsoever done, or under whatsoever pretences, we view it now and ever have viewed it, as a violation of the rights of an American citizen, an unauthorized and illegal transaction, not to be defended, justified or palliated; an act contrary to the very first principles of masonry, and which we, as masons and as men, would do all in our power to unveil to the light of day and to bring upon its perpetrators the just punishment they merit. We have been taught no masonic principles which sanction any, the least, violation of the laws of the land, or which tolerate the commission of any crime whatever; and we are persuaded that nothing but the wildest delusion could have made even an anti mason believe, that any society could exist in this free country, for a single day, which violated in its principles the laws of nature, of morality and of religion.

The great text-book of anti masonry is that published in the name of William Morgan. In the zeal of anti-masons to persecute us, they have failed to discover that even that book, in its pretended recital of masonic oaths, does not sustain the charges they bring against us of supporting masons, right or wrong, to the exclusion of other men. None of us ever took such an oath, and disavow being bound by any such obligation. Some of the more recent anti-masonick writers, finding Morgan's first ground not strong enough for the diseased appetite of anti-masonry, have since fitted their assertions to meet the wildest wishes of their new converts.

Combination for political purposes is charged as one of our greatest crimes, and we are particularly told, that we are bound to support masons for office to the exclusion of other men, and even against our own opinions. The freedom of elections is one of those rights over which the American people have ever watched with a wholesome jealousy, and American masons would be as slow to intrude upon it as any other class of citizens. We boldly pronounce all masonry which teaches such a distinction, to be spurious and corrupt, and we do not believe that any such ever existed in a regular lodge. No body of masons were ever known to act together on any political subject, and the Presidential contest, which has just passed, has shown that no society of men could be more divided in opinion than they. As men and as masons we have always considered ourselves at liberty to take our own course in politics unrestricted, and always have done so. Within our lodges it has ever been a forbidden subject; and indeed it has always been our pride, that men of the most opposite political views could meet together as masons and friends without any of the bickerings of party. Our society has taught them, without any reference to their politics, to cultivate mutual forbearance, to be "true to their government and just to their country."

The recent acts of several of our churches declare, that they consider free-masonry to be inconsistent with Christianity. If this were true, the warmest friend of masonry would not undertake to defend it. But we have never yet been told in what this inconsistency consists, and have never ourselves been able to discover it. Masonry requires a belief in the existence of an overruling Providence. Its forms and ceremonies are of a religious character. The Bible, in all Christian countries is placed upon its altars, and in many of our prayers we invoke the name of Christ. It is true that with particular creeds, the inventions of fallible men, the society does not interfere. It leaves each of its members to settle his own private belief between his conscience and his God. If it did more than this, it would be a tribunal abhorrent to reason and to justice; an inquisition to controul private opinion, and interfere with the rights of conscience. Many of us are members of churches and some of us have been tried by them for being members of lodges. Honest lives and a correct course of conduct have been considered insufficient pledges for the correctness of our principles, and some of our church brethren have declined extending their fellowship to us because we have committed the horrible crime of being members of a lodge. Painful as these circumstances have been, we have felt no other emotion than pity for their delusion. We know them to have acted hastily and rashly, and we believe that, at no distant day, the fever of passion and the delirium of hatred will give way to the reflection of soberness and the conviction of truth. Proscription and persecution cannot long retain their power in an enlightened community. They are at war with the genius of the American government and the character of the American people.

Not content with accusing us of sanctioning crime, of corruption in politics and of irreligion in principle, we are also accused of poisoning the fountains of justice. No absurdity is too great for a zealous anti-mason. We indignantly repel the charge and publicly challenge the proof. We call for the name of the Judge, the Juror, the sheriff or the advocate who ever prostituted masonry by making it subservient to so execrable a purpose. We ask what was the case in which the laws of the land were made to bend to masonry? Who received the detested benefit of the sacrifice? We know that within the last few months, Judges, Jurors, Sheriffs, and Counsel, have been repeatedly watched by the keen gaze of men, anxious to detect some isolated circumstance, from which they might propagate some probable story to injure the society. No such fact has yet been found and no such fact ever will be found, because it does not exist. Convince us that masonry affects a judge upon the bench, and that it interferes with the sacred right of trial by jury, and from that moment we are anti-masons forever.

We consider freemasonry as it exists in modern times a great and valuable institution. We know that among us its efforts have been directed to the cause of benevolence and virtue. If its titles, its forms, its ceremonies, are objectionable to some men, not masons, we do not obtrude them upon such men, and they have no right to interfere with them. We are satisfied with them and certainly shall not ask their permission to continue them. All the favours we ask of them is, to let us alone. If they have no desire to do good to their fellow creatures, if they have no ambition to participate in our enjoyments, let them keep away from us, and leave us to enjoy our own sources of pleasure in our own way. When the world has proof that our masonick pursuits make us worse citizens and worse men, then indeed will there be some apology for rigid investigation and unyielding criticism. But as the case now stands we consider that no such proof has yet been given to the world.

We claim of our fellow citizens the same rights enjoyed by other men, and no more. The constitution proscribes no man who well performs the duties of his citizenship. Disregarding this truly republican principle, the avowed design of anti-masonry is a universal proscription of men, simply because they are masons. Let a principle of this description once gain the ascendancy among us; let the passions become enlisted in it, and no man can foretell the desolation of its end. The persecutor may soon in his turn become the persecuted, and "even handed justice, sooner or later, will commend the ingredients of the poison chalice to his own lips." We deprecate all persecution; no matter what name it bears, or what garb it assumes. It is dangerous to society, dangerous to individuals, and is the tyrant's usual engine to destroy the great cause of liberty itself.

If names could add weight to the moral worth of our society, we might easily refer our fellow citizens to a long line of departed worthies, in this and other countries, who have been enrolled among us. Eminent Statesmen, patriots, philosophers, philanthropists and divines, have found in Masonry rational sources of happiness, and have cheerfully given their sanction to a society calculated to ameliorate the moral condition of man. We take leave of our fellow citizens remarking, that we contend only for the principles which Franklin approved, which Warren taught and Washington loved; and that in the company of such men, whose virtues are written in the living characters of a nation's gratitude, we are content to stand or fall.

POISONING BY MILK.

History of the Cases of Poisoning by Milk which recently occurred in a family in this city, by F. J. Higginson, M. D.

On the 21st of May last, at about 11 A. M. I was called to see a family said to have been poisoned. The family consisted of seven, of whom four, viz., the lady of the family, her child (a girl of four or five years,) a young woman who had been maid in the family and who had just been recovered from a pretty severe illness, and a little girl, also a servant. The three remaining members of the family were males, and were not at home. About two hours after breakfast, that is, at about 9 A. M., the females in quick succession and with little warning, were taken with nausea and vomiting. All, with the exception of the little servant girl, who refused, soon got full doses of ipecacuanha, which, by the time of my arrival, had produced its full effect. At this time the lady was complaining of violent pain in the stomach, which had come on a few minutes before, the vomiting having previously ceased. Her countenance was very pale, her skin cool and moist, and her pulse feeble, though not extremely so. She was soon put into bed. Her child was lying in the lap, quiet, and unwilling to be disturbed, but not in much apparent suffering. She also was very pale, her lips slightly livid, her skin cool and moist, and her pulse feeble. She had vomited a great deal, and was still occasionally retching. The young woman was the greatest sufferer. Her countenance was deadly pale, her lips and eyelids sublivid, and her expression wild. As I entered she was tossing her arms about, and stamping violently on the floor. She was however soon calmed, the fit being evidently of an hysterical character. She had continual and violent retchings and complained of severe pain at the stomach. The little girl was apparently more easy. Soon after her attack she had a slight dejection, which relieved her for some time.

From the mode of the attack, and their being simultaneously and similarly affected, there could be no doubt that the phenomena arose from a common cause and that some noxious substance had been introduced into the stomach. I found, on inquiry, that their breakfast had consisted as usual, of bread and butter, milk, eggs, and coffee. No fish had been eaten in the family for two days previously. Some but not all of the family, had eaten cheese the preceding night. Whatever the poison might be, there was no question that it had been evacuated, as far as possible, by the vomiting, and the first indication was to check the inordinate action of the stomach, and, if possible, allay the pain. Dr. George Hayward, who had been sent for, arriving soon after me, was of the same opinion; and by his advice, laudanum was administered, in large doses, to all. Where it was not retained, opium pills were given with success.

Very soon our attention was called to the master of the house, who had come home on hearing of the sickness of his family. He was seized in the same manner with the rest. Soon after this, one and then the other of the two remaining members of the household came home sick from their places of business. Laudanum was given to all three, and whether owing to this, or some other cause they suffered far less than those first effected. As soon as the stomach became sufficiently quiet, the comp. infus. sennæ, was given and repeated in moderate doses. Under this treatment they mostly improved. In one or two cases the coldness of the surface increased; in the child it became extreme, and for some time there was no pulse at the wrist;—she came to however, under the use of warm water and paregorick. Before 2, P. M. they were all well enough to be left. Dr. Hayward saw them again before 4 o'clock, and by that time, the medicine having opened the bowels, they were all decidedly relieved, with the exception of the little girl who was mentioned as less ill than the rest. She had refused medicine, and accordingly suffered longer than the others. On the next day a good deal of weakness was the only ill effect perceptible. As it was a great object to ascertain, if possible the nature of the deleterious substance, I brought away about five ounces of water, and as much milk, for chemical analysis. The water I took from the copper boiler, in which the water used at breakfast had been boiled. The vessel had not been cleaned for many days. So important a matter is this, that it is a regulation both in our army and navy, that the copper cooking utensils shall be inspected once a day by the surgeon or his assistants. The water came through leaden pipes, but was the same they had used for a year. The milk was taken from an earthen pan, the same which that used at breakfast had been taken from.

The analysis of the milk and water was performed by my friend, Dr. C. T. Jackson, whose familiarity with the process of analytical chemistry entitles the results of his investigation to the fullest confidence. Not being able to see him when I left the substances at his house, I could give him no clue to his discovery. The next day, he told me he had detected in the milk, subacetate of copper in very sensible quantities. I have been unable to discover by what means the poison was communicated to the milk. The account of the analysis drawn up by Dr. Jackson, and which is subjoined, puts the facts beyond question. It only shows the necessity of great care, on the part of house keepers, &c. not only as to the vessels in which articles of food are kept and preserved, but to the places where they are deposited.

Three only of the family took milk alone. The quantity taken by the others was, of course, very small, as it was taken in coffee. What is, perhaps, worthy of remark, is that these last took sugar with their coffee,—and this is the substance which Orfila says is the best antidote to the poison of verdigris. He states, to be sure, that large quantities are necessary for it to be of any avail; but in these cases the quantity of sugar must unquestionably have been to the quantity of verdigris, at least as 30 to 1. Those who took milk alone, however, were the first seized. F. J. HIGGINSON.

THE GATHERER.

From Segur's Russian.

CONSPIRACY OF THE STRELITZ.

Like all the malcontents, the Strelitz believed that discontent was universal. It was this belief which in Moscow itself, and a few days before the departure of their sovereign, emboldened Tskiler and Sukanim, two of their leaders, to plot a nocturnal conflagration. They knew that Peter would be the first to hasten to it, and, in the midst of the tumult and confusion common to such accidents, they meant to murder him without mercy, and then to massacre all the foreigners who had been set over them as masters.

Such was the infamous scheme. The hour which they had fixed for its accomplishment was at hand. They had accomplices, but no impeachers, and when assembled at a banquet, they all sought, in intoxicating liquors, the courage which was required for so dreadful an execution. But, like all intoxications, this produced various effects, according to the difference of constitution in those by whom it was felt. Two of these villains lost in it their boldness, they infected each other not with just remorse, but with a dastardly fear; and, escaping from one crime to another, they left the company under a suspicious pretext, promising to their accomplices to return in time, and hurried to the Czar to disclose the plot.

At midnight the blow was to have been struck, and Peter gave orders that at exactly eleven the abode of the conspirators should be closely surrounded. Shortly after, thinking the hour was come, he went singly to the haunt of these ruffians; he entered boldly, certain that he should find nothing but trembling criminals, already fettered by his guards. But his impatience had anticipated the time; and he found himself, single and unarmed, in the midst of this unshackled, daring, well armed band, at the instant when they were vociferating the last words of an oath that they would achieve his destruction. At his unexpected appearance, however, they all rose in confusion.

Peter, on his side, comprehending the full extent of his danger, exasperated at the supposed disobedience of his guards, and furious at having thrown himself into peril, suppressed, nevertheless, the violence of his emotions. Having gone too far to recede, he did not lose his presence of mind—unhesitatingly advanced among this throng of traitors, greeted them familiarly, and in a calm and natural tone, said, that as he was passing by their house, he saw a light in it; that, supposing they were amusing themselves, he had entered in order to share their pleasures. He then seated himself, and drank to his assassins, who, standing up around him, could not avoid putting the glass about and drinking his health. But soon they began to consult each other by their looks, to make numerous signs, and to grow more daring—one of them even leaned over to Sukanim, and said in a low voice, "Brother, is it time?"

The latter, for what reason is unknown, hesitated, and scarcely replied "Not yet," when Peter, who heard him, and also heard at last the footstep of his guards, started from his seat, knocked him down by a blow on the face, and exclaimed,—“If it is not yet time for you, scoundrels, it is time for me.” This blow, and the sight of the guards, threw the assassins into consternation—they fell on their knees and implored forgiveness. “Chain them!” replied the terrible Czar. Then turning to the officer of the guards, he struck him and reproached him with want of punctuality, but the latter showed him his order—and the Czar, perceiving his mistake, clasped him in his arms, kissed him on his forehead, proclaimed his fidelity, and entrusted him with the custody of the traitors.

His vengeance was terrible—the punishment was more ferocious than the crime. First, the rack; then successive mutilation of each member; then death, when not enough of blood and life was left to admit of the sense of suffering.

THE RUINS OF AMERICA.

BY JOHN NEAL.

There may be no such ruins in America as are found in Europe, or in Asia, or in Africa; but other ruins there are of a prodigious magnitude—the ruins of a mighty people. There may be no places of pilgrimage in America, unless it be some lowly battle ground, already forgotten by the neighbourhood, overgrown with a forest, and overshadowed with a perpetual deep darkness, or covered, far and wide, with a sea of watering herbage—the frightful vegetation of death; no places that have been sanctified by song and story, ages after ages, with beautiful tradition or fierce poetry, save here and there a small spot of earth shut in by the great hills, or fortified by the everlasting rocks, where the red man withstood the white man, while the noise and the flash of the terrible weapons with which the latter shot fire into the hearts of the former, appeared to the savage to be that very noise and brightness which he had seen set fire to the woods about his path, tear up the earth under his feet, and shatter the very sky over his head; or some other shadowy quiet place or smooth hill top, where the men of the revolution made war upon their fathers and brothers—upon the most powerful nation of the earth, while her ships covered the sea, and her armies were on the march in every quarter of the globe. There may be no piles of barbarian architecture, each a wilderness of turrets, towers and battlements, rocking to the sea breeze, or overshadowing the high places of power in America; no half buried city like the billiard and the sculptured treasures of art which encumber the earth and choke up the rivers of the old world, or come and go with the tide—appear and disappear, day after day, along the sea shore of the states that have perished forever, cities buried by the volcano or the earthquake, overthrown by the savage, swept over by the sea, or swallowed by the sand of the desert, yet crowded with strange beauty and full of glorious wreck; no prodigies of the mist of that beautiful dim vapour, the twilight of another world, the atmosphere of tradition, through which the bannered palaces, the rocky fortresses, and the lofty piles of Europe loom with a most unearthly grandeur. But if there are no such things in America there are things which are to be found nowhere else on earth now—the live wreck of a prodigious empire that has departed from before our face within the memory of man; the last of a people who have no history, and who but the other day were in possession of a quarter of the whole earth.

CHINESE MORALS.

THE MARRIED STATE, &c.

In a Canton Gazette is the following proclamation, in which command, admonition, and sage counsel are curiously mingled.—

“The Oanchasze, or criminal judge has issued the following proclamation:—‘Chow, by imperial appointment the criminal judge of Canton, hereby strictly prohibits the putting away of wives for slight causes, husbands conniving at the wife’s adultery, or selling her to another man. His object is to support the public morals. The relation of husband and wife is the first of the five social bonds. The domestic female apartment is the source of all moral renovation. Husband and wife should respect each other as host and guest, and live in perfect harmony, like two well attuned instruments of musick. Thus, altogether, they should water their own garden, and eat the fruit of their labour. No dislikes should be allowed to arise from poverty or want. The wife should look up to her husband as her heaven, and not be allowed at her pleasure to desert him. For vile practices there is no place so bad as Canton. Sometimes prosperity makes men forget a former affection: Sometimes want, induced by a disposition addicted to gaming, and a lack of food and clothes, produce repudiation, without regret. Then the ejected wife, deceived by covetous go-betweens, is hired for clandestine purposes. Some sell their wives to sing and play, and submit to the embraces of others. Some invite profligate men to their own houses and give up their wives to prostitution. Such practices inflict a deadly wound on public morals; and therefore, Chow issues this proclamation to prohibit them. And he commands all persons, both the military and people, for the time to come, to obey the laws of decorum. Even if in deep poverty, still let them submit tranquility to Heaven’s decree. Diligence and economy must produce competence. All should know that legitimate posterity depends upon a lawful wife, and she ought not to be lightly rejected and sold for lewd purposes, to the disgrace of the family. Nor should there be the least connivance. If ye adulterers and adulteresses persist, and reform not, it is resolved to prosecute with the utmost rigour of the law. Under the luminous heaven and renovating sun of his present Majesty’s reign, it is impossible to endure you, ye wounders and destroyers of the public morals. Let each obey this mandate, and not induce a late repentance. The law of divorce is, that whoever puts away his wife, excepting for one of the seven legal causes, shall be punished with eighty blows. The seven causes are, having no son, lewdness, not serving her husband’s parents, loquacity, theft or robbery, envy and malice, some noxious disease. Of husband and wife, the first bond should be kindness; the union, righteousness; the continuance, decorum. Breaches of decorum may be overlooked; but unrighteous acts, such as a wife’s striking her husband, or a husband his wife, and wounding each other, make it necessary to insist on a separation; as much so as a man’s forcing his wife to cohabit with another man, or hiring her out for the same purpose. To modify the seven legal causes of divorce, which are rather sweeping, there are three exceptions. Some causes may not be alleged during the three years of mourning for a parent; nor if the parties were first poor and afterwards rich; nor if the wife was received into a house at the time of marriage, but had none to return to.”

IDLENESS.

An idle person is like one that is dead, unconcerned in the changes and necessities of the world, and he only lives to spend his time and eat the fruits of the earth. Like a vermin or a wolf, when their time comes, they die and perish, and in the mean time do no good; they neither plough nor carry burthens: all that they do is either unprofitable or mischievous. Idleness is the greatest prodigality in the world; it throws away that which is invaluable in respect of its present use, and irreparable when it is past, being to be recovered by no power of art or nature. [Jeremy Taylor.]

Mr. E. J. Coale’s Mnemonica, under the article of Man, contains the following useful hint: “married women live longer than maids.” A hint, perhaps, as useful to the other sex, may be found in a late number of the North American Review, in an article on the “art of being happy.” The reviewer concludes his remarks by observing that “the most judicious philosophers have laid it down as a fundamental principle, that a man is never happy without a good wife.”

BEAUTIFUL MOTTO.

The discoverer, Henry of Portugal, bore for his device the magnanimous motto—“the talent to do good.”

CONFESSIONS OF A POET.

Reader, have you ever been a poet? If so, I give you a cordial greeting—we shall be able to sympathize together like two henpecked husbands. But whether you have ever suffered under the capricious domination of mistress muse or not, lend me your ear for a few minutes, and I will tell you my experience.

I was born in—but the name is not at all poetical, and I cannot bring my pen to write it—it is unworthy of being handed down to posterity, so let that pass. Whether a muse presided over my birth or not, I have never been able to ascertain. If she did so, she must afterwards have deserted her charge; for I was never known, like that renowned metre-maker, Pope, "to lisp in numbers." On the contrary, a rhyme was never hatched from the egg shell of my cranium until a comparatively advanced age. I had however, occasionally read poetical productions, and was particularly greedy of those delightfully meaningless verses, which jingle so sweetly and so abundantly through the pages of modern literary publications. From these founts I must have imbibed my inspiration. At all events this is the only way in which I can account for the circumstances that I am about to relate.

It was when I had attained my sixteenth year, that I was lounging about one evening in May, with nothing in the world to do. I began soon to feel, like most idle people, a touch of romance creeping over me. The time was favourable—the moon, that great patroness of lunatics and poets, was just rising, and as I gazed listlessly upon it, my fancy painted it as fairer than usual. Nature had put on a covering of green, and there was a stillness and softness in the air, that produced its influence upon my spirits. I began to think about Diana and her choir of nymphs, and Venus with her boy Cupid, all of whom I had been reading about in my Latin lessons. Just at that critical moment, there chanced to pass by, a girl in whom I had of late seen some admirable qualities. 'Tis true I had known her from childhood, and had often chatted and played with her familiarly at school without remarking any thing remarkably attracting in her—but of late, I know not from what cause it could have sprung, her eyes seemed much brighter and her skin much fairer than before. She was now in my view quite a wonderful creature.

On this occasion she seemed far lovelier than ever. The moon gave just light enough to set off her beauties. She shot a glance at me, and at that instant, I perceived a glow of poetical inspiration passing through my frame: I felt the muse stirring up my brains as 't were with the ladle of poesy, and ere I was aware, there was evolved a rhyme. I understood the meaning of the strange commotion I was in, and as soon as the beautiful object that had raised these sensations had passed by, I hastened to get ready pen, ink and paper, in order to give vent to my struggling conceptions. Never shall I forget this accouchment—it cost me infinite labour. I sat up till midnight, scratching my head and biting my quill, now and then revolving in my mind the beauties of that brilliant eye, or casting a look at the moon to quaff from thence new inspiration. Nothing, I am confident would have induced me to continue such long and patient exertion, but the immediate assistance of a muse; but which of the nine sisters it was that made me her protege, I could never divine.

My subject was, as you may suppose, an address to my fair one. The first couplet described her eyes, under the metaphor of two stars; and the next contained the assertion that they outvied the splendour of the lightning bug. I then, with huge travail, conceived the idea that the man in the moon was in love with my enchanter, and was likely to be my rival. This magnificent thought, together with the hope of a final triumph over him, occupied several stanzas. I concluded by wishing myself a fly, that I might light on her cheek and kiss it unresisting then, a glove, that I might press her hand and; at last, a flower, that I might win her admiration.

At length the lamp of inspiration went out, and I went to bed: but my verses, and their theme, and my muse, appeared before me in my dreams, and I rose next morning with the firm conviction that I was a poet.

One crime makes way for another. It was not long before I found myself again committing metre, upon a similar occasion. This was repeated, until I began to feel very sensibly the effects of the indulgence. My spirit was becoming so sublimated, that I could scarce keep it down to the dull concerns of earth. Pride had swollen my bosom wonderfully, as I had enjoyed the felicity of seeing one or two of my productions in print. This convinced me at once that I was one of those favoured sons of genius, who, "few and far between," light up the rayless night of the world's stupidity. Study began to grow an intolerable bore, and I came at length to regard it as unnecessary. Application, I thought, was well enough for the dull and plodding, but genius could do without it. I frequently amused myself by enumerating the great poets who had spent idle or excentrick lives, and wisely came to the conclusion, that, as my talents were unquestioned, at least by myself, it would be the merest folly to trouble myself with much exertion. So I lived idle, indulging my genius; and I always remarked that the more I kept clear of employment, the more my poetical temperament grew upon me. At length my fancy became so cultivated that I could see something extraordinary or romantick in the most trivial occurrence. The persons around me became endowed with many qualities that I presume they themselves never thought of. I could rhyme upon any thing—nay, almost upon nothing. I produced on one occasion, a long string of stanzas upon a butterfly, and on another, covered a whole sheet with a dissertation upon a rose leaf.

Once, however, my poetical aspirations came near being nipped in the bud—in which case all my succeeding coruscations had been lost to the world forever. I had indited a sonnet "To my Fiddle"—(for I was a fiddler, like Orpheus, and to that may have been owing my fine sensibility to the harmony of numbers) I left it on my table unfinished—meanwhile, some wag entered, and chanced to cast his eye on it. There it lay, with the august apostrophe, "To my Fiddle," staring him in the face. This was too tempting not to be read—he did so, and then sat down and wrote a continuation, by way of burlesque. When I returned, I found my darling offspring profaned by the hand of another. Who could have dared to imitate my genius? The idea smelt of presumption. What then was my indignation when I found that instead of an imitation 'twas a mere caricature! My ire overflowed—I snatched up the paper, and tore it into a hundred pieces, vowing, in my resentment, to avenge the wrongs of my mental bantering, upon the head of its murderer. This incident impeded for a time the stream from the fount of Helicon. But my indignation soon subsided, my vanity healed, and I again fell to rhyming.

My pen scribbled in Albums without number, and in each one were inserted avowals of unqualified and undivided admiration. One would have thought that I had been enamoured of every daughter of Eve, indiscriminately—no such thing—'twas merely taking poetick license—besides, nobody believed me, and so there was no deception. In one, I lauded a black eye, as the perfection of beauty; in another, a blue; in another, a gray. To one, I was enraptured with her sylph-like form; to another, with her full rotundity of figure—thus becoming, in accordance with the sagest of maxims, "all things to all persons." In this manner, I gained the reputation among my fair acquaintances, of a notorious poetaster.

Such was the effect of these repeated efforts, that at last my brain coined rhymes with as much facility as words—I could not open my mouth, but out flew a jingle of words of the same termination. My cranium seemed to be converted into a kind of poetical mill, which ground out the English language into metre, in much the same manner as one of a different construction disposes of the material for the staff of life. Meanwhile, I took care to continue sufficiently idle, as I found that industry always frightened my muse away.

You may well imagine, that I was now far gone in that condition in which one loses the character of a man, and becomes irretrievably a poet. At length, my further advance in this flowery road to beggary was stopped. I had written a piece on a lady's eye-lashes which I was disposed to consider one of my master pieces. This I had the vanity to read to a former preceptor of mine, a shrewd, sensible old man, who had sometimes spoken diminutively of the divine art, as practiced in modern times, and had once or twice given me a broad hint that I might be better employed than in its cultivation. He had obtained a great ascendancy over me, and I would have given any thing for his good opinion. This I was determined to extort, as another laurel to my Parnassian wreath. I accordingly produced my effusion, and desired his opinion upon it. His cool keen eye almost made me quail, but I proceeded to read. I had never before been able to detect any faults in my productions; but now, from what cause it arose I cannot divine, every line seemed to contain a blunder, and every sentiment was either trivial or silly. Still I drove on in a self assured manner, and in that lackadaisical tone in which I had been accustomed to rehearse to girls, until I came to a comparison which I had thought especially fine, between my mistress's eye brow and a thunder-cloud. At this I most unluckily looked up for a sigh of approbation. Good heavens! what was my confusion and chagrin when I saw his eyes glistening, and sides shaking with restrained mirth. My crest fell—my confidence deserted me in a twinkling, and I was hastily fumbling my piece into my pocket, and preparing to sneak off, when he coolly told me to be seated, and asked to take the production. He read it calmly over aloud, so as to make the naked sentiment stand out in relief, and pointed out without mercy all its faults. I winced under his criticism, but had so much veneration for his judgment and talents, that I could not but acknowledge it just.

"Young man," said he in conclusion, while I sat burning with shame and chagrin, "you have now had my opinion of your production, as you desired—and now let me counsel you, as you regard your success in life, to employ your time in more useful pursuits. Poetical talent, even when successful, will never earn you your bread, or gain you one valuable friend—much less that which devotes itself to such trivial subjects. Besides you are unfitting yourself for the business of real life, by indulging a sickly sensibility, and by giving loose reins to your imagination. Trust me now, you had better henceforth leave off this idle employment, and take to some other more worthy the dignity of a man."

My preceptor paused—he saw that he had done his work, and that a poet was extinguished. I was chop-fallen—all my imaginary laurels vanished into air, and my estimation of my own genius was depressed fifty degrees.

I have not since perpetrated a single rhyme.

APOLLO.

MISCELLANY.

NAPOLEON'S PASSAGE OVER THE ALPS.

The following sketch of the passage of the Great St. Bernard—one of the most extraordinary adventures in the life of the most extraordinary adventurer of modern times—is from the Life of Napoleon Bonaparte, written for, and forming the first number of The Family Library, a collection of biography now in the press in London.

At St. Pierre all semblance of a road disappeared. Thenceforth an army, horse and foot, laden with all the munitions of a campaign, a park of forty field pieces included, were to be urged up and along airy ridges of rock and eternal snow, where the goat-herd, the hunter of the chamois, and the outlaw smuggler are alone accustomed to venture, amidst precipices, where to slip a foot is death; beneath glaciers from which the percussion of a musket shot is often sufficient to hurl an avalanche; across bottomless chasms caked over with frost or snow drift, and breathing

"The outburst at of the ice mountain top,
Where the birds dare not build, nor insects wing
Flit o'er the herbless granite."
Byron's Manfred.

The transport of the artillery and ammunition was the most difficult point; and to this, accordingly, the chief consul gave his personal superintendence. The guns were dismounted, grooved into the trunks of trees, hollowed out so as to suit each calibre, and then dragged on by sheer strength of muscle—not less than an hundred soldiers being sometimes harnessed to a single cannon. The carriages and wheels, being taken to pieces, were slung on poles, and borne on men's shoulders. The powder and shot, packed into boxes of fir-wood, formed the lading of all the mules that could be collected over a wide range of the Alpine country.

These preparations had been made during the week that elapsed between Bonaparte's arrival at Geneva and the commencement of Lannes's march. He himself travelled sometimes on a mule, but mostly on foot, cheering on the soldiers who had the burden of the great guns. The fatigue undergone is not to be described. The men in front durst not halt to breathe, because the least stoppage there might have thrown the column behind into confusion, on the brink of a deadly precipice; and those in the rear had to flounder knee deep, through snow and ice trampled into sludge by the feet and hoofs of the preceding divisions. Happily the march of Napoleon was not harrassed like that of Hannibal, by the assaults of living enemies. The mountaineers, on the contrary, docked to reap the liberal rewards which he offered to all who were willing to lighten the drudgery of his troops.

On the 16th of May, Napoleon slept at the convent of St. Maurice; and in the course of the following days the whole army passed the Great St. Bernard. It was on the 20th that Bonaparte himself halted an hour at the convent of the Hospitallers, which stands on the summit of this mighty mountain. The good fathers of the monastery had furnished every soldier as he passed with a luncheon of bread and cheese and a glass of wine; and for this kindness they received the warm acknowledgments of the chief. It was here that he took his leave of a peasant youth, who had walked by him as a guide, all the way from the convent of St. Maurice. Napoleon conversed freely with the young man and was much interested with his simplicity. At parting, Bonaparte asked the guide some particulars about his personal situation; and having heard his reply, gave him money, and a billet to the head of the monastery of St. Maurice. The peasant delivered it accordingly, and was surprised to find that, in consequence of a scrap of writing which he could not read, his worldly comforts were to be permanently increased. The object of this generosity remembered, nevertheless, but little of his conversation with the consul. He described Napoleon as being "a very dark man," (this was the effect of the Syrian sun) and having an eye that, notwithstanding his affability, he could not encounter without a sense of fear. The only saying of the hero which he treasured in his memory was, "I have spoiled a hat among your mountains; well, I shall find a new one on the other side." Thus spoke Napoleon, wringing the rain from his covering as he approached the hospice of St. Bernard. The guide described, however, very strikingly, the effects of Bonaparte's appearance and voice, when any obstacle checked the advance of his soldiery along that fearful wilderness which is called emphatically, "The Valley of Desolation." A single look or word was commonly sufficient to set all in motion. But if the way presented some new and insuperable difficulty, the consul bade the drums beat and the trumpets sound, as if for the charge; and this never failed. Of such gallant temper were the spirits which Napoleon had at command, and with such admirable skill did he wield them!

From Dakewell's Observations on Mental Affections.

ANECDOTES OF INSANITY.

A gentleman who was under a violent paroxysm of mania, and confined to his room, was called upon by an old acquaintance, who had not seen him for several years. Upon going into his apartment, the gentlemen said to the person who conducted him, "Will he know me, Sir?" "O dear, yes, he knows every body," was the reply. This the maniack overheard, and laughed. "What do you laugh at Sir?" said the attendant. "Why," said he, "I don't know every body but I know all those I used to know," putting out his hand at the same time to the stranger, and calling him by his name.

I once knew a patient, who was so violent and vindictive, that the securing of his arms and legs, so that he could neither strike nor kick, was absolutely necessary. In this state he continued raving, and abusing all about him. Among other things, he observed respecting himself, "What a shame for a man of my consequence to be kept as a prisoner! what is the reason of it? what has brought me to this?" I replied in a whisper "Your pride, Sir!" Never shall I forget that look of rationality and placidity, which his countenance immediately assumed. "Give me your hand, Sir; give me your hand, Sir," said he: "I had thought you must be mad for treating me as you have done; but I ask your pardon; you are a wise and understanding man, for admitting pride to be my complaint, you have taken a most excellent way to cure me. Your physick, and your authority, and these shackles, will cure pride, I'll warrant them."

Walking out with a patient on one occasion, we met a gentleman of our acquaintance; to whom, after the first salutations were over the patient said, "Well, Sir I don't eat the bread of idleness at Spring Valt. What with eating and drinking, taking medicine, and walking over these hills, &c. our time is pretty well taken up. Besides, I am busy composing a book. I am writing a sort of epitome of the history of the life of man, from his cradle to his grave." "Very well," said the gentleman, "when you publish your book, I shall take care to be a purchaser." "What," said the patient, "publish a book—a madman publish a book—why, was such a thing ever heard of?" "O, but," said the gentleman, "you don't call yourself a madman." "No, no," he replied, "I don't call myself a madman, but master does." And truly I did, for a more confirmed and inveterate case of insanity I never saw.

At another time, I was walking out with him, and we were accosted by a beggar. "Art thou in real distress?" said my patient. "I am, indeed," replied the beggar. "Dost thou want food?" said the other. "I do, sir, I assure you," was the reply. "Well, then," said the patient, "silver and gold have I none, but such as I have will I give unto thee. I will give thee advice: go into the next village and feign thyself mad: the people will then take thee up, and carry thee to that house above there, and they'll give thee plenty of food. I want to fast, and they will not let me. The scripture says 'fast and pray;' now I only want to fast and pray, but as they will not let me fast, I cannot pray." I must observe here, that previous to his being put under my care, he had fasted six days at one time; but, upon seeing me, he said it was all over, and he began to eat: and yet in a little time he was as obstinate with me, till he found I could force food into him with little trouble. He then said he might as well take it quietly. At one time, observing that we were annoyed with some sheep breaking into our premises, from the adjoining waste, he called out to me, "Master, I'll tell you how to keep those sheep away; you have only to catch the leader, and drench him with some of your physick, and hang me if either he or any of the flock will ever come again."

A gentleman who had made his escape from the asylum, after being taken, came to me and said, "I confess that I have been wrong in escaping; and to put you at ease on my account, I promise, upon my honour, that from this time I will never run away,—and you well know I am too tenacious of my honour ever to violate it." Soon after this, however, he again made his escape, and I was put to much trouble and expense in having him brought back. On his return he came with great confidence to shake hands with me. "No," I said, "I will not shake hands with any such persons as you are; a pretty expense we have been at! What do you think! did you not promise upon your word of honour that you would never run away?"

With a most sly look, he replied, "Sir, I did not run away, I walked every step."

Once, at breakfast, the morning being fine, I said, "Well, now ladies, for a long walk! nothing like exertion in these cases; nothing is got by sitting still." "True," said one of them, "how should the mind regain its rational powers if it is not rationally exercised?" These words should be written in letters of gold, and placed in every house where the cure of insanity is attempted, and yet they were spoken by one really insane.

If any mental attack can be made upon the hallucination of insanity, with a prospect of success, it must be the shafts of ridicule. I have often been pleased with the adroitness of my patients, though in ridiculing the folly of other patients, they were affected in a similar way themselves. Even in those low, desponding cases, which require every possible consolation, I have frequently observed, with great delight, the sympathies of friendship exerted by those afflicted with the same disease, with the most happy effect; so that under constant and judicious regulations, the insane may be the best society for each other. But it is not in wit or repartee, or in the occasional expression of the social feelings, that the nature of insanity can be determined. Those afflicted with this malady may generally, under proper management, be rendered agreeable and intelligent companions, capable of communicating any intelligence they previously possessed; and while those of a lower rank in life shall be capable of useful employment, those of a higher shall be able to exhibit their superior education to the best advantage.

From the Washington City Chronicle.

THE ROSE.

This beautiful shrub is found in almost every country, and in almost every country its beauty and fragrance have made it the ornament of the garden, and an object of admiration. Nature, as if delighted with this exquisite production of her hand, has multiplied its species and varieties to an almost unlimited extent; and the poet has sung its praises in all nations and in all ages. It has been wedded to the nightingale, and its fragrance and beauty have been the theme of every tongue. In Shiraz and Cashmere the rose is peculiarly odiferous, and yields the most fragrant otto, or essential oil.

Who has not heard of the vale of Cashmere,
With its roses, the brightest that earth ever gave.

Moore.

Rhodes is said to owe its name to the immense quantity of roses which it produces. In the East this flower is particularly esteemed. The Guebers believe that when Abraham was thrown into the fire, by order of Nimrod, the flame turned into a bed of roses. The Turks conceived that it sprung from the perspiration of Mahomet, and they cause a rose to be sculptured on the monument of all ladies that die unmarried. The Mythological writers say that Apollo caused Rhodante, Queen of Corinth, in consequence of her extreme beauty, to be changed into a rose. The first rose is said to have been given by the god of Love to Harpocrates, the god of silence, to engage him to conceal the amours of his mother Venus, and hence it was made the symbol of silence. A rose was always placed above the heads of the guest in the banqueting rooms, to banish restraint, and to denote that nothing said there should be repeated elsewhere: and thus originated the saying sub rosa, under the rose, when a secret was to be kept. The perfume of this flower is thus accounted for by the fabulous authors: Love, at a feast of Olympus, in the midst of a lively dance, overset, with a stroke of his wing, a goblet of nectar, which falling on the rose, embalmed it with the delicious fragrance it still retains. And Catullus thus accounts for the colour of this flower, it having been originally white:

"While the emerald queen of joy
Flies to protect her lovely boy,
On whom the jokers and fool-makes,
She leans upon a thorned rose,
And while the wound with crimson flows,
The snowy flower feels her blood, and blushes."

The petals of the rose are the only part of the flower that imparts the odorous matter to water, both by distillation and infusion. The otto, or es-essential oil, is obtained from various species of the rose. The odour, though generally agreeable, has in some instances produced faintings, hysterical affections, inflammations of the eyes, &c. Orfila mentions an instance of a celebrated painter who could not remain in any room where there were roses without being in a short time attacked with violent cephalgia, succeeded by fainting. Dr. Priestly thinks these effects are owing to the carbonic acid gas which these flowers exhale. We will conclude this article with an account of the process employed in Asia, in making essential oil or otto of roses. 40 lbs. of roses, with their calices, are put into a still, with 60 lbs. of water; the mass being well mixed in the still, is placed over a gentle fire, and when fumes begin to rise, the cap and pipe are properly fixed and luted. When the impregnated water begins to come over, the fire is lessened by gentle degrees, and the distillation continued, until 30 lbs. of water have come over. This water is to be poured upon 40 lbs. of fresh roses, and thence are to be drawn from 15 to 20 lbs. of distilled water. It is then poured into earthenware pans or tinned metal, and left exposed to the fresh air for the night, the otto or oil will be found in the morning congealed and swimming on the surface of the water.

WESTERN ADVENTURES.

BY THE HON. JUDGE HALL.

Among the adventurers whom Boon described as having reinforced his little colony, was a young gentleman named Smith, who had been a Major in the militia of Virginia, and possessed a full share of the gallantry and noble spirit of his native state. In the absence of Boon, he was chosen, on account of his military rank and talents, to command the rude citadel, which contained all the wealth of this patriarchal band—their wives, their children, and their herds. It held also an object particularly dear to this young soldier—a lady, the daughter of one of the settlers, to whom he had pledged his affections. It came to pass upon a certain day, when the siege was over, tranquility restored, and the employments of husbandry resumed, that this young lady with a female companion, strolled out, as young ladies in love are very apt to do, along the banks of the Kentucky river. Having rambled about for some time, they espied a canoe lying by the shore, and in a frolic stepped into it, with the determination of visiting a neighbour on the opposite bank. It seems that they were not so well skilled in navigation as the Lady of the Lake, who paddled her own canoe very dexterously; instead of gliding to the point of destination, they were whirled about by the stream, and at length thrown on a sand bar, from which they were obliged to wade ashore. Full of mirth, excited by their wild adventure, they hastily arranged their dresses, and were proceeding to climb the banks when three Indians, rushing from a neighboring covert, seized the fair wanderers, and forced them away. Their savage captors, evincing no sympathy for their distress, nor allowing them time for rest or reflection, hurried them along during the whole day by rugged and thorny paths. Their shoes were worn off by the rocks, their clothes torn and their feet and limbs lacerated, and stained with blood. To heighten their misery, one of the savages began to make love to Miss — (the intended of Major Smith,) and while goading her along with a pointed stick, promised in recompense for their sufferings, to make her his squaw. This at once roused all the energies of her mind, and called its powers into action. In hope that her friends would soon pursue them, she broke the twigs as she passed along, and delayed the party as much as possible by tardy and blundering steps. But why dwell on the heartless and unmanly cruelty of savages? The day and the night passed, and another day of agony had nearly rolled over the heads of the afflicted females, when their conductors halted to cook a wild repast of Buffalo meat.

The ladies were soon missed from the garrison. The natural courage and sagacity of Smith, now heightened by love, gave him the wings of the wind and the fierceness of a tiger. The light traces of female feet led him to the place of embarkation—the canoe was traced to the opposite shore—the deep print of the moccasin in the sand told the rest; and the agonized Smith, accompanied by a few of his best woodsmen, pursued "the spoil encumbered foe." The track once discovered, they kept with that unerring sagacity so peculiar to our hunters. The bended grass, the disentangled briars, and the compressed shrub, afforded the only, but to them the certain, indications of the route of the enemy. When they had sufficiently ascertained the general course of the retreat of the Indians, Smith quitted the trace, assuring his companions that they would fall in with them at the pass of a certain stream ahead, for which he now struck a direct course, thus gaining on the foe, who had taken the most difficult paths. Arrived at the stream they traced its course until they discovered the water newly thrown upon the rocks. Smith, leaving his party, now crept forward upon his hands and feet, until he discovered one of the savages seated by a fire, and with a deliberate aim, shot him through the heart.

The women rushed towards their deliverer and, recognizing Smith, clung to him in the transports of newly awakened joy and gratitude, while a second Indian sprang towards him with his tomahawk. Smith, disengaged himself from the ladies, aimed a blow at his antagonist with his rifle, which the savage avoided by springing aside, but at the same moment the latter received a mortal wound from another hand. The other, and only remaining Indian fell, in attempting to escape. Smith, with his interesting charge, returned in triumph to the fort, where his gallantry, no doubt, was repaid by the sweetest of all rewards.

THE FESTIVAL OF SAINT JOHN THE BAPTIST was celebrated on the 24th ult. more generally, and with a better spirit than for many years before; and the result has shown how false are the assertions, and how fruitless the labours of the enemies of the masonick institution. Persecution has strengthened, instead of weakening, the bonds of friendship; and the brethren were never more firmly and honestly devoted to the support of their order, and to the cultivation of its benevolent principles, than at the present time. They pursue their way with the even tenour of moderation, free from inconsiderate zeal, and regardless of the censures and threats of their enemies. The spirit manifested by the friends of masonry in every quarter, on the occasion, was in the highest degree laudable, and creditable to the institution, as well as to the individuals as citizens. The ceremonies of the day were in many places connected with works of great public utility. The corner stones of several edifices, dedicated to divine purposes, were laid; and other works commenced, the beneficial effects of which upon the moral and physical energies of the people, will be felt for ever. We have collected the following summary from various sources, and shall hereafter, in our masonick department, give more particular accounts from other quarters.

In Greenville, Greene county, the day was well observed by Newry Lodge, and many visiting brethren. The Catekill Recorder says, "Nearly two hundred of the fraternity and about one hundred and fifty ladies formed the procession which proceeded to the church, where; with the appropriate ceremonies, a discourse was delivered by the Rev. Joseph Prentiss, A. M., Chaplain to the Grand Chapter of the state, and Rector of St. Luke's church, in Catskill."

In Dedham, Massachusetts, a sermon was delivered by Rev. Paul Bean, and an Address by Comp. Nahum Capen of Boston. Between four and five hundred ladies and gentlemen partook of a dinner at Mr. Francis Alden's.

At Sandy Bay, Massachusetts, the corner stone of the third Universalist Meeting House, was laid by Tyran Lodge, in presence of a large concourse of spectators. A very appropriate address was delivered by Rev. Thos. Jones, and prayers were offered by Rev. Thos. Whittemore. The ceremonies were highly interesting and impressive and the audience retired much gratified with the services.

In New Hartford, Oneida county, the day was celebrated by about three hundred of the fraternity. Elder Smith, a Baptist Clergyman, addressed the audience in a very appropriate and impressive manner. A dinner was prepared by Mr. Strong.

In Chepachet, Rhode Island, the Grand Lodge of the State held their annual meeting and paid due observance to the day. A procession was forward at the Hall of Friendship Lodge, which, (says the Providence Cadet) after being joined by a large number of ladies, proceeded, with an excellent band of musick, to the meeting-house, where an appropriate address was delivered by Rev. David Pickering which was highly approved by the members of the Masonick Fraternity, and was well received by the large concourse of ladies and gentlemen assembled to witness the ceremonies of this interesting occasion. After the services at the meeting-house, the procession passed through the village to the place where, under a long extended awning a dinner was provided by Mr. Cyrus Cooke for the members of the Fraternity, and such ladies and gentlemen as chose to partake.

In Middletown, Rutland county, Vermont, the festival was more numerously attended than any ever previously witnessed in that county. An interesting sermon was preached by Rev. H. Practor, of Rutland; and (says the Rutland Herald) the proceedings throughout evinced that the efforts making to subvert the institution of masonry, have only the effect to stimulate its members to renewed zeal in its behalf.

As far as our information extends, the fourth instant was a rainy, and, without doors, a disagreeable day in many parts of the country. Within doors, however, we believe it passed off with as much zest and good cheer as it would have done if the heavens had smiled, and all without had answered the prayers of the most fervent supplicants for a glorious day. In this city the usual routine of ceremonies was observed. Cannons were fired; the bells were rung; orations were delivered to audiences quite as contented to hear them as if the heavens had been less lowering; and dinners were eaten with as good appetites, and toasts drank with as patriotic feelings, as men are wont to be possessed of on such occasions. The oration of Mr. HARMAN is well spoken of by those who heard it—we were not of the number, but as it is to be published, we shall have an opportunity of reading it. The Apprentices' Society had also their orator, Mr. J. D. KEARNEY, whose production is said to have been very creditable to its author and particularly well adapted to the occasion.

It cannot be denied that the weather did (as it was eminently calculated to) dampen the mental as well as the bodily feelings of our citizens, and that the enjoyments of the day were rather too much of a single nature to suit the taste of every one. In all the cities and villages that we have heard from, the usual spirit predominated, but a universal complaint is raised against the weather. A correspondent who witnessed the ceremonies at Greenbush, has politely furnished us with the following notice of Mr. Brooks's oration.

"James G. Brooks, the well known author of Florio, delivered an oration at Greenbush on the 4th inst. It did not detract from his high reputation, being distinguished by its beautiful imagery and language. Our national anniversary has furnished few, if any better addresses. The sentiments used by Mr. Brooks were highly poetical; his allusion to the existence of man, over whom, he said, the dark shadow of uncertainty bends while in his cradle, frowns when in his warm noon of life, and folds its gloomy arm around him when a corpse,—the contrast which he drew between our present and our past condition,—his vivid portraiture of the causes that should impel us, if danger ever again visited us, to, all characterized his address as one of genuine talent. He spoke in glowing language of the sufferings of those relics of our revolution, men whose names will be the battle cry of future fields, and commented most feelingly on the tardiness of the justice awarded them. 'Open,' said he, 'the grave of St. Clair, and shower gold upon his coffin-lid, and if the dead can speak, he will say, your gratitude comes too late.'

'Mr. Brooks has set an example which we hope to see followed on future occasions. To what better purpose can the talent and genius of our country be applied, than to herald forth in the thoughts and words that genius alone inspires, the remembrances of the perilous olden day,

'When blood ran free as festal wine,' and (to use Mr. B.'s words) 'to awaken our attention to the light of glory that burns in our fathers' sepulchres.' "

MASONICK CEREMONIES. The corner stone of one of the eastern locks of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, was laid on the 4th inst. under the direction of the Grand Lodge of the District of Columbia, assisted by Washington Encampment, Temple Royal Arch Chapter, and the several subordinate lodges of the district. The President, the principal officers of the government, the foreign ministers and representatives, and the officers and directors of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, attended at the ceremonies.

The corner stone of the Viaduct, by which the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road will cross the Patapsco, was also laid on the 4th inst. by Patmos Lodge, and the Grand Lodge of the state of Maryland. The dampness of the day prevented the venerable CARROLL from attending and officiating.

THEATRE. It is gratifying to those who do visit the Theatre, to know that the managers continue their exertions to merit a liberal patronage, whether they do or do not receive it. The house was never under better regulations; nor was there ever a better company of comedians connected with it. Finn and Jefferson, especially, are rare spirits: we should think their performances might cure the blues and the dyspepsia, if properly attended to, and therefore we would recommend the reader to hear the advice and prescriptions of Dr. Logick, in which character Mr. Finn intends to be at home this evening.

Herr Cline, the celebrated tight rope dancer, performed last evening, and received great applause. He is, without doubt, unequalled in his profession. He certainly has greater command over the powers of his body than any other individual whom we ever witnessed.

From the (Philadelphia) Pennsylvania Inquirer.

The public sentiment against the anti-masonick nomination of Mr. RITNER has promptly developed itself, both in the newspapers, and by individual expressions of feeling and opinion. We have not met with a single public journal in the state which has approved that nomination, or the principles upon which it was made. Some of the editors call him a "fence-man," others ask, "why not call him the anti-democratic candidate at once?" Several of the gentlemen named on committees by the anti-masonick convention in different counties have publicly withdrawn their names, on the ground that they find anti-masonry to be a mere cloak for political management, chicanery and ambition. But now, says the Lancaster Gazette, "the secret is out; the alarm is given; and no man can be any longer blinded to the real objects of this new self-created society, the anti-masonick brotherhood. This discovery was all that was wanting to insure the withdrawal of all those respectable and honest men whose motives in joining it were pure." The truth is, that the most popular man in the state of Pennsylvania would have been prostrated by the accepted nomination of the late corn-stalk militia assemblage of anti-masons at Harrisburg. How, then, could its leaders, weak as they were, suppose for a moment that Joseph Ritner could be sustained by such a nomination? There is a sterling good sense in the people of Pennsylvania, which indignantly repels every thing like absurd prejudice and juggling imposture. No Morgan has disappeared here to give countenance to the clamours against freemasonry. Whether that person was murdered, or simply taken away to the other side of the Niagara, our citizens know that the act is more feelingly and deeply abhorred and reprobated by the fraternity in Pennsylvania than by any body else. They also daily see that those who belong to that fraternity are among the most honest, correct, upright and intelligent men in society; and it would be impossible to produce an extensive prejudice against such men. Under all these circumstances, we presume that this will be the last, as it was the first, formal attempt in Pennsylvania to enlist the prejudices against masonry on the side of political knavery and profligacy: and we hope that the anti-masonick ambassador from "the central committee of New-York" has gone home with improved manners and a better sense of decorum, as well as of the people of Pennsylvania, than he appears to have brought with him.

ITEMS.

Meteorick Phenomenon. "On the evening of the 8th of May, in Monroe county, Georgia," says the Statesman, "there was no appearance of storm or of clouds that could produce even a momentary shower, when the fire ball which we are going to describe, was discovered. It was moving with immense velocity, involved in a mass of smoke that marked its flight, like an enormous shell from a mortar, emitting an audible hissing sound, resembling the ignition of resin, and in a few seconds, exploded, like a shock of thunder, and fell to the earth." The stone sunk two feet in the ground, and when taken out was found to weigh thirty six pounds. It was covered with a black ferruginous incrustation of equal thickness over every part of it. In its interior structure it closely resembled the meteorick stones that have heretofore been described, containing perhaps a larger portion of nickel than is common. The fragments abound with brilliant metallic points. It is about 20 per cent. heavier than the celebrated stone that fell near Weston in Connecticut, in 1807 [Cin. Chron.

NATURAL PHENOMENON. In the memoirs of the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg, it is stated that in the district of Gori, in Russia, at the foot of the Ossentia mountains, there is a hill, on the stony surface of which the humidity that exudes from the rock, in summer, and in fine weather, is converted into ice of a thickness proportionate to the heat of the sun.

Morals and religion being in a very low state in Norway, a young man, not twenty years of age, named Franz Neilson, arose as a reformer about the year 1778. He preached scriptural doctrines and denounced the pastors and churches, preserving, at the same time, such purity of conduct that his enemies could find no good occasion of reproach against him. His success was so considerable, that he was summoned to Copenhagen as an innovator, and condemned to the galleys, but he had secured, by his faithfulness, so many friends, even among the clergy, that his sentence was commuted into some trifling punishment; he continued preaching the truth until his death, about fifteen years ago, and left behind him about thirty thousand followers, whom he had drawn from the pale of the established Norwegian Church.

Anecdote for the Ladies. The prison report of Connecticut, among other things, contains a short exposition of the difficulties and vexation which the officers of the prison have to encounter in the government of the four female convicts under their care, and the directors most ungallantly assert that these four make more trouble than the whole remaining ninety-three convicts of the other sex. But not content with this, they repeat a remark made to them, as they pretend, by the superintendent of the Auburn state prison. "I have (says he) under my care about four hundred and fifty male prisoners, and nine females; and I could cheerfully undertake the care of an additional four hundred and fifty men, to be rid of the nine women." What a brute! [Natl. Intelligencer.

The subjoined queer Notice is cut from the advertising columns of the Newport (N. H.) Spectator:—

NOTICE. The Crazy Preacher, Poor Dan, and the Yankee Stranger, have agreed, if the Lord will, to meet at 12 o'clock, at Enfield Meeting House, N. H. on the first Sabbath day in September, 1829, there to have a Free Quaker Meeting in spite of the Devil and his angels.

DANIEL BROCKLEBANK.

Plainfield, N. H. June, 1829.

It is rumoured that the new Pope intends to abolish celibacy among the clergy. It is remarkable that the Romish Church should ever have required celibacy of its ministers, since Peter, the great patron of that faith, is the only one among the apostles, who is mentioned in the scriptures as having been married—"Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever."

A Good Living. The London Morning Post says, that by the falling in of Leases &c. the Bishoprick of London, will in about twenty years, be worth $500,000 per annum.

The King of Bavaria is on a visit to Naples, and has had the honour of bathing himself in one of the baths of Pompeii, re-opened after a lapse of 1800 years.

A block tin watch was recently sold at auction, in New-York, for $19. This is only one of the many beauties of the "American System."

Battle Royal. A Mr. Americus Vespuccius Pulsifer and a Mr. Jesse Barlow Spelman are labouring each other in the Albany Daily Advertiser. Once a comb-maker and the other comb-repairer, but "which is which" they have not yet decided. Americus Vespuccius says that he makes combs very well, and Jesse Barlow says that Americus does no such thing. And vice-versa. We are fearful if they continue to comb each other's heads, that the heads of their customers will go uncombed.

Poor Henry Dana Ward! The poor fellow has been eating bread, purchased with the wages of iniquity for several months past, and now, if his own story is to be believed, is likely to find a scarcity even of that. Is there no help for the creature? Can nothing more be afforded him from the coffers in this place?

[Livingston Journal.

The Saratoga Sentinel has the following excellent hit, accompanied with an appropriate cut:

To the Afflicted. Down hill politicians are respectfully informed that there is yet room for them in the anti-masonick ranks.

The knowing anti's whisper that the canal is under masonick influence. It will be recollected that the cap-stone of the last locks were laid with masonick ceremonies,—this accounts for it—and the unfortunate accidents on the canal, from drowning, &c., will now be placed on anti-masonick principles, to masonick violence. What wonderful discoveries are making in these days of reform. [Nor. Phoenix.

What Next? An anti-masonick catechism is publishing at Waterloo.

Half the papers throughout the country are busily engaged in making out patent definitions. From the Berkshire American we take the following:—

"Pandect—an ornamented pan."

DIED,

In this city, at 9 o'clock in the morning, on Thursday last, after a short and painful illness, Mr. HARVEY NASH, printer, aged 23. He was possessed of a mild and benevolent disposition, of frank and agreeable manners, and of principles rigidly honest and moral. Death has untimely taken him from a large circle of acquaintances, not one of whom was his enemy. His loss is universally lamented by those who knew him, and has left a vacancy in the circle where he moved, that will not easily nor speedily be filled with his equal.

On Wednesday afternoon, Mrs. ALIDA EVERTSEN, wife of John Evertsen, in the 53d year of her age.

Yesterday morning, CATHERINE, daughter of Mr. Wm. Drake, aged 4 years and 11 months.

LADIES' MAGAZINE conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, at Washington st. Boston—and by Bourns, at the Depository of Arts, 353 Broadway, New-York, & Thomas T. Ash, 120 Chestnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 50 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 600 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusion of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history and its character, and manner of its inhabitants, which Americans of either sex should be careful to acquire. But no sectional prejudices shall be admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the public, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

"QUID PRO QUO."

In threading the mazes of this strange scene,
Calm caution will teach us the way to go;
And e'er with the prudent, the rule has been,
To look with keen eye for a quid pro quo.

The young and confiding are often prone,
On the good faith of others, themselves to throw,
Reflecting not, they should first have known
That the trusted would yield them a quid pro quo.

The lawyer will tell you, (if asked, he can,
From some huge volume, authority show,)
That in all sorts of contracts 'twixt man and man,
'Tis a sine qua non, there be quid pro quo.

And woman, fair woman, 't were best for her,
This musty old maxim full well to know;
And beware, unsuspecting, to trust too far
The flatterer's promise of quid pro quo.

Her's is a warra and an open heart,
Keenly respondent to joy or wo;
And let her beware of Cupid's dart,
Unless she is sure of a quid pro quo.

The wily seducer will blandly smile,
And swear that he 's ready his truth to show;
But trust him not—'t is a luring wile—
He thinks not of giving a quid pro quo.

Care not for the worthless and trifling fop,
Whose knowledge is nought but the arts of the beau;
He 's without a heart, and you cannot hope
In return for your own, for a quid pro quo.

So, when you shall leave the parental roof,
And your all on the man of your choice bestow,
Take care that you have a convincing proof,
That affection will meet with a quid pro quo. Q.

MELANCHOLY.

Say, Melancholy, silent maid,
What are the cares that heave thy breast?
Have those who might afford thee aid,
Gone to the land of silent rest?
Or, have thy friends all fickle proved,
The gaudy flatterers of an hour?
Or, has the Demon whom thou loved,
Proved false, and owned a rival's power?

"No;—these are not the ills I mourn;
'Tis not the lover's faithless vow;
'Tis not that friends are from me torn,
That fell Despair thus clouds my brow;
I mourn in poverty forlorn,
In haunts of woe and deep distress,
And all the sufferings I have borne,
None care to know, or even guess.

In Disappointment's gloomy cell,
Where ev'ry gleam of Hope has fled,
From morn till night I constant dwell,
And seem to converse with the dead,
Here Care, and Want, and Pain are found;
Here wild Ambition meets its grave;
And strange—the Muse's dulcet sound
It's here been heard, whilst Passions rave.

I love to wander in the gloom
Of solemn midnight's silent shade,
And ruminate on mortal doom,
And muse on ev'ry hill and glade.
Ah, Philomela! sweet thy note;
'Child of the melancholy song,'
I love to hear thy music float,
The woodland groves and hills along.

I love to see the setting sun
As sinking in the glowing west;
His daily task completely done,
How mild he shines, and sinks to rest!

Behold, upon the western hill,
As far as human eye can reach,
Sol's darting rays are lingering still,
And thus a lesson seems to teach;

That man, a poor and helpless worm,
In youth, with lustre and delight,
May rise, as beauteous in his frown,
As fair, as splendid, and as bright;
But soon his race of life is run,
His hopes, and joys, and loves are fled;
Scarce have his pleasures well begun
Ere he is numbered with the dead."

Ah, Melancholy! hush thy strain—
The tale you tell is often told;
Man loves the privilege to complain,
And boast the world is false and cold.
Nought but RELIGION can repose
The raging tumult of the soul;
'Tis this can calm our deepest woes,
And soothe the mind when billows roll.

FAREWELL.

"The why—the where—what boots it now to tell,
Since all must end in that wild word—Farewell!"

Farewell!

The leaf on the ocean,
That floats on alone,
Eternal in motion,
Its fate is my own—
On the dark sea of years
My lone bark is cast,
And its destiny veers
To depths of the past.

Farewell!

Although misery's scath
May furrow my brow,
Though the breath of its wrath
Is felt by me now—
Even there shall my soul,
Unhindered and free,
And defy controul,
Bow only to thee.

Farewell!

I had hoped—but never!
For quenched is the gleam,
And vanished forever,
Like drops in the stream.
The wild comet afar,
All gleaming in fire,
Might as well wed a star
In firelessness of ire.

Farewell!

As dew on the mountain,
As foam on the sea,
Has Hope's purest fountain
Now unished from me—
But while being may last,
Shall Memory's beam
Shed a light o'er the past,
And brighten life's stream.

"JESUS WEPT."—JOHN XI. 35.

"Hadst thou been here, my holy Lord," the mourning sister said,
"My brother dear had not now ranked among the slumbering dead;"
The Saviour looked, and when he saw the anguish in her eyes,
Within his troubled spirit then deep groans there did arise.
"Where have ye laid him," Jesus said to those who stood around;
They say unto him, "Come, O Lord, and view the sacred ground;"

Then Jesus wept!—that man of pain, of sorrow, and of trial,
Unto his feelings gave no more a forced, severe denial.

"Behold his love," the wondering Jews who stood around him, cried—

"O could not he have caused, that man not yet so soon had died?"

Again our blessed Saviour groaned, his tears again did flow.
As forth unto the grave he walked, with solemn step and slow;—

Yes! him who now at God's right hand, doth sit in judgment there,

Then wept o'er mortal griefs and woes, and dried the sister's tear.

O Jesus, unto us that love unbounded show, we pray,
And form our hearts to stand the test of the great Judgment Day.

GOOD NIGHT.

"We met but in one giddy dance,
Good night joined hands with greeting,
And twenty thousand things may chance
Before our second meeting."

Good night to thee, lady!—though many
Have joined in the dance to-night,
Thy form was the fairest of any,
Where all was seducing and bright;—
Thy smile was the softest and dearest,
Thy form the most sylph-like of all,
And thy voice the most gladsome and clearest
That ere had a partner in thrall.

Good night to thee, lady!—'t is over,
The waltz—the quadrille—and the song—
The whispered "farewell" of the lover,
The heartless "adieu" of the throng;
The heart that was throbbing with pleasure,—
The eye-lid that longed for repose,
The beaux that were dreaming of treasure,—
The girls that were dreaming of beaux.

'T is over—the lights are all dying,
The coaches are driving away,—
And many a fair one is sighing,
And many a false one is gay;
And beauty counts over her numbers
Of conquests as homeward she drives,—
And some have gone home to their slumbers,
And some have gone back to their wives.

And I, while my cab in the shower
Is waiting, the last at the door,
Am looking all round for the flower
That fell from your wreath on the floor;
I'll keep it—if but to remind me,
Though withered and faded its hue,
Wherever next season may find me,
Of England—of Almack's—and you!

There are tones that will haunt us, though lonely
Our path be o'er mountains or sea,
There are looks that will part from us only
When memory ceases to be;
There are hopes that our burden can lighten,
Though toilsome and steep be the way,—
And dreams that, like moonlight, can brighten,
With a light that is dearer than day.

There are names that we cherish, though nameless,
For aye on the lip they may be,—
There are hearts that though fettered are tameless,
And thoughts unexpressed—but still free!
And some are too grave for a rover,
And some for a husband too light;
The ball and my dream are all over,
Good night to thee, lady!—Good night!

MASONICK RECORD.

ANTI-MASONRY—MASONRY.

From the Village Record. By the Hon. Charles Miner, late Representative in Congress, from Pennsylvania.

"STRIKE, but HEAR"—said the Grecian. Borrowing the exclamation of Themistocles, a free and accepted mason exclaims—"STRIKE, but HEAR!" The excitement against freemasonry and masons, which is now spreading through various parts of this state is too apparent not to be seen, and altogether too important not to be noticed. Meetings are called in every part of the county of Chester, of those opposed to freemasonry; a more general meeting is appointed to be held at West Chester, and delegates are to be chosen to a state convention to be holden at an early day at Harrisburgh. A freemason myself, I cannot view these proceedings without intense anxiety and unaffected alarm. Regarding with the profoundest respect the good opinion of my fellow citizens, the consequences of the proceedings to my social rights, and to the interests of my family, are to my mind, I confess to you, a subject of anxious solicitude.

Permit me, before this enlightened and upright community, to say, that in avowing myself a freemason, I am wholly unconscious that I make any confession of guilt. In entering into the lodge, nearly thirty years ago, no admonition was given me that I was offending any law of the republic; that I was violating any duty to my fellow men—or that I was, in the slightest degree, running counter to public sentiment. Among the masons of that day who stood conspicuous in the lodge, were Soldiers of the Revolution, who had met danger in its most awful form; who had experienced every sort of privation, and every species of suffering to establish the liberties of their country. They were ardent patriots—liberal republicans—kind neighbours, and honest, benevolent men. Then there were magistrates high in office; one of them whose venerable form I still see as I first saw him in the east, wearing the master's badge; he had been bred and was still attached to the society of Friends. A more correct and amiable man—a more upright magistrate—a more true lover of his country and fellow men, never existed. It was a time of high party excitement—yet men of both parties were there; and there almost alone did they meet with the appellation of brothers; softening by social and fraternal intercourse, the asperities growing out of differences in political opinion. The Episcopalian was there. A minister of the Methodist denomination often attended the lodge. There I met an unfortunate emigrant from France, driven into exile by the revolution: masonry was his sweetest solace under poignant afflictions: a German; sons of green Erin were there. As he is gone to another, and I fondly trust a better world, I may mention his venerated name, and say that general JOHN STEELE, of Lancaster county, was often present; a man of exemplary piety—of great moral worth, and high political estimation. He served his beloved country in the field in the dark hour of danger. In the councils of his country he shone in happier time; and at the communion table of the Presbyterian church he bowed humbly to the covenant of free grace, and worshipped according to the strictest rules of his sect. Could I imagine there was ought of evil which received the decided sanction, and attracted the constant presence of these good men from distant climes—of various religious sects—of different political professions?

Thus attracted I joined the Lodge. Every meeting was opened by a solemn appeal to the Divine Creator of the universe, imploring his countenance and blessing. Every principle that I heard inculcated was one of benevolence and charity, diffusive as the air we breathe, and free as the cheering and vivifying rays of yon glorious luminary.

The world saw; and I heard no censure. Washington had been a Mason: I had never heard it enumerated among his faults: DE WITT CLINTON, an ornament to his country, and to the age in which he lived, was Grand Master of Masons in New-York; a whisper of censure upon that score, even from his enemies, never reached my ear. Mr. MILNOR, now an eminent minister of the Episcopal Church in New-York, was Grand Master of Masons of Pennsylvania. That it was ever raised against him as an objection, I have yet to learn. In Russia, Germany; in bigoted, despotick Spain, I knew that tyrants had sworn deadly hostility to the Masonick order, upon the avowed ground that they were too ardent friends to Civil Liberty; while in free countries I supposed the institution had been cherished, being considered as favourable to the cause of Freedom and the equal rights of mankind. They were Free Masons—the name was odious to despots; and I had much reason to suppose acceptable in countries where the equal rights of man are held dear. The poor and the rich, the mechanic—the merchant—the farmer—the professional man, meet in the Lodge together on equal terms.

Having advanced past the active period of busy life, it is many years since I have seen the inside of a Lodge, and long time since I withdrew from being a member. To this day, I say it with sincerity, I never heard an immoral, an irreligious, or an Aristocratic principle supported in the Lodge, as sustained by Freemasonry.

Shall I not then be pardoned if I express the deep surprise and sorrow with which I behold the course pursued by the anti-mason combinations against us. What ill have we done, fellow-citizens! Wherein have we offended! We are very few in number—wholly inconsiderable. We have no defence but in our innocence and the protecting good will of our fellow citizens. The publick must save us from those who seem to be pursuing us to ruin, or we are totally lost. We have neither wealth—nor influence—nor power—nor numbers, to enable us to cope with the fearful array that is marshaling against us. What do we ask! We desire no peculiar favour, but simply ask for justice—for sheer justice. Let us be judged like the rest of our fellow citizens; by our own conduct—by our individual merit or demerit. If it was wholly innocent on our part when we entered the Lodge and became Free Masons, would it not be cruel as the grave to punish us for doing that which was neither unlawful at the time—nor contrary to publick sentiment, as it had then been expressed! Our constitution declares that no ex-post facto law shall be passed—that is, that no action, not unlawful at the time it was committed, shall be declared unlawful afterwards, and punished as such. And the reason for this provision, was the manifest injustice and cruelty of such proceeding. For who would be safe! If no land mark was placed: if no beacon was raised:—if no warning was given—who would know when they were walking into error and danger, or pursuing their course in safety!

Some Masons in the state of New York, may have been guilty of crimes. There are bad men in all societies. Let the wings of swift vengeance carry the severest sanction of violated Law to the extinction of the offenders. They find in us no advocates to defend—no apologists to screen—no friends to deprecate the just visitation of the severest penalties of the law.

But it is impossible to perceive with what justice the crimes of those men, a thousand miles off, can be properly visited upon our heads, or that we should be punished for offences which we abhor—in which, in thought, word or deed, we have in no manner participated, either as principals or accessaries, before or after the fact.

What bloody crimes have been committed in the name of our pure and holy religion, by persons ardently professing to be Christians! Will any one say, that the whole Church of Christ should be condemned for these heinous and bloody persecutions? If not, why should the whole Society of Masons be punished for the offence of some of its wicked members?

We have witnessed the excitement in New-York, and noted its course and consequences. Many benevolent and good men there, as here, joined in the denunciation of Masonry, meaning undoubtedly well; but look at the next step. Ambitious men viewing the excitement, and with the keen scent of the eagle for its prey, saw that they might turn it to their own account, and make it subserve their own private purposes. Men who were not Masons, but were eager for office, and athirst for political distinction, having among Masons political rivals, seized the flowing mane of the flying courser, mounted, and rode into power. The spirit of anti-masonry, honest in purpose, and pure in zeal there, as it undoubtedly is here, was soon perverted to the purposes of political ambition, and to further the views of aspirants for office. Ambitious men attended the anti-masonick meetings—took an active part therein—declaimed feelingly against Masonry and Masons—drew resolutions and signed addresses, by these means became popular, and mounted into office. Events showed that this was their sole purpose. So flagrantly apparent has this become, that thousands of good men who originally entered into the anti-masonick ranks there, if our information is correct, have left them with dissatisfaction. Is there not danger that such may be the case here—and ought it not, fellow-citizens, to be guarded against, with the utmost vigilance?

The purity and excellence of character of many of those who are zealous in extending the anti-masonick excitement, preclude the idea that they entertain any political views in the course they pursue, or that they are actuated by the slightest motives of ambition. It is respectfully submitted to the publick, whether the utmost care ought not to be taken to prevent the anti-masonick party from assuming, as it has done in New-York, a political complexion, and thus being perverted from its ostensible purpose, creating more mischief than its most zealous friends even hope to remedy.

Of one very important matter, my mind is satisfied; which is, that the gentlemen who take the lead in the anti-masonick measures here, are going further than they deliberately mean to go, or are fully aware that they are going. It was natural, that in the resolutions they adopt, the form used in the state of New-York, should be copied; for I suppose no one will pretend that any thing has taken place in Chester county, among the few and scattered members, that would justify the solemn declaration at a public meeting, that "Freemasonry tends to infatuate its members to a violation of all social and civil rights!"

Before Heaven I can express the earnest hope and belief, that nothing in the conduct of the few and generally very orderly citizens, whom I know as Masons in Chester county, has warranted so very severe an expression of censure. Men, in common justice, ought to be judged by their professions and their conduct. It would be painful in the extreme to believe that any Masons in Chester county had said or done that which would warrant the denunciation, which, if just, ought to banish them from the country, or send them to the Penitentiary.

The Resolution, "That we cannot give our support to Free-Masons for political stations in the councils and government of our common country," appears to follow as a consequence of the ill character given to them in the preceding quotation. This seems distinctly to have a political bearing. Masons are denounced as holding principles violating all social and civil order—and we will not vote for them. They shall be excluded from all public trusts—no public employment shall be conferred upon them—they shall be henceforth and forever excluded from the service of the country, and no longer share in the duties, the honour and emoluments of office—they shall be effectually disfranchised and dishonoured, as unworthy of trust, and confidence; and faith, and honour!

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From Sullivan's Journal for April.

CHLORIDE OF LIME

Is manufactured on a very large scale, at the Maryland Chemical Works at Baltimore. A large chamber lined with lead is made use of, and about 5000 lbs. of hydrate of lime is placed thinly on moveable shelves, the chlorine gas is then introduced into the chamber and is absorbed by the lime, the top shelves are saturated first, the lime is then stirred and the shelves reserved, the top placed at the bottom and the bottom at the top, and so on through the whole, introducing additional quantities of Chlorine as the shelves are transposed, and the gas absorbed or united. The Chloride thus made is considered fully equal to the best bleaching salt which can be imported.

It is an article extensively employed in the arts; especially in bleaching; one grain of it will destroy the colouring matter of two grains of the best Spanish Indigo.

It is generally employed in solution, which is made in the proportion of four ounces to one pint of water, and as only one half of the lime is dissolved, it will be necessary to filter, in order to obtain the clear solution. Dilute one part of the liquid with 40 parts of water, a pint with five gallons, or a wine glass full to three quarts of water, stir the mixture and it is then fit for use. It is the most powerful disinfecting agent hitherto discovered, and an instantaneous destroyer of every bad smell. It is an infallible destroyer of all effluvia, arising from animal, and vegetable decomposition, and effectually prevents their deleterious influence, hence, it is particularly recommended to the attention of those residing in epidemick districts, as there is reason to expect, that the mixture sprinkled about apartments would prevent the access of contagion to a certain extent around. Its value will be appreciated by the faculty in the examinations for inquests, dissections and anatomical preparations. For all these desirable purposes, it is only necessary to sprinkle the diluted liquid in the apartment, or on the object requiring purification.

The effluvia from drains, sewers and other receptacles of the same nature, will be destroyed by pouring into them a quart of the mixture, added to a pailful of water, and repeating the operation until it is completely removed.

Tainted meats, and animal food of every kind, may be rendered sweet, by sprinkling them with the mixture. Water in cisterns may be purified, and all animalculæ destroyed, by putting into it a small quantity of pure liquid, say about half a pint to one hundred and twenty gallons of water, and consequently it is highly valuable on board ships.

The nuisances arising from disagreeable and unhealthy manufactories, may be equally obviated by the mere sprinkling of the Chloride of Lime, and the health of the workmen very materially preserved in such deleterious process as the preparation of oil colours. It destroys the smell of paints so effectually, that a room painted in the day may be slept in at night, without any smell of paint being perceived, if it be sprinkled some hours before with the mixture.

Smelters of lead, glue and size makers, tallow and soap manufacturers, skin dresses, &c. may deprive their premises of all offensive smell, by the same processes. The close and confined air of hospitals, prisons, ships, &c. will be almost instantaneously purified by sprinkling the diluted Chloride of lime in small quantities from a watering pot. The stains from fruits, &c. &c. may be removed from table linen &c. by dipping the article stained in water, applying the Chloride of lime until the stain is removed, and then rinsing well in cold water previous to being washed."

PREVENTION OF DEATH.

The following cautions and observations, designed to preserve from premature death from drowning, lightning, cold, heat, noxious vapours, apoplexy &c. are copied from the "Pocket Companion," published in 1816, by the "ROYAL HUMAN SOCIETY, for the recovery of the apparently drowned or dead." This Society, since its establishment in 1754 to 1816, had rescued from apparent death, four thousand and eighty-seven persons, and rewarded upwards of 18,500 claimants.

CAUTIONS.

1. Never to be held up by the feet.
2. Not to be rolled on casks, or other rough usage.
3. Avoid frictions with salt or spirits, in all cases of apparent death.

RESTORATION OF LIFE

What thou doest—do quickly.

THE DROWNED.

1. Convey carefully the body with the head and shoulders raised, to the nearest convenient house.
2. Strip and dry the body; clean the mouth and nostrils.
3. Place Young Children between two persons in a warm bed.
4. An Adult. Lay the body on a blanket or bed, in a warm chamber in winter:—To be exposed to the sun in Summer.
5. To be gently rubbed with flannel;—a heated warmingpan, covered, lightly moved over the back and spine.
6. If no signs of life appear—the warm bath; warm bricks, &c. applied to the palms of the hands, and soles of the feet.
7. To restore breathing—introduce the pipe of a pair of bellows (when no apparatus) into one nostril; the other nostril and the mouth closed; inflate the lungs, till the breast be a little raised: the mouth and nostrils must then be let free:—repeat the process till life appears.
8. Where a bellows, or any proper apparatus cannot be had, immediately attempt to excite the natural inspiration and expiration, by pressure on the breast, ribs and muscles of the body, merely by the hands, so as to press out as large a portion of the air as possible, and then removing and applying the pressure alternately, in order to imitate the natural breathing, and promote the introduction of atmospherick air, in proportion to the quantity pressed out from the air-cells of the lungs. This process has proved highly successful; and as any person may apply it, as well as a medical professor, it should not be delayed a moment.
9. Electricity early employed by a Medical Assistant.

INTENSE COLD.

Rub the body with snow, ice, or cold water. Restore warmth, &c. by slow degrees, and, after some time, if necessary, the plans to be employed for the resuscitation of Drowned Persons.

SUSPENSION BY THE CORD.

1. A few ounces of blood may be taken from the jugular vein, and Cupping Glasses may be applied to the head and neck; Leeches also to the temples.

2. The other methods of treatment the same as as recommended for the apparently Drowned.

SUFFOCATION BY NOXIOUS VAPOURS, OR LIGHTNING.

Cold water to be repeatedly thrown upon the face, &c. drying the body at intervals. If the body feels cold, employ gradual warmth, and the plans for the Drowned.

INTOXICATION.

The body is to be lain on a bed, &c. with the head a little raised; the neckcloth, &c. removed—obtain immediate Medical Assistance, as the mode of treatment must be varied, according to the state of the patient.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

1. On signs of returning life, a tea-spoonful of warm water may be given; and if the power of swallowing be returned, warm wine or diluted brandy—to be put into a warm bed, and if disposed to sleep, will generally awake restored to health.

2. The plans above recommended are to be used for three or four hours. It is an absurd and vulgar opinion to suppose persons are irrecoverable because life does not soon make its appearance.

3. Electricity and Bleeding never to be employed, unless by the direction of the Medical Assistants.

If the RESUSCITATIVE PROCESS be immediately employed, an immense number of lives will be restored.

CORONERS.

Many lives have been sacrificed which might have been restored, from a prevailing opinion concerning the impropriety of meddling with a Body without permission of the Coroner.

OPINION OF AN EMINENT SPECIAL PLEADER.

"It is a misdemeanour to prevent the Coroner from doing his duty. But the meddling with a body, for the purpose of restoring life, is not a transgression of the law; nor do I know any statute by which such an act is prohibited. The Coroner ought to be called in as soon as it is evident that the body is dead."

Absolute, not apparent death, is here meant.

THE NATURALIST.

HABITS OF THE LEAF INSECT.

The mantis, or leaf-insect, is one of the most remarkable for its external form of all the insect tribes in India. When alive and fresh it presents a striking resemblance to a blade of grass, differing in colour according to the season, being green and succulent in the rains, and in the dry weather so much like a withered straw, that they can with difficulty be distinguished. Dr. Adams, who has given an interesting account of the habits of these animals, says that this insect lies in wait for flies, which form his prey, with as much design as a cat or tiger. When a fly is sufficiently within his reach, he projects rapidly his armed paw, and, with unerring aim transfixing his victim, lodges in the toothed hollow of the thigh, destined for its reception. After the fly is in his power, no time is lost in devouring it, commencing with the trunk, and in a few minutes swallowing the whole, the head and wings constituting the finishing morsel. In this manner he will destroy at a meal five or six large flies, which, in point of bulk, nearly double his own body. The structure of the forelimb is remarkably adapted for the purpose it has to serve. It is strong and muscular, provided with a claw at its extremity, likewise strong, horny, and sharp as a needle, and the groove in the last joint, with the double row of teeth or spurs on the margin, corresponding and locking closely into each other, like the fangs of the Alligator. By means of these formidable weapons, the insect not only becomes destructive to others, but is employed to attack its own species; and in China, we are told, fighting the mantis forms the favourite amusement of boys, who carry them about in cages for the purpose.

FISHES TRAVELLING ON LAND.

The Doras costata, or Hassar, is one of those species of fishes which possesses the singular property of deserting the water, and travelling over land. In those terrestrial excursions, large droves of the species are frequently met with during very dry seasons. When the water is leaving the pools in which they commonly reside, while most other fishes perish for want of their natural element, or are picked up by rapacious birds, the flat-headed hassars, on the contrary, simultaneously quit the place, and march over land in search of water, travelling for a whole night, as is asserted by the Indians, in search of their object. Mr. Campbell, of Sparta Estate, Essequibo, and his family, in an excursion to the sandreefs, fell in with a drove of these animals, which were on their march over land to a branch of the Pomeroun. They were so numerous that the negroes filled several baskets with those they picked up. Their motion over land is described to be somewhat like that of the two-footed lizard. They project themselves forward on their bony arms, by the elastic spring of the tail exerted sidewise. Their progress is nearly as fast as a man will leisurely walk. The strong scuta or hands which envelope their body, must greatly facilitate their march, in the manner of the plates under the belly of serpents, which are raised and depressed by a voluntary power, in some measure performing the office of feet. The Indians say that these fishes carry water within them for a supply on a journey. There appears to be some truth in this statement; for it has been observed that the bodies of the hassars do not get dry like those of other fishes when taken out of the water; and if the moisture be absorbed, or they are wiped dry with a cloth, they have such a power of secretion, that they became instantly moist again. It is scarcely possible to dry the surface while the fish is living.

[Dr. Hancock, Zool. Jour.]

FISHES' NESTS.

The hassars of both species, flat-headed and round-headed, make a regular nest in which they lay their eggs in a flattened cluster and cover them over most carefully. They remain by the side of the nest till the spawn is hatched, with as much solicitude as a hen guards her eggs; both the male and female hassar (a species of Doras), for they are monogamous, steadily watching the spawn, and courageously attacking the assailant. Hence the negroes frequently take them by putting their hands into the water close to the nest; on agitating which the male hassar springs furiously at them, and is thus captured. The round-head forms its nest of grass, the flat head of leaves. Both at certain seasons burrow in the bank. They lay their eggs only in wet weather. In a morning after rain occurs, numerous nests appear, the spot being indicated by a bunch of froth, which shows itself on the surface of the water, over the nest. Below this are the eggs, placed on a bunch of fallen leaves or grass, if it be the littoral species, which they cut and collect together—by what means seems rather mysterious, as the species are destitute of cutting teeth. It may possibly be by the use of their serrated arms, which form the first ray of the pectoral fins.

CHARACTER.

BOLIVAR.

The following anecdote is taken from a work just issued from the press in Boston, under the title of "Memoirs of Bolivar, by General H. L. V. Decoudray Holstein."

The character of Bolivar is represented unfavourably, and every American will naturally wish, and perhaps believe, the story false; the character of the author, however, and his means of information, must destroy the prepossessions of candid men in favour of the "liberator." M. Ducoudray was a favourite officer of Napoleon, and a conspicuous actor in the French Revolution. After the downfall of Napoleon, he entered the patriot service, and continued in it for about two years; but being disgusted with the character of Bolivar, he, in 1816, retired from the service, and has subsequently been employed in literary occupations, in the West Indies and the United States. He is now, we believe, professor of modern languages in Geneva college.

But how did General Bolivar behave in this pretty hot and close action, which lasted more than four hours? As soon as he heard that Brion had ordered the necessary preparations for attack, he took me aside and spoke as follows: "But, my friend, do you not think that the Spaniards will resist and fight to the last?" "To be sure they will," replied I laughing. "Well, but do you think that our schooner is strong enough to fight alone against these two strong vessels, (at the same time looking at them through a spy glass,) we are too distant, and too far in advance, which renders it impossible for the remainder of our squadron to support us in the action." "That is true, (said I,) but we will take them by boarding; this is the customary way to force Spanish vessels." "What! by boarding, do you think of such folly?" (y pensez vous mon cher Ami? c'est une folie!) These were the very expressions of General Bolivar to me! "But what is it best for me to do? do you not think that if I were wounded, or killed, our expedition would be totally lost, and Brion, the poor Brion, would have expended in vain, all his fortune! I looked up astonished; it first occurred to me that he might be jesting; but when I saw that these strange questions were put to me in earnest, I understood him, called Brion and said: General Bolivar has made me a just observation concerning you, he said, that he being wounded or killed in the action, you Brion, would lose all your advances, as then the expedition would, of course, be disbanded. "Oh the d—d coward," said Brion to me in Dutch; (he was a native Dutchman.) "Well General (turning to Bolivar,) you will be safely placed with the intendant Zea, to whom I have assigned a place in our cabin, (in which Bolivar, Brion, Zea, and myself slept,) at the entry of the powder magazine, to hand the necessary cartridges. As Brion said these words in an angry manner, Bolivar asked him, But my dear Brion, do you not think that Ducoudray's observation is just, do you not think so? Oh yes, yes, said Brion, and turned round. I was giving the necessary orders to our officers to arm with muskets and cartridges, when Bolivar came hastily and took me by the arm, saying: "Now I have found an excellent place, better than to be down in the cabin with old Zea," (who looked, in fact, much older than he was, and he was the same man who died as minister of Colombia in England.) He showed me the long-boat which, in armed vessels, is generally fixed over the cabin windows. He jumped in, called Garcia, (his intendant) ordered his pistols, and sword, and told him to load two balls in each pistol, which Garcia did in my presence, and looking at me and laughing. This position which Bolivar chose for himself, was surely the safest place in the vessel, then in setting as he did in the long-boat, his head and whole body was safely protected by the thickness and strength of the beam which supports the rudder of the vessel. He sat down in the boat, and requested me to take command of the officers, which I provided with arms and ammunition, and Brion entrusted me with the command of the volunteers, so that I had to survey the whole infantry of about 160 armed men. A strange contrast between the old and honest Mr. Ballot, a respectable French gentleman of 64 years of age, taking a musket with his young son of 16 years, putting themselves voluntarily under my orders, in spite of Brion's and my representations that they should go down into the cabin, and assist Mr. Zea. But both, full of ardour and courage, refused positively, and said that this was a post of honour, and that they would not have any other assigned to them. In comparing the behaviour of Ballot, father and son, who exposed, voluntarily, their lives, or the welfare of a country in which they were not born, and to which they did not come in order to fight, with that of a military chieftain, already famous; by his rash, and now placed at the head of an expedition, withdrawing himself in such a curious manner, when he should have taken the command of us all, is surely a very characteristic trait of what I have already said of Bolivar, and of what I must repeat in the course of these memoirs of him, in telling truth. Both the Ballots fought with great courage and coolness.

We suffered much during the very warm action, from the musket fire of about a hundred men of the Spanish regiment La Corona, who fired from the rigging into our vessel, and wounded and killed about fifty of our officers and men. We stood more than an hour at half pistol shot distance from the brig, before we could fix the grapples for boarding. When the crew saw about a dozen of us on their deck, the battle began to be renewed with more fury; but when our number increased, and their brave commander felt himself to be mortally wounded, they lost all hopes; and about thirty of them stripped off their clothes and jumped overboard, in hopes to save their lives by swimming to the Three Rocks which lay a gun shot distance from us.

At this moment, General Bolivar, having all this time been sitting very safe behind his beam in the long-boat, perceived these naked unfortunate men swimming at a very short distance from him; he took his pistol and killed one of them, took the second, fired at, but missed another!

When all was over, and the brig was taken, he jumped out of his boat, came with a radiant face to me and said, 'my dear friend, you fought bravely, but I too, have not been inactive; I killed my man; but unfortunately missed the second!' I, who passed several times from one side of the vessel to the other, always seeing my commander leaning his head close to the beam, was surprised, and asked him how he could kill a man in his boat? "Ah, said he, laughing, with my pistol, in the water!"

THE GATHERER.

AN APOLOGUE.

Towards the beginning of the world there was a vast forest of citron-trees, that bore the most beautiful, large, and pleasant fruit. The branches bent under their burdens, and the air far around was embalmed with their fragrant odour. The impetuous winds chanced to blow down several citrons, and to break some of the branches; certain travellers passing that way quenched their thirst with the juice of the fruit, and cast away the rind. This accident induced the race of citron-trees to choose guardians, who were to drive away passengers, and to inclose the forest with high walls, to oppose the fury of the winds. These guardians appeared at first faithful and disinterested, but they soon found that such hard labour produced a violent thirst; they therefore made this proposition to the citrons—"Gentlemen, we are ready to perish by thirst in labouring for you; permit us to make a small incision in each of you, that we may have a drop of liquor to refresh our parched throats! you will not be the poorer, and we and our children shall thereby acquire fresh strength for your service." The credulous citrons thought this request not unreasonable, and submitted to the imprecipitable contribution. But what was the consequence? When the incision was once made, the hands of the guardians pressed them every day closely. They at last found that citron juice was necessary in all their food; they observed too, that the closer they pressed the fruit, the more juice is yielded. The citrons, seeing themselves thus profusely bled, thought to have reduced their contribution to the primitive stipulation; but the guardians, grown more strong, disregarding all their complaints, put them in the press; and when nothing else remained, they forced a juice from the rinds, by the aid of terrible machines. They at last bathed themselves in the juice of citrons. The beautiful forest was soon despoiled; the race of citrons became extinct; and their tyrants habituated to that refreshing liquor, by their prodigality had totally deprived themselves of it. They all fell sick, and died of a putrid fever.

A gentleman who had a vast veneration for poetry and poetical descriptions having occasion to describe a very quiet neighbour to a musical friend of his, stated, that he took through life

"The noiseless tenour of his way."

"Pshaw!" cried the musician, who was not possessed of much fondness for poetry, "What is the noiseless tenour good for? give me a tenour that has a full and powerful tone, or none at all."

A person hearing of the death of another said to an acquaintance, "I thought you told me —'s fever had gone off?" "I did," replied the latter, "but I forgot to mention that he went with it."

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

THE POST.

There is, perhaps, no possible event that would cause so great a revolution in the state of modern society as the cessation of the post. A comet coming in collision with the earth could alone cause a greater shock to its inhabitants; it would shake nations to their centre. It would be a sort of imprisonment of the universal mind,—a severing of the affections, and a congelation of thought. It would be building up a wall of partition between the hearts of mother and child, and husband and wife, and brother and sister. It would raise Alps between the breasts of friend and friend; and quench, as with an ocean, the love that is now breathed out in all its glowing fervour, despite of time or place. What would be all the treasures of the world, or all its praise, to a feeling heart, if it could no longer pour out its fulness to its chosen friend, whom circumstances had removed afar off? What could solace the husband or the father, during his indispensable absence from the wife of his affections, or the child of his love, if he had no means of assuring them of his welfare and his unalterable love; and what could console him could he not be informed of theirs? Life, in such circumstances, would be worse than a blank; it would be death to the soul, but death without its forgetfulness. Write soon—pray do write soon and often, are among the last words we breathe into the ear of those we love, while we grasp the hand, and look into the eye that will soon be far from us. What other consolation or hope is left us when the rumbling wheel, or the swelling sail is bearing that beloved being far from us, while we stand fixed to the spot where that object uttered its last adieu. And how impatiently do we wait the arrival of the welcome letter, that will assure us of its well-being and safety. The object of our solicitude may have to cross inhospitable deserts, or stormy seas; dangerous mountains or forests infested by beasts of prey, or the sons of plunder; and, were there no channel by which we could be informed of its subsequent safety, our suspense would prove overwhelming and intolerable. But the welcome sheet arrives, and we are blest by the intelligence that the being concerning whom we were so anxious, has surmounted all dangers, and still lives to think of us and to love us. Again we converse together,—again we interchange our thoughts, as if present with each other; we speak to those we cannot see, and we listen to them who are too far off to hear even the thunder that rolls along our horizon.

If ever mortal deserved a monument to perpetuate his memory, it was the inventor of writing; (what are the claims of kings or conquerors in the comparison?) it is the next best gift to life itself, and, deprived of it, life would hardly be worth the possessing: it is truly like the air we breathe; if we have it not we die. The best enjoyments of being emanate from this divine art: it pours the brightest sunshine that illumines the desolate path of life; without it, the gift of genius would be bestowed in vain, and talent would expire unseen and unenjoyed, like the bright flowers of an uninhabited region. And without the medium of communication by the post, even this would be divested of half its advantages; with a cheapness that no other mode can compete with, a swiftness that none else can rival, and a certainty and dependence that no other can offer, it presents the finest instance of communication between men that the world has ever witnessed. Crowned heads, and the nobles of the laud, might, indeed, send their communications by messengers or couriers; but these would hardly be available for the merchant, and not at all for the tradesman or artizan. But now we can receive the most needful intelligence, or the kindest effusions of regard, from a distance of nearly three hundred miles, for almost nothing: and, in four or five days, a letter may be despatched, and an answer received, from the metropolis to the Land's End in Cornwall.

Thus may the prodigal, who has absented himself from the paternal roof, and the arms of his parents, solicit and receive permission to return to the hearts that mourn over his absence. I knew a father whose son had left his home, and was an exile above two hundred miles off. This father was taken ill, and was told he could not survive many days. His palsied hand was yet able to scrawl a few lines to his still darling boy, whose retreat had just become known to him. He conjured him, if he wished to receive his dying blessing and forgiveness, to return immediately. The unconscious paper was despatched; it flew upon the wings of the wind along the dreary road,—it traversed the long heaths,—it passed over the high hills and the deep rivers: neither the floods nor the precipices retarded the important message; and, in a few days, the repentant prodigal was at his father's feet, and in his arms, and received his pardon and blessing, and saw him close his eyes in peace; when, but for this, the one would have lived wretched, and the other died miserable.

I never see the mail flying along the road, with its lamps gleaming through the darkness, and its horn breaking the stillness of midnight, but I think of the thousand intense interests that are conveyed in its packages. The timely assistance which it is conveying to solace, and perhaps to save the distressed,—the pleadings of love, the outpourings of friendship, and the supplications of despair,—the joys and the sorrows of the heart, are all going to their respective destinations, to carry peace or hope, succour or sympathy, to the bosoms that need them. To some it will terminate a suspense worse than death. To whole families deprived of the means of existence, it will carry plenty and peace. It oft makes whole the breaking heart, revives the sinking spirit, and illumines the haggard eye; and, if it do convey some sad intelligence, it is that which must be known, and is always better known than feared.

How many a man has its speed and punctuality saved from bankruptcy and from ruin. M—— was, and is still, in prosperous and happy circumstances; but, owing to the failure of his banker, he was once nearly involved in irreparable ruin. He had a large acceptance coming due in six days after this event happened; and, upon the honouring of this, his credit as a tradesman, and, perhaps his very liberty, depended. The state of his mind during this period is not to be described. He had indeed a friend, possessing both the means and the will to save him; but he, alas! was afar off,—a distance of more than three hundred miles spread between them. Could he breathe his distress into the ear of that friend, he was safe; for him to go and return in the time was, indeed, difficult, to say nothing of the expense; but he seized his pen, he described his misfortune, the post conveyed it to his friend; the answer might arrive on the day the bill became due, but sooner it could not. The fated day came, the bill was presented, the clerk left the address; he had done his part and cared for no more.

M—— paced his counting-house in all the agonized suspense of a man whom that day must save or destroy. His wife was weeping at home, his children wondering at the cause of such an unusual sorrow. The postman entered the street, and every knock that sounded, caused the heart of M—— to beat with increased velocity; the unconscious messenger passed his door; M—— clasped his hands and felt himself undone! Suddenly the man returned; he had overlooked the number, and his knock sounded like a reprieve to a malefactor on the scaffold. The letter was torn open, it contained a sufficient remittance, and a command to call upon the donor in any similar emergency, with a heart inspired assurance of unaltered friendship. The throbbing heart of M—— was stilled; his difficulties were surmounted, and he is now independent and happy. Had his letter miscarried, or the answer been less punctual, he and his family might have been undone.

The post! how often is it the only remaining link that unites the fondest hearts on earth! When fortune has torn them assunder, and they beat in different hemispheres, it is the only connecting chain that still binds them together. It is, as if another sense, over which distance had no control, were added to those we already possess. By this channel alone each knows that the other still lives. But for this, how doubly afflicting to the fond mother would be the absence of a son, who had gone in search of fame or fortune to distant climes; how many fears, which nothing could allay, would fancy conjure up to torture her: how else could she know that he had not expired on the pestilential shores of Africa, in the fever of the West Indies, or beneath the poisoned dagger of the Malay: that he had not been engulfed in the stormy billows of the Cape, or been wasted to death beneath the burning heat of an equinoctial sun? Now she knows that he still lives, and waits in fond hope for the day that shall restore him to her arms; she is assured by a messenger she cannot doubt, that he was, when that was despatched, living and well, and her sorrow is disarmed of its sting.

When a battle has been fought on some distant shore, how many thousands are anxiously watching the arrival of the sealed messengers, which can alone assure them that those they love have survived the carnage of the field, and still live for them. And, till the letters arrive, how many thousand eyes are passing sleepless nights,—how many bosoms are throbbing with suspense,—how many fond lips are counting the days that must intervene before the post can bring the longed for tidings. Till then they are imagining that the objects of their solicitude may be entombed beneath the field of slaughter, or writhing in the anguish of cureless wounds, and praying in vain for the tender hand of friend or relative to smooth the couch of pain: thus, even while friends at home are conjuring up all the harrowing circumstances that fancy can devise, the sealed papers are speeding on their way to set their hearts at rest.

But to depict all the interests that are connected with the post, would be to read the history of human life, and the portraiture of human feelings: there is no passion that can actuate the breast, that is not fed or solaced by its visits; there is no interest that concerns the welfare of man that is not carried on and perfected by it. Events the most momentous to those concerned, are forwarded and completed without the parties ever seeing each other during their progress. A man's dearest interests may hang on the safe conveyance, and punctual arrival of a single letter, and seldom does it fail. If victory have blest the arms of a nation, the post conveys the welcome news to all parts of the empire, and from east to west the joy is simultaneous. It is the most perfect system of intercourse that has ever been devised,—it scatters wealth and happiness in a thousand directions. No place is too distant for it to reach,—no village too insignificant for it to visit. Like the sun, dispensing delight, it goes its daily journey. The heats of summer and the cold of winter are not allowed to intercept or retard it. In spite of Malthus and all the economists, it carries on the important business of courtship, and leads to matrimony, whether for better or worse. It solaces the lover's sorrow, and transmits hope through many a cruel league. The bashful bachelor, who has not the courage to make a personal declaration, may do it through the medium of the post; nay, if he prefer it, he may even put the last question itself into the hands of the postman. It assists to bind society in one common union, for who would emigrate to a region where it could not reach! It is better than the gold mines of Peru; and, like the Nile in Egypt, it scatters blessings along its track; and deserves to be considered as one of the most happy and distinguishing features of modern times.

MISCELLANY.

From a Paris paper • May 13.

NICHOLAS I. CROWNED KING OF POLAND.

It is seventy years since the people of Poland have witnessed a Coronation. The last solemnity of this sort took place at Varsovia in 1746, after the election of the last king, Stanislaus Augustus Poniatowski. And now, after so long an interval, filled by so many revolutions and calamities, the Autocrat of Russia announces for the 24th of May, his coronation as King of Poland. On that day the Poles expect their sovereign for a second time to swear to a charter which guarantees individual liberty, and the liberty of the press. A new crown which is to cost three millions of florins, has been ordered to be made. This expense was necessary, for the crowns which once adorned the heads of the kings of the Republick of Poland, can be no where found. They exist yet, it is said; but are shut up and hid where they must remain during the present ages, unless some new event should remove the secret which covers them.

This is the story of these precious relics of the ancient throne of Poland. At the epoch of the last partition, two monks, accompanied by six smiths, who after having confessed, swore on the Bible never to reveal the secret of which they were become the depositaries, went to the treasury and took away all the ensignia of authority of the chiefs of the Republick, without touching the other precious things, which were found some time ago in possession of the Queen of Prussia. The rich insignia were carried by the two monks into Lithuania, and confided to the faith of a gentleman, brother to one of them, who was sworn never to reproduce them until Poland should have regained its ancient splendour. The deposit is composed of five diadems, four sceptres, two chains of gold, and the sabre of the great Boleslas, which for seven centuries was suspended from the girdle of the Polish kings during the ceremony of their consecration. Among the crowns, that of the fleurs de lys was distinguished above the rest, and called the crown of France, because three of the royal family of France wore it in ancient time. These were Louis, king of Hungary, son of Charles Robert, and nephew to St. Louis; his virtuous son Hedwige d'Anjou, the husband of Jagellon, and finally Henry III, brother of Charles IX.

Thus, his majesty, the Emperour of Russia, will not place upon his head any of the five crowns once worn by the chiefs of this celebrated people, of which he is about to cause himself to be proclaimed king.

As to the rest, it does not appear that the Poles ought to be alarmed at the new order of things which this event seems to announce. They ought to prefer any thing to the condition of uncertainty in which they have so long lived, under the precarious and severe authority of the Grand Duke Constantine.

The general spirit of the inhabitants of that country has something excellent in it. At Varsovie, notwithstanding a rigorous censorship, there are more than thirty journals. The ancient aristocracy, the source of so many evils to the nation, exists in fact no longer. There is not one Polish prince or count, except some descendants of Jagellons or Rurik, who possesses privileges superior to those of gentlemen. The Bourgeoise have ceased to exist as a distinct class. The small traders sit in the elective councils of the Palatinates, and in the Chamber of Deputies, and are called according to the ancient custom, "Your Excellency." It was a rich wine merchant, M. Keasznizew, counsellor of the Palatinate and Deputy, who, under the title of ambassador to Petersburg, was charged with congratulations to the Emperor Nicholas, on his ascending the throne.

The small republick of Cracovie has rejected unanimously the proposal which was made to it of confiding the care of publick education to the Jesuits. The Diet of the Grand Duchy of Posen, by a petition addressed to the King of Prussia, has courageously re-claimed of that king the execution of the treaty of Vienna, [1815,] which guarantees the preservation of the national tongue. Opinions and wishes are the same over the whole surface of Poland.

It is under such circumstances that a Polish Diet is about to assemble, and that the Emperour Nicholas is to cause himself to be crowned king of a people whose misfortunes have interested all generous spirits. It is asserted confidently that the Grand Duke Constantine will retire into Sweden.

From the London Examiner.

PUBLICK OPINION.

A Contemporary (the Spectator) truly and eloquently observes—"Let a poor starving out-at-elbows rescal pick a gentleman's pocket of a half worn eighteen-penny handkerchief, and the pump, or the treadmill, or the hulks—according to the mood of the mob and the magistrate, are all too little for him. If, aspiring to something higher, the thief should break a pane in the Earl of Wallow-in-wealth's pantry-window, insinuate himself through the aperture, and abstract from the shelf "where they had been but an hour before carefully deposited by his Lordship's butler," five silver tea-spoons, value 113s 4d, the whole world of London and Bow-street will be in amaze at an atrocity for which nothing but a short shrift and a stout halter—cotton and hemp—can possibly atone. But let the offender figure in a suit of the newest cut, with a gold watch and a diamond ring—let him inhabit a fine house, keep a carriage with a pair of greys, and give venison and claret to tidlers, painters, and small wits, let him, by virtue of the elegant extenours, rob the aged of their savings, the young of their dower, pluck the shield from the widow and the stay from the orphan—cheat every friend that possesses the materials of being cheated—beggai five hundred families—and then withdraw to the land of liberty and equality beyond the Atlantick, instead of being pursued by the execrations, he shall be followed by the pity of the million, and a hundred good reasons invented for the palliation of his villany." There are, indeed, many curious solecisms in publick opinion. A poor destitute creature prostitutes her person for bread—she is infamous and outset. A rich man prostitutes his mind for power or distinction, and the world smile at the lapse, while friends approve its prudence. We ordinarily rate the gifts of mind above those of the person, and why is the abuse of the more precious accounted of less disgrace than that of the grosser nature?—It seems to us, that the world rate the infamy of crimes as inverse to the urgency of temptation. The man who picks a pocket for the supply of his dinner, is loaded with ill names, and a mean scoundrel to be abhorred and punished; but he who despoils for the maintenance of hot-houses, race-horses, and opera girls, is regarded, as the Spectator affirms, with all tolerant indulgence, and we style him not a thief, but a delaulter, a word of extremely genteel sound, and which obtains even a credit from the respectable class of persons comprehended in its application. The temptation to steal for a meal is more urgent than that to rob for superfluities, and yet we see the greater severity with which it is regarded. Let us try the same rule in another province of moral judgements. A woman in the possession of every comfort of life, who lapses from wantonness, is regarded as less infamous than the unfriended destitute being who makes profit for her person for bread. A meal to the famished is a pressing temptation, wantonness an idle one; but the wantonness finds more excuse than the want. Two men quarrel in a pot-house; they go out and fight; one kills the other; there is an apprehension, a trial and a verdict of manslaughter, if the Judge or Jury be out of humour with boxing. Two gentlemen quarrel; and go out deliberately on a mere punctilio; there is no heat of blood between them; they are indifferent whether they kill or not, and only anxious to go through certain ceremonies of violence for the good of their reputations, not the gratification of animosities which have evaporated, as consequences disproportioned to cause are contemplated. One kills the other, and walks at large.

KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

A few individuals still retain the name of Knights; and it is very little more than the name. One or two remain in Malta, and a few are to be found scattered here and there on the continent; but the society has quite perished. They have, however, left many marks of their wealth and enterprise, which will be looked at with interest by future generations. The ponderous and immensely variegated fortifications cost unheard of toil. They strike the transient traveller as comparatively small works; but when thoroughly examined, they present immeasurable quantities of hewn stone, ingeniously composing wall behind wall, and fortification overlooking fortification.

Thus deceiving the enemy with the appearance of a gentle rise of ground, by which persons might march straight up to the city, when in fact they must pass over numerous small precipices and two or three villages, and then find a ditch from twenty to forty or fifty feet deep and forty wide, over which are draw-bridges, and on the side next the city, a wall from thirty to sixty feet perpendicular. In another place are high embankments, presenting little except a wall three or four feet high. Again, there are two immense ditches, which cannot be discovered at any point until the enemy has made their way close to the city, in which soldiers could be marched from one harbour to the other, or from both the harbours directly to the top of two immense forts, which overtop the highest ground of the city by forty feet, and this without exposing them at all to the enemy's fire. In another place are under-ground passages into the city, cut in the rock, one or two of them forty or fifty rods in length, and large enough to allow five or six men to pass abreast, and at the same time are perfectly safe from being discovered. In addition to all this, the city is guarded by impenetrable gates, double and triple with planks and bars. The enemy might spend a long time before they could enter the city, were there no guards or weapons to prevent them. Supplied with these, all efforts become perfectly useless.

Every officer of the Knights seems to have had a steel cap, and a thick plate of steel reaching from his neck in front to his loins. The principal officers were covered with steel in front, even to the ends of their fingers and toes. The cap is made in such a way as to admit of being opened, so as entirely to uncover the face. When closed, the eye was defended by an iron grate. At the several joints of the various members of the body the steel is made like the scales of a fish, one plate sliding over another. Their horses' heads and breasts were likewise covered with steel. These plates are generally polished smooth and bright; but those of the foremost officers are neatly embossed and curiously coloured. Their armour consisted of a shield, swords (some of them six feet long) various descriptions of guns and pistols; a club two feet long, and two inches in diameter at one end, where it was set with pointed spikes a half inch square and nearly an inch long. A blow from such a club would be almost sure to break the head of any horse. They had various kinds of cutlasses, dirks, &c. and seemed prepared to meet any assault, except from the mouth of cannon.

The armour is so heavy, that nothing short of the feeling that he must conquer or die, could give a man strength to use it for any length of time, and I should think it almost impossible for a man of moderate strength to use it at all to any effect. About one hundred of these dresses are hung up in the armory of Government here. The officers are accustomed to dress themselves in this armour occasionally; when the concourse of spectators is exceedingly great, crowding the streets on all sides, and covering the houses and windows. Those who wore this armour were always, I believe, on horseback. They present exceedingly warlike appearance. About twenty generally appear in this armour in a small square, where they manœuvre with great activity. If any society was ever worthy of attention for their herick exploits and energy, it was this, but they are all vanished, with little glory in these times, except that of having prepared a valuable fortress for the English in this sea.

LOUIS XV. AND THE FIVE SISTERS.

Five sisters of the family of Nesle, whose fortune was not equal to their birth, and whom nature, though with much diversity, had endowed with her most precious gifts, had the most easy access to the queen. Madame de Mailly, the eldest of them, good, simple, free from artifice, liable to weakness, but capable of great constancy, was the first mistress of the young prince. The courtiers had but little to fear from any ascendancy that she might gain: she was not pretty. This intrigue was involved in mystery; but the second sister, Mademoiselle de Nesle, afterwards Marchioness of Vintimilla, had already, in the retirement of a convent, conceived the plan of becoming Madame de Mailly's rival. Divested of timidity, now flattering the prince, and now his ministers, now pretending gaiety, and now decorum, she made a conquest of the king, who, then taking the first bold step in the career of scandal, publicly avowed her as his mistress. She died. Mademoiselle de la Tournelle, blooming with beauty, and pretending to blush at the example of her two sisters, aspired to replace them. She inflamed the monarch by the indifference with which she pretended to receive his homage; but, yielding at length, after she had sufficiently resisted, she was created by her royal lover, Duchess of Chateauroux. She was also overtaken by death. The king was, for a long time inconsolable for this loss; but the dissipation of a brilliant and corrupt court, having effaced the sad impression in his mind, and wakened him to the necessity of fresh delights, he formed a plan for the conquest of the remaining sister. The Duke de Richelieu, who prided himself on having been intrusted with the infamous affair, was righteously doomed to the shame of its miscarriage. She was replaced by the Marchioness d'Etiolle, afterwards Duchess de Pompadour.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1839.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

☞ "The Money Diggers," by Leo, and a poetical effusion from Q, shall appear in our next.

☞ We invite the attention of the reader to the appeal, in a subsequent column, by Professor SILLIMAN, in behalf of the American Journal of Science and Arts. Every lover of science will, we think, readily understand the necessity of awarding his individual patronage; and we trust that American liberality is too substantial to need much "spurring" on an occasion like this. It is not the amateur in science alone that is interested in the success of this journal; but there are thousands in the country whose necessities demand a publication of its kind. Yet, were it simply a question of pride, it ought not to require much exertion to obtain the solicited patronage. It will be a sad reflection, if among twelve millions of freemen, one thousand cannot be found who will trade with Science to the amount of six dollars a year.

The Rev. WILLIAM B. SPRAGUE, of Springfield, Massachusetts, has accepted the charge of the Second Presbyterian Church in this city, recently under the care of the late Dr. Chester.

☞ Some of the survivors in the anti-masonick ranks are sorely chafed by the stopping fit which has seized so large a portion of the "whole hog" concerns—papers, reading-rooms, &c., and some of the most knowing among them are drawing from their vast profundity a multitude of whys and wherefores. Among a score of these articles invented by an anti-masonick editor in Ulster county, in answer to a paragraph of ours respecting the short-comings of the enemy, is one setting forth that the Madison Farmer "was got up principally for the amusement of the boys in Hamilton college; and was altogether too larned to interest the plain farmers of Madison county. It therefore owes its discontinuance to other causes than anti-masonry." Now, "it happens" that Hamilton college is in Clinton, Oneida county, and that the "Madison Farmer" was published at Hamilton, Madison county. The places are distant from each other about twenty-five miles.

These are trifling matters, make the most of them. They are spoken of and jested with as petty events that it suits the fancy, and not the cares of the individual to meddle with for a moment. Like straws upon the ocean, they may show which way the current tends; but separately considered, they are of barely enough consequence to be made the material of a joke. Yet this Ulster anti-masonick man has put forth a column of "causes" equally shallow and false with the one we have quoted, and doubtless intends by means of them, to impress his readers with the belief that the "Young Lion of the West" is still in his "tantrums!" That such a belief would be beneficial to "the cause" in Ulster there can be no doubt; but this gentleman scribbler, whoever he may be, should recollect that, in the absence of excitement, the opinions of the people rest upon a better foundation, and are influenced by something more agreeable to their sober judgment, than the accidental notions of political renegades. What we stated was strictly true, and all the extenuating circumstances of the Ulster man cannot make an item of it otherwise. For all that we care on the subject, we would as soon that all the papers were printed, and all the reading rooms opened, as that they should remain stopped and shut up. The publick voice will, in the sequel, have its way, and that way will be the right way, whatever may be said or done by hired scribblers and reckless demagogues to bias it from its natural course.

St. JOHN'S DAY. We give below some additional accounts of the late celebration of the festival of St. John on the 24th of June last. We shall continue our summary.

In Royalton, Vermont, the festival was celebrated by the brethren of that and the neighbouring towns. A procession was formed at the academy, under the direction of Br. J. Warren, which proceeded to the meeting house, where public services were performed. Prayers were offered by the Rev. Azel Washburn, and an oration delivered by S. A. Webber, esq. After service, about two hundred and fifty brethren and invited guests, partook of a dinner provided by Mr. L. Hawley, at which the Hon. Dudley Chase presided.

In Thetford, Vermont, the day was celebrated at Post Mill's Village, by the lodge at that place, and brethren from the adjoining towns. A procession was formed at Masons' Hall, which proceeded to the meeting house under the direction of Br. L. Fitch, as marshal. The Vermont Journal says, "The service of the church was read by Rev. Br. J. Clapp, of Bethel; after which he proceeded in an eloquent discourse, to urge upon the fraternity the practice of the masonick virtue, temperance, by all those considerations which usefulness and respectability in life, and hope in death, suggest, and as specially incumbent on those who had adopted as their patron saint and great example, one who drank 'neither wine nor strong drink.' An oration was pronounced by Br. Wyman Spooner, having for its object the elucidation of the principles, purposes and benefits of the masonick institution, and the correction of some of these false impressions which obtain respecting it through the many misrepresentations which are industriously circulated in the community. The performances of the choir, of appropriate anthems, was in good taste, and gave increased interest to the services of the sanctuary."

After the exercises the brethren partook of an excellent dinner, prepared by Br. Daniels. When the cloth was removed, the following sentiments were offered:—

The Anniversary of our Patron Saint—May its joyful return find all our brethren without fear and without reproach.

Freemasonry. Friendship and morality its base, Charity its super-structure,—on such an edifice the shafts of calumny will ever fall innocuous.

The principles of our Free and happy Government. Whilst they are in perfect accordance with masonick principles, they ought not to be exerted to suppress the slanders with which we are assailed. We refer our cause to an enlightened public opinion.

Political Anti-Masonry. A rotten ladder for ambitious knaves to climb to power.

Anti-Masonick Religionists. While they display the same spirit that lighted the fires at Smithfield, and destroyed the Quakers and witches of New-England, let us pity the ignorant and despise the designing who compose their ranks.

The Clergy. Their conduct demonstrates that the principles of our order are not incompatible with the most exalted piety.

Our Orator. Mighty in the cause of truth.

The several lodges in the masonick district of Addison, celebrated the day in Middlebury, Vermont. A large and respectable number of brethren and spectators attended. A procession was formed in the morning at the lodge room, which, preceded by the Bridport band of musick, marched to the Congregational meeting house, where a highly appropriate and interesting discourse was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Brown of Troy, N. Y., and other religious exercises performed. After the exercises at the meeting house an excellent dinner, prepared by Mr. J. P. Carver, was served up at the Vermont Hotel. The following were among the toasts drank after the removal of the cloth:—

The Day we celebrate. Dedicated to the memory of one whose moral and masonick character will be admired as long as truth and virtue are loved.

The Masonick Institution. Founded in benevolence and wisdom—it must be sustained by prudence and firmness.

The President of the United States.

The Memory of Washington. His name will be revered while patriotism is admired, or masonry is cherished.—Drank standing.

The Memory of Dewitt Clinton. The mingled waters of Erie and Hudson are his best eulogists. The fraternity duly appreciate the value of his masonick labours.

In Louisville, Kentucky, the two lodges met at the Masonick Hall at 10 o'clock, A. M., where they were visited by Br. HENRY CLAY, who had been invited by the brethren to participate in the celebration of the day. The procession was then formed, in which Mr. Clay joined, and proceeded to the Presbyterian church, where an eloquent oration was delivered by the Rev. N. H. Hall.

MASONICK CEREMONIES. On the Fourth of July, instant, the corner stone of the new state house in Maine, was laid with masonick ceremonies by the Grand Lodge of the state. Governor Lincoln pronounced an address from the corner stone. Under the stone were deposited the constitution of the state—the various publications of the day—the coins of the country, and a plate with the following inscription:—

STATE OF MAINE.

On the Fifty-Third Anniversary of the Independence of the United States,

THIS

CORNER STONE,

Of a building to be erected for the accommodation of the Legislative and Executive Departments of the Government, is laid by the

GRAND LODGE,

In presence of ENOCH LINCOLN, Governor.

The Hudson Gazette says that seventeen partook of the antimasonick dinner prepared in that city on the 4th inst. after the delivery of "Governour" Southwick's oration, of which number seven were anti-masonick. The orator was from Albany, the two vice-presidents from Columbiaville, one from some other town in the county, and three from the city of Hudson. Anti-masonry goes on "swimmingly," certainly; it is journeying towards the foot of the hill with admirable speed.

It seems from something which has "leaked out," in spite of all precautions to the contrary, that Solomon did not go to Saratoga Springs, because neither a church, nor a tavern, nor any other building could be procured, wherein he would be suffered to hold forth! Anti-masonry goes a begging in every quarter, and is shunned with the greatest solicitude by all who make any pretensions to honesty or decency. The creations of its ephemeral power are departing like the posthumous afflictions of a plague; and the people have gathered too salutary a lesson from the past, to encourage a recurrence of its evils.

THEATRE. We learn from the bills, that a young gentleman will make "his first appearance on any stage," to-night, in the character of Macbeth. The part is rather arduous for a debutant, and we wish him a full house to keep his courage to the "sticking point."

Herr Cline's benefit will take place on Monday, and Miss Emery's on Wednesday. They both deserve bumper.

☞ The Masonick Mirror, formerly published in Boston, but which was suspended during the past year, is now resuscitated. It is published in the same form as the Record—terms, three dollars a year, in advance. The first number appeared on the 4th instant. We wish it success.

Two of the four Boston anti-masonick papers have gone into the "tomb of the Capulets" to rest awhile. They were afflicted with the usual anti-masonick complaint—a want of friends. There are now only two in that city; published from the same set of types.

MISTAKES. We are all liable to mistakes in creeping through this blundering world, and a goodly share of them, no doubt, rests on our own shoulders. But, nevertheless, we cannot refrain from saying something of our contemporaries,—for the simple reason that it is much pleasanter to speak of their faults than to cogitate over our own. In an article recently published in this paper—y'clepped "The Mourner," the last line of the fourth stanza, "With shaded eye and brow," has been transformed into "shaken eye and brow." Now, it is pleasant enough to see our articles wandering about the country, but when they come back to us "in such a questionable shape," that we can hardly recognize them, we had much rather they were quietly laid at rest, in "the receptacle of things lost upon earth."

[Am. Manufacturer.]

The error noticed above crept into the Record, No. 22. We mislaid the Manufacturer, and gave the compositor an erroneous copy of The Mourner, from another paper. We admire Mr. Whittier's verses, and shall endeavour to print them correctly hereafter.

From the Buffalo Journal, July 14.

ANTI-MASONICK OUTRAGE. By the following detail of facts it will be seen that the anti-masonick party, after scoffing at the solemnization of funeral rites, and repeatedly invading the sacred silence of the tomb, and dragging forth the mouldering remains of our fellow mortals to the rude gaze of aspiring politicians, is now so directing its attacks that men can no longer offer their adorations, in peace, to their maker, unless mingled with the politics of these children of strife.

On Sunday, the 5th inst., Elder Story, a preacher in good standing in the Methodist connexion, being on a visit to his friends in Erie, in this county, was requested to preach the afternoon sermon, at the Methodist church in that town. Mr. Story, being a mason, would not consent to the measure, until leave was obtained, as there had once before been difficulty upon this point. Elder Grant and Charles Knight were therefore consulted, and their consent being obtained, notice was given at the close of the forenoon service, that divine worship would be resumed at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, without mentioning who would officiate. Mr. Story attended, and on commencing his duties was interrupted by Israel G. Atkins, Isaac Denio and Royal A. Strait, three of the trustees of the church, who informed him that they, as trustees, forbid his preaching there, because he was a mason. Colonel C. Vandevermer made an effort to have the services proceed, but finding this impossible, the meeting was finally adjourned to a barn, where the devotion of the day were concluded. The three trustees were subsequently called to answer for the offence, to the civil authorities, and were fined eighteen dollars, with costs, for disturbing public worship.

The above facts were communicated to us by a gentleman, who holds himself responsible for their truth, and we give them from a sense of duty to the publick, as affording new evidence of the "moral restraints of anti-masonry."

From the same.

MORE "RESPECT FOR THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES"—We have received a communication relating to an outrage committed at Manchester, Niagara Falls, on the 4th instant, upon the person of a stranger. The gentleman, for some toast which he had offered at the dinner table, was singled out by anti-masons, while walking on the piazza, in front of the publick house, hooted at, then seized and beaten, his clothes torn, the jewelry from his bosom trodden under foot, &c. while cries of "lick him," "flog him," and others equally disgraceful, were uttered in rapid succession by some of the crowd. Such are the facts, furnished us; and from our knowledge of the men implicated, we feel certain that nothing but "all-powerful" anti-masonry could have prompted to such acts men professing religion, who have ordinarily sustained names void of reproach.

From the same.

"THE CAUSE." The men who so recently laughed to scorn the sorrow of colonel King's widow and orphans are now giving currency to another tale. They assume that Morgan's body was actually carried to Batavia and buried, and that masons removed it and put the body of Timothy Monroe in its grave, before the inquest was held in that place. This is new evidence of the "moral influences of anti-masonry," and its respect for christianity and truth. If Morgan's body was found at Oak Orchard Creek, then the body of Timothy Monroe is still in Lake Ontario. How then, the rational man will ask, could the masons put his body into Morgan's grave? Such are the weak, disgusting and pernicious falsehoods to which anti-masons now resort for assistance, to keep up the excitement, and deceive the unsuspecting.

From the (Middlebury, Vt.) National Standard

STRAIGHT FRIENDSHIP. An old gentleman, howed down with age, who had travelled some distance to join in celebrating the festival of St. John, on the 24th inst., at this place, was told that he looked too old and crooked to be at so much trouble to engage in such a celebration. "True," said the veteran, "I am old and have grown crooked under the weight of years, but time has not warped my judgment, and my friendship is as straight as ever."

ITEMS.

Southwickiana. Solomon Southwick delivered an anti-masonick oration in Hudson on the 4th of July. Solomon gives an account of the proceedings, and an extract from his own oration, in his own paper. He says he "had the satisfaction to be listened to for more than two hours, with the utmost attention by a respectable audience." We trust the audience enjoyed equal satisfaction. We have no doubt but that they were silent enough, but whether from attention or sleep, is a problem.

[N. Y. Enquirer.]

An Anti-Endorsing-Note Association. Judge Carter of Tennessee, has addressed, through the Nashville Gazette, a communication of considerable length, to the cultivators of the soil, and labourers, of Tennessee, upon the propriety of abolishing by law, the custom of endorsing notes, or becoming responsible for a debt of another person in any way whatsoever, the usual securities in courts of justice, of course excepted. Many persons in Tennessee have pledged themselves to use all possible and lawful exertions to procure the passage of such a law; and no small excitement exists among the people.

At the conclusion of the religious ceremonies in Newfoundland, for the emancipation of the Irish Catholics, the Rev. Mr. Flemming desired his congregation to give three cheers for the King, three for the Duke of Wellington, three for Mr. Peel, and as many as their lungs would permit for Daniel O'Connell—which was complied with to the letter.

[Boston Palladium.]

Judicial Dignity. The following conversation is said to have passed between a venerable old lady and a certain presiding judge of this state. The judge was supported on the right and on the left by his humble associates, and the old lady was called to give evidence.

President Judge. Take off your bonnet, madam.

Lady. I would rather not, sir.

P. J. I desire you to put off your bonnet.

L. I am informed, that in public assemblies, the women should cover the head; such is the custom—and, of course, I will not take off my bonnet.

P. J. Why, you are a pretty woman! Indeed, I think you had better come and take a seat on the bench.

L. I thank you kindly, sir—but I really think there are old women enough there already.

[Ohio Sun.]

The drinking spirituous liquors has been prohibited in one of the Islands of Owyhee, under the penalty of five hogs; the chiefs, who are the law makers, have shown a very sound judgment in this matter. The penalty is remarkably appropriate.

A young man was lately knocked down by the hail in a storm at Drummond, U. C. One piece contained eight cubick inches of ice!

A man, escaping from a savage country, was rejoiced at the sight of a gallows, as it convinced him he had got into a civilized region.

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF SCIENCE AND ARTS

Was projected in 1817, and commenced in July 1818. Before that period, no original journal of science had appeared in this country, except that of Dr. Bruce, which was limited to mineralogy, and ceased with the completion of the first volume. The American Journal has been sustained with little reward, and under vicissitudes sometimes discouraging, until it has reached its sixteenth volume. Ample illustrations, by engravings, and a large excess of matter, in every number, beyond what was stipulated, have made it an expensive work.

From its commencement to the present time, it has cost from 15,000 to 16,000 dollars, and nearly all that has been received has been paid for the support of the work; leaving little except the exchange journals, and the back volumes.

Hereafter, the expenses will not fall short of $2000, per annum; and should all the copy be paid for, they may swell even to $2500, or more, and the editor alone is responsible.

As the writings of others have been so largely and liberally contributed to the pages of the Journal, the editor may be permitted to say, that there is in his hands sufficient evidence to show, that it has essentially promoted some of our best interests at home; that it has been well received abroad; and that it has become, in some measure, identified with the progress of the Science and Arts of the present day. This being the fact, is it unreasonable to ask, of this great and opulent nation, that the number of good subscribers, (which has never exceeded six hundred, and which has been recently diminished by a failure in England,) should be so far augmented, that the editor may be enabled to command all the intellectual as well as mechanical aid, necessary to the perfection and perpetuity of the work?

By steady perseverance, through the period of eleven years, it is now ascertained that an American Journal of Science and Arts can be sustained, so as to acquire respect and confidence in Europe; but this Journal has still to obtain an ad-quate patronage at home; a patronage sufficient to place it permanently and securely on the highest ground.

ONE THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS ARE NECESSARY to give the American Journal entire security; and to add, in the most desirable degree, to its efficiency, and to the excellence of its execution, both in its material, and in its external dress. Who can doubt that, with proper exertions, FIVE HUNDRED additional subscribers may be obtained?

As on a former occasion, (1827) when a similar appeal saved the Journal from extinction, it is now again respectfully suggested, as a definite means of compassing an object which appears so desirable, that all those who now honour the Journal with their patronage, should make the SIMPLE, PRECISE EFFORT, OF PROCURING EACH, ONE ADDITIONAL SUBSCRIBER; and that such others as may approve of the design, should add their own names.

To all those to whom it may be acceptable, a satisfactory compensation will be made for the trouble of obtaining good subscribers.

On those who two years since, with equal kindness and publick spirit, successfully made this effort, it might be indelicate to press it again; still, there is no reason to doubt that their influence would now be, as it then was, effectual; and it is therefore again invited, in aid of the exertions of those to whom the subject may now, for the first time, commend itself.

Although the American Journal has been published near one of our most ancient and important universities, it has never had any local feature, nor has it espoused, or been sustained by any local interest.

The editor deems it no dishonour to confess, that his feelings are deeply interested in its success; and that it has been, from the beginning, his ambition and his pride, to see the American Journal established as a permanent NATIONAL WORK; destined to survive when he shall have ceased from his labours. He hopes now to see it flourish with new vigour, and with extended usefulness and honour.

Its contributors and its editor have perseveringly laboured in the good cause of useful knowledge, and an appeal is now made to all the friends of American science, and (perhaps it is not improper to add,) to the personal friends of the editor, that the subscription to the American Journal of Science and Arts, may be promptly and adequately increased.

B. SILLIMAN.

YALE COLLEGE, July 1, 1829.

The terms are three dollars a volume in advance, and there are two volumes a year, of two numbers each; they were originally stipulated to contain 320 pages, but have averaged more than 400.

MARRIED,

At Athens, on the 6th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Prentiss, Mr. SAMUEL MILLER, to Miss MARIA DELENOY.

DIED,

In New-York, on Monday last, WILLIAM COLEMAN, esq. late senior editor of the New-York Evening Post, in the 64th year of his age.

TWO PRINTERS AND EDITORS.—Pecuniary embarrassments induce the proprietor of the BUFFALO REPUBLICAN to offer it for sale. The materials of the office embrace a greater variety and extent than any other in the western country—from Pearl to 20 and Piccadilly. The materials are all new, or nearly new, but few having been used more than a year. There is a large assortment of flowers, cuts, &c. thirty quires are printed weekly, and not more than 30 papers are taken by mail carriers or post riders. The permanent yearly advertising will over reach 500 dollars, the "occasional" advertisements will amount to 300 dollars more. The job printing, (not including book binding) will average 30 dollars a week. The materials have cost about 50.00 dollars.

The whole office will be sold for 2300 dollars—the present editor retaining in the establishment for a stated term, if desired, for a reasonable compensation. One half will be sold for 1100 dollars; or one-third for 767 dollars—the purchaser being either an editor of talents and experience, or a good practical printer. In case either of the two last propositions should be taken up, a partnership, proportionably reciprocal in all respects, will be arranged. The title to the materials will be passed by men of undoubted responsibility.

Money being the object of selling, a handsome payment down will be expected; and the rest amply secured, and on a reasonable credit.

It may be remarked, with entire truth, that the future prospects of Buffalo warrant the belief that the Buffalo Republican will become as profitable and as popular a publication as may be found in this section of the state.

The purchaser must be a Jackson republican.

Persons desiring further particulars can obtain them by applying to the subscriber by letter, (post-paid,) or otherwise.

STANZA,

GIVEN WITH A PORTRAIT OF WALTER SCOTT.

The mightiest magician that e'er threw
His wizard spells around the human heart;—
Thodght's fairest painter, catching ev'ry hue
And shade that life's strange scenes impart.
Gaze on his face—Is not that brow so high
The home of genius, talent's chosen spot?
Gaze there, and in that bright and flashing eye
Read Fancy's favourite artist—Walter Scott. H.

THE IMPRISONED.

He started from his sleep. The chain
Clanked on his stirring limb,
The fatal truth came back again,
Like an echoed curse to him.
Chained and alone—his proud heart rose,
Like a tided river then;
And his curse went forth as the Samiel goes,
To the doomed abodes of men.

Ye've bound your gyves upon the hand,
And fettered down the form,
And tampled on the freeman's land,
With his father's blood yet warm.
Ye've bound me where the sun is not,
Where the star-light never falls,
But ye humble not the kingly thought
That mocks your guarded walls.

The soul, the godlike soul is free,
Its glory is not dim,
It gathers sterner energy
From every tortured limb.
Dream ye that feelings nursed as mine
Are touched by human ill?
The form beneath its chains may pine,
The soul is mighty still.

And heavier ye may bind the chain—
My spirit shall not quail;
Though madness revel on my brain
The heart shall never fail.
Ye cannot crush—it for the deep,
And burn the sense of wrong,
Through every weary hour, shall keep
Its thirst of vengeance strong.

That sleepless vengeance! it will come—
A whirlwind upon earth.
The dungeon stone—the very tomb
Shall send its summons forth.
The injured spirit sleepeth not,—
It may not be confined—
The tyrant's hand hath never wrought
A fetter for the mind!

THE SAILOR'S GRAVE.

"Sleep on—sleep on—the glittering depths
Of Ocean's coral caves
Are thy bright urn—thy requiem
The music of its waves."

Beneath the cold and joyless wave,
Which flashes with a thousand dyes,
In an unseen, unfathomed grave,
The sailor's wasting body lies.
The booming waves go sounding on,
To meet the far off rock-bound shore,
And mingling in a thousand gone,
With a deep, sullen, endless roar.

He sleeps within a nation's tomb,
Unnumbered nations' wealth around,
Where lustrous stones light up the gloom,
And golden harps forever sound;
The mermaids comb their amber hair
Around the spot where he reposes,
And hold their sportive revels there,
When night around the ocean closes.

Far down the deep the sun-beams fly,
And linger in its caves awhile,
And light the coral grottoes nigh,
Above a navy's ruined pile;
The long green sea-weed floats around
The corse of many a nation's pride;
The wealth of empires strews the ground,
And o'er their relics monsters ride.

The stars shed down their paly gleams,
Into the chambers of the deep,
And cast their ever flickering beams,
On him who lies in dreamless sleep;
His hair, like burning threads of gold,
Gently around his forehead waves,
And gems, and pearls, and wealth untold,
The floor around his body paves.

Still lies the sailor's mouldering form,
Shrouded in rubies for a pall;
Above him rides the howling storm,
Hoarse sounding like a demon's call;
That heart which once with ardour burned,
Has ceased its notes of joy to play,
Those sightless eyes are now upturned
To where his soul has winged its way.

The springs of ocean rise and flow,
Along a bed of scattered gems,
And through the caves of ocean glow,
A host of wasted diadems;
But what is all their proud display
To him whose living spirit's fled?
To him whose soul has passed away,
Into the regions of the dead!

YOUTH vs TIME.

BY MISS JEWELRY.

Youth went suing to Time one day,
But not in the spring-tide clear;
It was in winter, cold and gray,
On the eve of the dying year.
Youth danced into the sage's cell,
With his nodding plume and jingling bell;
"Give you good day," said the frolick mime,
And doffed his cap—not a word said Time.

Time sat posting his books that night,
(All the world is in his debt,)
That, ere he issued more "bills at sight,"
None might the balance forget.
Youth peeped o'er his shoulder with laugh and jeer,
Saying—"What, have we old Rothschild here?
But prison and penance are nought to me,
Since I myself have a debt 'gainst thee."

Time looked up, with his scythe beside him,
And face commercially long,
While the lock on his forehead said, "Wo betide him,
Time's exchequer is strong."
Youth turned over the ledger of life,
"You have noted," quoth he, "my follies and strife,
But where are the promises made me here,
When I called on your worship, this day, last year

You were but a bugbear, you said, to the old,
That youth was your darling joy,
And for me your sanes should be mixed with gold,—
I've not had a grain, old boy.
"T is not the thing, when gentlemen meet,
That each should call the other a cheat;
But pay me each promise ere morning chime,
Or else I must call you out, friend Time."

Time preached Youth a lecture, long,
On his expectations vain,
And bade him be thankful if one so strong,
Let even Hope remain:
Much as the wolf in the tale of note,
When the stork had plucked the bone from his throat,
Called it reward for kindness done,
That he let her abide with her head still on.

And so they reasoned with pro and con,
Like a lawyer's each reply,
Till Time bade Youth pack up and begone,
For the hour of twelve was nigh;
And his wings he must plume and his glass rub bright,
Before he commenced his New-Year's flight;—
"Pay me," said Youth, "ere I leave your cell;"
"I'll give you a promise, said Time—"farewell!"

THE BEAUTY.

The morn is up! wake, Beauty, wake!
The flow'ers are on the lea,
The blackbird sings within the brake,
The thrush is on the tree;
Forth to the balmy fields repair,
And let the breezes mild
Lift from thy brow the falling hair,
And fan my little child—
Yet if thy steps be mid the dews,
Beauty! be sure to change your shoes!

'T is noon! the butterfly springs up,
High from her couch of rest,
And scorns the little blue-bell cup
Which all night long she pressed.

Away! we'll seek the walnut's shade,
And pass the sunny hour,
The bee within the rose is laid,
And veils him in the flower;
Mark not the lustre of his wing,
Beauty! be careful of his sting!

'T is eve! but the retiring ray
A halo deigns to cast
Round scenes on which it shone all day,
And gilds them to the last:
Thus, ere thine eyelids close in sleep,
Let Memory deign to flee
Far o'er the mountains and the deep,
To cast one beam on me!
Yes, Beauty! 't is mine inmost prayer—
But do n't forget to curl your hair!

HYMN.

BY NATHANIEL A. HAVEN.

Great God! at midnight's solemn hour,
I own thy goodness and thy power,
But bending low before thy throne
I pray not for myself alone.

I pray for her, my dearest friend,
For her my fervent prayers ascend;
And while to thee my vows I bring,
For her my warmest wishes spring.

While dark and silent rolls the night,
Protect her with thy heavenly might;
Thy curtain round her pillow spread,
And circling angels guard her bed.

Let peaceful slumbers press her eyes,
Till morning beams in splendour rise;
And pure and radiant as that beam,
Be the light vision of her dream.

Let each succeeding morn impart
New pleasures to her tranquil heart,
And richer blessings crown the night,
Than met the view of morning light.
Whate'er my swelling heart desires,
When fervent prayer to heaven aspires,
Whate'er has warmed my fancy's glow
May she, with tenfold richness, know.

O God! may she thy laws fulfil,
And live and die thy fav'rite still;
Live, to enjoy thy bounteous hand,
And die, to join thy seraph band.

MASONICK RECORD.

MASONRY ANTI-MASONRY.

From the Village Record. By the Hon. Charles Miner, late Representative in Congress, from Pennsylvania.

This is certainly a heavy punishment. If ratified by society at large, we will venture to affirm, that it is the most cruel, sweeping edict of disfranchisement that ever was heard of, in a government professing to be guided by justice and mercy.

And without trial! When and where have we had an opportunity to be heard? What is our offence? What law have we violated? Whom have we injured? What widow mourns? What orphans cry? What poor man complains, of the Masons of Chester county? Than an edict is to go forth against them collectively and individually, by which we, every one of us, are forever to be considered as disgraced, dishonoured, unworthy of confidence, unfit to be trusted. Indeed, indeed, before this upright—this generous people, I must say, the sentence—the suddenness of it—without trial, and so far as I know without intentional offence on our part, seems very severe. I put the question to any impartial man, woman or child, who is capable of forming an opinion upon this matter, and is unprejudiced, if such a sentence of exclusion, and dishonour, would not be thought cruel and unjust, even in a despotical government? I can not think in this enlightened day and age, it will be ratified by the free and liberal and just people of Chester county.

If this sentence of sweeping denunciation, and indiscriminate condemnation, be just, it must have an adequate cause, and that cause must be the infamy of character and conduct of those citizens of Chester county, who are Masons. Is this the case? Tell them over one by one—two by two, and do they deserve it at your hands? If they do—carry the principle out; will you refuse to associate with a Mason? why not, if he be so infamous? will you refuse him your daughter in marriage? why not, if he be so infamous? will you authorise your Assembly-men to vote for a law, taking away from the Freemason the right of being elected to office—to disfranchise him? Why not, if it be right that he should be so disfranchised?

Look at your publick men, those who have served you as faithful, honest servants. Let me speak of James Kelton. He is a Mason. Did he ever swerve, when in office, from the line of impartial duty? Have you ever had reason to be dissatisfied with the manner in which he has performed the various and honourable trusts to which your generous confidence has raised him? It so happens that two of the Judges of your Court are Masons. If Masons may not be elected to office, it must of course be, because they are not worthy to hold office, and it would follow that all Masons holding commissions, should be expelled from the posts which they now occupy. Do those who take the lead in exciting and directing the anti-masonick spirit, mean to take measures to withdraw from the Court the publick confidence and to compel them to resign? It would seem to flow as a natural consequence from the denunciations against Masons and Masonry. But General Jackson is a Mason; is an opposition to him on that ground, to be raised? knowing the general correctness, good principles and good feelings of the anti-mason leaders, who have rendered themselves conspicuous in Chester county, I am persuaded they mean to produce no such results—and that they look to no such ends. The spirit to condemn without trial, to visit the sins of the guilty upon the heads of the innocent, to disfranchise and render infamous and contemptible any portion of their fellow citizens who have walked faithfully as publick and private members of society, and who have done them no injury, must be foreign from their hearts. They rejoice with us Masons, we are sure, that the shackles so long imposed on the Roman Catholics of Ireland, are at length broken! What were those shackles? They were interdicted from holding office. By the late glorious law extending freedom to them, they are now eligible to office, like the rest of their fellow subjects; and the anti-mason rejoices in their enfranchisement. Utterly impossible therefore, is it for me to imagine that they yet deliberately wish to disfranchise a portion, however small, of their fellow citizens at home.

I am led, therefore, to the conclusions, that the form of their resolutions must have been borrowed from those used in New-York, and I have shown that they there were perverted to political purposes. Ambitious men, who wished to get into office, and desired to exclude all Masons, especially those who were in their way, got the Resolutions so drawn and adopted. But that purpose has been discovered—the policy has been exploded; but through accident, or perhaps want of full information, the leaders of the anti-masons here have fallen into the error of copying and adopting as matter of course, those politically bearing resolutions.

If they have not a direct political tendency, it is not distinctly seen why Masons are to be excluded only from office—why not, if really infamous, exclude us from all society,—from all business? But publick offices, and the attainment of them, are emphatically, political matters, and therefore the resolutions have, exclusively, a political bearing. If this goes on, it is clear as day, that ambitious men here, eager for office, will make anti-masonry, and the excitement growing out of it, a stepping stone to preferment; the means of gratifying their ambition.

To prevent this, we propose to the people, who, we presume, will take no part on either side, to watch the course of events, and to see that no ambitious man makes anti-masonry a hobby-horse to gratify his own ambition and thirst for power. And we put it to the anti-masonick leaders, that they enforce among themselves the sentiments they avow, that they have no political purposes to subserve, and that no man who renders himself conspicuous at their meetings, be set up as a candidate for office, lest the people should think, as there would be just grounds for thinking, that such were the objects they had in view, in getting up resolutions to exclude a portion of their fellow citizens.

In conclusion, then, I would say to the people—See that no injustice, in this hour of excitement, be done. If in your deliberate judgment, Freemason lodges should cease—express your opinion to that effect, and vent your displeasure against those who shall, after your will is fully declared, endeavour to counteract it! But if men have innocently and without any evil motive or conduct, and without the slightest expression of your disapprobation, become Masons, do not the injustice, in this Republick, of punishing them by sentence of disfranchisement, for that which was not censurable when it was done.

C. MINER.

Note 1. That Masonry was not thought very ill of by the Society of Friends, is manifest from the fact, that some of the members of that respectable society are Masons.

2. The Friends' Society have been persecuted. They have felt the hand of persecution sorely. Have they not, also, their secret meetings, at which the world are not permitted to be present? There are doubtless those, there certainly have been those, who would have put down that society if in their power. The Methodist Society too, has been contemned and reviled. There were some who did not like the silence of Friends, and complained of the loud preaching of the Methodists; and would have put them both down if they could. The worthy members of these religious denominations of Christians, we feel assured, will judge Masons as they judge the rest of their fellow men, by their general professions and conduct—they will not condemn them in mass—they will not disfranchise them by a single sweeping resolution. So far as experience has shown that they are faithful and trust-worthy, they will still respect and confide in them.

3. At the Masonick celebration at Col. Filson's some years ago, three or four Presbyterian ministers were present, and took part in the exercises of the day. A very respectable and talented clergyman of the Presbyterian Church, joined in the procession and solemnities of the occasion of laying the corner stone of the Masonick Hall, in Downingtown. After having so far given the Lodge their countenance, we are perfectly satisfied they will be too just to sanction a sweeping vote of denunciation and disfranchisement against the whole order. Liberty, justice—every generous sentiment forbids it.

4. If we do not greatly err, the Rev. Dr. STAUGHTON, a well known, eloquent, and pious minister of the Baptist Church, in Philadelphia, is a Mason.

5. Would it not be well, to remove all suspicion that the anti-masonick society may be converted into a political engine—to pass a vote, at all their meetings, that while they mean to exclude Masons from office, those who constitute the meeting, pledge themselves to accept of no office or appointment of profit or honour?

6. General Warren, who sealed his devotion to Liberty, with his blood, on the glorious though fatal field of Bunker Hill, was a Grand Master of Masons. His cruel enemies buried him with a halter about his neck. In every age Masons have been conspicuous friends of civil liberty. It was so through the glorious Revolution that established our liberties, and they have ever been persecuted under one presence or another by the enemies of freedom. The gentlemen who are now active in kindling the flame against Masons in Chester Co. we know are pure, above reproach or even suspicion; but we venture to say, if the excitement continues to prevail, that wherever there are enemies to civil liberty, open or secret, you will find them eagerly flocking to the ranks of the anti masons.

7. One reflection must be obvious to every considerate mind; it is this—Those citizens who meet in publick to declare a portion of their fellow citizens worthless, unfit to be trusted, and denounce against them the same sentence of political disfranchisement, which has just been so happily removed under healing and liberal councils, from the Roman Catholics in Ireland, ought themselves to be without blemish, and spotless, in thought, word, and deed, as the pure ermine. It is, to say the least of it, a high prerogative, a bold assumption, to judge a portion of their fellow citizens, as infatuated "to a violation of all social and civil Rights,"—and to condemn them unheard to political ostracism forever. Those gentlemen, however correct, their motives, in this instance, should look well into their own breasts; when they are, in effect saying, "stand aside, I am holier than thou;" and see that their own hearts and conduct are right to a title, before Heaven and their fellow men.

8. If the Turks could reach us with an overpowering force, they would doubtless say—the murder of Morgan was committed by citizens of a Christian country—it shows that the Christian Religion is not of sufficient influence to restrain the bloody hand of the murderer. We must put down that system of infidelity, and introduce the pure faith of Mahomet.

The despots of Europe would say—the cruel murder of Morgan was committed by Republicans. It shows that the wild license of untamed liberty, affords no protection against the hand of the assassin. More efficiency must be given to the Government. The people must be changed from citizens to subjects, that they may feel the curb bit of power. And if they could, they would make that or any thing else, a pretence for overthrowing Republican Government. The wicked men who perpetrated the deed were citizens of a Christian Community! Why should not all Christians suffer on that account? They were citizens of a Republic! Why should not all the citizens of the Republic be held responsible? They were members of the Masonick fraternity! Why more than in the preceding cases, ought all Masons, who are innocent of, and abhor, the deed, to be held responsible and to be punished for it?

9. Solomon Southwick, esq. a man who holds a glowing pen, who was ambitious, but unpopular; who had tried all sides in politics, and eagerly sought for office, seeing the excitement in N. York, immediately set up a paper, burning with indignation against Masons. You could scarcely say Jack Robinson, however, before we find the ruling passion breaking forth—it was office, office, still office. He got himself nominated anti-masonick Candidate for Governor, and received a very large vote; something like 30,000 out of 200,000. But it had the effect greatly to arrest the anti-masonick tide; because the honest yeomanry saw it was perverted to a scheme of personal interest by a set of desperate political men.

10. I have spoken of the meetings being gotten up, for, I suppose, (at least many of them,) not to have been the spontaneous movements of the people. A distinguished gentleman and amiable citizen, who has lent his name to one meeting, did not go with the view of participating in the proceedings, but attended, as he himself says, from curiosity. Another Reverend and pious gentleman told me he was not present, and they sent for him. To the zeal, talent, standing and character of Mr. Samuel Baldwin, must be attributed the apparent popularity of the anti-masonick meetings.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF DELAWARE.

At a stated communication of the Grand Lodge of the State of Delaware, held at Wilmington, on the 27th of June, 1829, the following Grand Officers were elected:—

Archibald Hamilton, Grand Master; Joseph G. Oliver, Deputy Grand Master; William Nicholls, Senior Grand Warden; William T. Read, Junior Grand Warden; Evan H. Thomas, G. Treasurer; Samuel Harker, Grand Secretary.

The M. W. Grand Master then made the following appointments:—

MEDICAL.

REMARKABLE CASE

OF AN INSECT SUPPOSED TO BE HATCHED IN THE HUMAN BODY.

BALLSTON SPA, July 5, 1829.

Dear Sir—The following recital of a phenomena which happened about a year since, will be a subject of inquiry among naturalists and physicians. A young woman, the daughter of a respectable farmer in Edinburg, Saratoga county, in this state, while in a field of a new mown hay, felt the sting of a large green grass-hopper, as she then expressed it. Some time in the following winter, she discovered a tumour on the shoulder between the caracori and acromion process, attended with some pain and uneasiness. After about three weeks continuance, it disappeared from the shoulder, and she felt a pain along the course of the clavicle; and in May it appeared at the side of the neck, partly under the sterno clenia mastoideus muscle. Her physician treated for scrofula with apparent success, for it again disappeared, until July, when it was felt once more at the shoulder—the tumour—about the size of an hen's egg, and with evident fluctuation, when it was opened with a small discharge of unhealthy pus, and along with it a living grasshopper, two inches in length, and breadth proportionate. The only conclusion is that the egg must have been deposited the year before, and arrived to maturity by a process of incubation. Should you think this narrative worthy of being generally known, you are at liberty to do as you think advisable. I remain your friend, &c. ELIPHALET ST. JOHN.

DYSPEPSIA.

This term, which has become incorporated into every day's conversation, is the malady of indigestion, and might also be appropriately called the vice of indolence. When nature is curtailed of her fair proportion of exercise, fresh air, and sound aliment—when she is loaded with superfluous meats and drinks—or when she is stinted in muscular action, or doomed to languish under oppressive sleep, debility and obstruction seize on the vitals, and dyspepsia comes among the first in the train of disorders, to prey upon the human system. What is the remedy? Return to nature—abjure all aliments which are not fitting in a child—taste the fresh air of heaven in long walks and regular exercise—give to slumber but six out of the twenty four hours—abjure all quackery, your soot tea, your lie solutions, your blue pills, your antacids, your roborants and stomachicks. In the use of wholesome exercise on foot or on horse, more may be accomplished than from all other remedies together. It is to be used generally till sweating is induced—not perspiration, but till briny drops stand on the forehead. Exercise propels the blood throughout the small vessels of the system, and gives to the skin that kind of action which sustains the equilibrium of vital power: the lungs inspire more air in a given time, when excited by muscular motion, than when the body is at rest—and the blood is thus enabled to part with its excreted and receive its vivifying principles.

"To cure the mind's wrong bias spleen—
Some recommend the Bowling green;
Some hilly walks—all exercise;
Fling but a stone—the giant dies."

We confidently recommend the following prescription to dyspepticks, as the best we know for their disease.

Take a walk from five till six in the morning. Make your breakfast on a cup of black tea, and a tumbler of milk with crackers.

Take a walk from ten till twelve before dinner.

Take your dinner of boiled mutton, or beef, with out butter or gravy, with any simple vegetable; a tumbler of milk, with a cherry pie, will do for a dessert—be moderate.

Beware of sleep after dinner—dose a little on an arm chair.

Take exercise two hours after dinner, freely; very freely; and let your supper be the most moderate repast during the day. If you are hungry during the interval between meals, eat crackers or stale bread, or a little ginger-bread—drink nothing stronger than mead, or spruce beer—beware of the ardent.

TOPOGRAPHY.

From the Boston Bulletin

OREGON TERRITORY.

But little is known of this Territory, in this section of our country, and still less of the River from which it derives its name. So extensive is the continent of America, and so much of it remains yet unexplored, that many, very many of our citizens are more thoroughly acquainted with the localities and condition of Europe, than with the climate, soil, vegetable and animal productions of certain portions of their own country. The Miner's Journal gives some extracts from a work recently published in French, by a gentleman who resided several years west of the Rocky Mountains, which give a more minute and interesting account of the Territory above mentioned, than we have before seen published.

During the three years which he spent in the vicinity of the Columbia or Oregon River, the cold seldom passed the freezing point, and the heat was never greater than 75 or 76 degrees. West winds are most frequent in spring and the early part of summer—northwest winds in the latter part of summer and first of autumn—and southwest winds blow almost continually from the first of October till the beginning of January, which is the rainy season, and most disagreeable part of the year.

The result of several experiments satisfied him that the land along the Columbia is generally unfit for cultivation, though the soil is not every where the same, and there were probably places which would yield abundant crops. Various kinds of garden seeds were planted by him in the month of May; but though his garden had a fine appearance in August, and the vegetables were suffered to remain in the ground until the end of December, still nothing came to maturity but radishes, turnips and potatoes. The turnips were of a prodigious size, one of the largest measuring thirty-three inches in circumference, and weighing fifteen and a half pounds. A dozen of potatoes produced ninety, which were planted the succeeding spring, but the second season was so much colder than the first, that these produced nothing at all.

Cedar, spruce, white pine, hemlock, &c. were the most common trees, the cedars being generally four or five fathoms in circumference, and the hemlocks from 12 to 20 inches in diameter. An immense white pine tree is mentioned, which seven men, standing with their arms extended, were not able to encircle, and which upon admeasurement was found to be forty-two feet in circumference.

Wild fruits in abundance are to be found from the middle of June to the middle of October. Besides the raspberry, the months of July and August furnish a pleasant acid fruit of a blue colour, about the size of a cherry, and another fruit which grows in clusters on a small bush like the garden currant, which has a fine taste, is wholesome, and may be eaten in any quantities without injury. Blackberries, cherries, currants, wild pears and crab-apples are also found; together with a great variety of nutritious roots of which the natives make great use. There is one in particular, which they reduce to paste by pounding, make into cakes of five or six pounds weight, and bake it on flat stones heated in the fire—producing a bread almost as palatable as our own.

Salmon and sturgeon abound in the Columbia River, during certain parts of the year, and these constitute the principal food of the natives. The salmon fishery commences in July, and continues until August; in the latter part of which month, and during September, sturgeon of an excellent quality, are caught. Some of these are very large, one which he saw measuring 11 feet, and weighing 390 pounds. In October and November salmon are again to be had, though of a different species and poorer quality. In the month of February, a small species of fish of a very fine flavour, is taken in abundance; but these remain only a short time.

The quadrupeds of this Territory are the elk, the fallow-deer, the black-tailed deer, the roe deer, the black bear, the brown bear, the grey bear, the white bear, the wolf, the panther, the tiger, the raccoon, the whistler, a species of marmot, the land otter, and the sea otter. The grey bear is represented as being extremely fierce and carnivorous.

The most remarkable birds are the nun eagle, the black eagle, the turkey-buzzard, the hawk, the pelican, the cormorant, the swan, the heron, the crane, the bustard, a variety of ducks, and several species of geese. The nun eagle is so called, from its having a white head, though the rest of its plumage is of a dirty black.

THE NATURALIST.

REAL TOADSTONE.

The discovery of toads in secondary rocks is often announced in public journals. A very particular account was published in the newspapers, of one found at Lockport, United States, while they were cutting the Erie canal bed, in the geodiferous lime rock. Professor Amos Eaton, of New York, collected all the facts in his power, and examined the rock from which it was taken. The evidence would have been sufficient to establish, he states, any ordinary fact. But there seemed to be so many ways for illiterate labourers to deceive themselves, that he took no further notice of the report. He has, however, since received an account of a large dark brown toad being found in a rock of mill-stone grit, near Whitesborough, "which I cannot," he says, "hesitate to believe. While laying the cellar wall of the house of one of the representatives in the legislature of this State, (New York) two respectable masons, entitled to the highest confidence, whom he examined personally, had occasion to split a large stone from the quarry, which he calls the mill-stone grit. It was perfectly close-grained and compact. On opening it they discovered a black or dark brown spherical mass, about three inches in diameter, in a cavity which it filled. On examining it particularly, they found it to be a toad, much larger than the common species, and of a darker colour. It was perfectly stupid. It was laid upon a stone, and soon began to give signs of life. In a few hours it would hop moderately on being disturbed. They saw it in the yard moving about moderately for several days; but it was not watched by them any further, and no one observed its ulterior movements. They laid one half of the stone in the wall, so that the cavity may still be seen. The millstone grit in which this stone was found is the oldest of the secondary rocks. It must have been formed many centuries before the deluge. Was this toad more than 4,000 years old? or was it from an egg introduced through a minute and undiscovered cleavage into this cavity, a geode made precisely to fit the size and form of a toad? I was particular in my inquiry, and learned from them that the whole stone was perfectly compact, without any open cleavage which would admit an egg. Besides, it is well known that the millstone grit is neither porous nor geodiferous. If this rock stratum was deposited upon the toad, it must have been in aqueous, not in igneous solution, and the toad must have been full grown at the time. Toads are often found in compact hard gravelly diluvial deposits, in situations which demonstrate that they must have lived from the time of the deluge. I think I am warranted in saying this," adds the Professor, "without citing authorities, as it is a common occurrence. Then why may they not have lived a few centuries longer, if we admit them a life of at least 3,000 years?"

DEATH OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

Shepherd. Pity me! how they moan, and groan, and greet, and wring their hauns, and tear their hair, even old auld folk their thin gray hair, when death comes into the bed-room, or the verra drawing-room, and carries off in his clutches some wee hit spoiled bairn, yaummerin' amang its playthings, or keepin' its mither awake a' nicht by its perpetual cries!

North—Touch tenderly, James—on—

Shepherd—Ane wad thing that nae parents had ever lost a child afore—yet hoo mony a sma' funeral do you see ilka day pacin' along the streets unheeded on amang the carts and hackney-coaches!

North—Unheeded as a party of upholsterer's meh carrying furniture to a new house.

Shepherd—There is little or naething o' this thochtless, this senseless clamour in kintra houses, when the cloud o' God's judgement passes ower them, and order are gien for a grave to be dug in the kirkyard. A' the house is hushed and quate—just the same as if the patient were still sick, and no gane awa'—the father, and, perhaps, the mither, the brothers, and the sisters, are a' ganging about their ordinary business, wi' grave faces nae doubt, and some o' them now and then dichtin the draps frae their een; but after the first black day, little audible greetin', and nae indecent and impious outcries.

North—The angler, calling in at the cottage, would never know that a corpse was the cause of the calm.

Shepherd—Rich folk, if they saw sic douce, composed ongoin's, wad doubtless wonder to think hoo callous, hoo insensible were the poor! That natur had kindly denied them those fine feelings that belong to cultivated life! But if they heard the prayer o' the auld man at nicht, when the survivin' family were on their knees around the wa', and his puir wife peist him in the holy circle, they wad ken better, and confess that there is something as sublime, as it is sincere and simple, in the resignation and piety of those humble Christians, whose doom is to live by the sweat o' their brow, and who are taught, almost frae the cradle to the grave, to feel every hour their breath, that all they enjoy, and all they suffer, is dropt down from the hand o' God, almost as visibly as the dew or the hail;—and hence their faith in things unseen and eternal is firm as their belief in things seen and temporal—and that they a' feel, Sir, when letting down the coffin into the grave!

PENALTY FOR SELLING OPIUM IN CHINA.

Dealers in opium shall be exposed with the wooden collar about their necks one month, and then sent to the army on the frontier; accomplices shall be punished with 100 blows and transported three years. Those who open shops to sell opium and entice the sons of respectable families to smoke shall be condemned to death, by strangling, after a period of confinement; accomplices shall be punished with 100 blows, and transported three years. Masters of boats, constables, and neighbours shall be punished with 100 blows and three years transportation. Officers of government at court, who buy and smoke opium, shall be dismissed from the service, receive 100 blows, and be exposed with the collar about their neck two months. Soldiers and people who buy and smoke opium, shall be punished with 100 blows, and exposed with the collar one month. Eunuchs of the palace who buy and smoke opium shall be exposed with the collar about their necks two months, then sent to the territories, and be given to the soldiers as slaves, &c. Further, those officers, military and civil, who neglect to discover and seize opium, and the hoppo of Canton who fails in this part of his duty, shall be delivered over to a court of inquiry, and punished according to its decision.

KING MURAT A WAITER.

Just before the breaking out of the French revolution, two English gentlemen resident in Paris were in the daily habit of frequenting the restaurateur kept by Beauvillier; they were always attended by a waiter remarkably for his attention and civility to his guests. Our countrymen were accustomed to carouse with uproarious mirth the whole night, and, indeed, frequently upon a late hour in the morning. This practice breaking in upon the quiet custom of the house, and the regular habits of the waiter, at last exhausted his patience, and he intimated to Beauvillier that he should quit his service if the Englishmen were permitted to continue their nightly inroads upon his rest. Beauvillier preferring the presence of his noisy guests to the convenience of his servant, the waiter left his service and entered the army. After the peace the two English gentlemen again visited Paris, and entering their old place of resort, were instantly recognized and welcomed by Beauvillier, who called to their recollection the hasty and angry departure of the waiter, adding, that "Messieurs, by their mirth, had spoiled an excellent waiter, and created a very indifferent king." The indignant waiter was Murat, afterwards King of Naples.

FIRE PROOF DRESS.

The Austrian government of Milan have rewarded the Chevalier Giovanni Aldini with a gold medal, for an invention by which the qualities of metallick gauzes, of being impermeable to flame, are applied with advantage in the forming a dress for firemen. This dress is made in the fashion of the armour of the knights of the chivalrous ages, and consists of a tissue of asbestos covered with a metallick gauze. It is represented to be at once incumbrable, a non-conductor of heat, so light as to be no impediment to the most prompt agility, and no hindrance to efforts of strength. Specimen dresses of the kind, with directions for making them, will be forwarded on reasonable terms to foreign states, on application to the inventor at Milan, free of postage.

THEATRICAL ANECDOTE.

The following remarkable anecdote is extracted from "An Essay on the Science of Acting."—In the town of North Walsham, in 1788, the Fair Penitent was performed. In the last act, where Calisto lays her hand on the skull, a Mrs. Barry, who played the part, was seized with an involuntary shuddering, and fell on the stage: during the night her illness continued, but the following day, when sufficiently recovered to converse, she sent for the stage-keeper, and anxiously inquired whence he procured the skull: he replied from the sexton, "who informed him it was the skull of one Norris, a player, who twelve years before was buried in the churchyard." That same Norris was her first husband; she never recovered the shock, and died in six weeks.

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

Colonel Despreaux, in a late pamphlet on the Police of Paris, remarks, that there seem to be different periods for different crimes. He had always observed the summer months to be comparatively months of low riot. November began the burglaries, January and February the stealing of pocket-handkerchiefs and snuff-boxes, probably from the conflux to the theatres at that time. But, that swindling transactions, and all other frauds that require peculiar dexterity, were prevalent about March.

BEEES.

Alternations of torpor and animation cause greater exhaustion and loss of physical powers, than would be occasioned by a continuance of uniform torpor. This we infer from the fact, that in Russia, where the winters are uniformly cold, bees do not perish; and in the West Indies where there is perpetual verdure, they are never exhausted.

ONIONS.

Lord Bacon tells us of a man who fasted five days, without meat, bread, or drink, by smelling a wisp of herbs, among which were strong onions.

VENTILATION.

Garrick told Cibber, "that his pieces were the best ventilators to his theatre at Drury Lane; for as soon as any of them were played, the audience directly left the house."

DISPLAY.

Wear your learning like your watch, in a private pocket, and don't pull it out to show that you have one; but if you are asked what o'clock it is, tell it.

THE MONEY DIGGERS.

Zachariah was generally accounted an honest sort of a fellow, who wished no one harm, and would fain have been at peace with all the world—or rather he wished all the world at peace with him—for his timidity was so conspicuous that there were not wanting those who thought him a downright coward. Be that as it may, numerous were Zach's protestations of philanthropy and good will to all.

Among his foibles the most notorious were his credulity and superstition. He was a firm believer in the existence of witches, ghosts, and the like preternatural creatures, and used to aver in the strongest terms that he had seen spooks again and again. Dreams were regarded by him as oracles, and he was heard every morning relating the fancies of the night with a minute exactness and solemnity that showed how vastly important he deemed them. On one occasion Zachariah dreamed that an old man, with a long white beard, haggard cheek, huge rolling black eyes, and a nose like a potato, appeared to him, and told him that a chest of money was buried in a neighbouring hill. He pointed out the exact spot where it was to be found, but cautioned him not to approach it alone, as the treasure was guarded by divers furious imps, who were appointed to protect it when it was buried by its wicked owners. This dream worked upon Zach's sensitive imagination, until he determined to take some means to gain possession of the lucre, which he did not for a moment doubt, was to be found in the place designated. For among his most powerful impulses, was a desire of wealth, and in this instance it was found sufficiently strong to overcome his usual cowardice. His huge, projecting gray eye twinkled with delight as he ruminated on the heaps of gold and silver that would reward his exertions, and permit him to indulge what he loved above all things—his ease.

In order to accomplish his scheme, it was necessary to get an accessory—for he found it impossible to bring his resolution to the sticking point, to embark in so hazardous an undertaking alone. Accordingly, he repaired to a crony of his, a clerk in a neighbouring store, and laid before him the whole affair. The clerk was a shrewd fellow, a great lover of fun, and withal, something of a wag. He listened attentively to Zach's artless tale, and seemed to enter warmly into his plan. Being encouraged with the assurance of a coadjutor, he became confident of success, and a night was appointed, on which they were jointly to put the business in execution.

On the time appointed, he repaired punctually to the store, and found his friend with several young chaps within. As he entered, he thought he detected sly glances, and one or two smothered laughs passing around the group. Now, there was nothing, with the exception of a ghost, of which our hero stood in so much apprehension as ridicule. His countenance was therefore beginning to be clothed with a silly expression of consciousness, when he was relieved by his friend, who desired his comrades to depart. When all had dispersed, he inquired in a confidential manner if all was ready. Zach informed him that he had brought a spade and crowbar, but no instrument of defence. This defect was supplied by the clerk, who took down an old musket that looked as though it had been through as many wars as the tailor of Newport.

Thus equipped, they sallied forth, and soon reached the spot designated by the old man. It was about ten o'clock, and the night chanced to be somewhat unpropitious. The moon and stars were obscured by a thick canopy of clouds, which, driven by the cool brisk winds, pursued each other rapidly across the pale face of heaven. The sable darkness, and the whistling of the wind, would have excited the terrors of our adventurer at any other time; but he was braced up by the "sacra fama auri," and determined to persevere. He commenced digging lustily with the spade, while his companion stood near the spot, his antiquated firelock in his hand, ready to give a deadly greeting to any intruder. The clerk threw out occasionally a word of encouragement to the laborious digger, urging him to expedite his work as fast as possible.

"How far below the surface did the old man say the money was hid," asked the clerk.

"He said 't was about six feet," said the other, breathing hard with fatigue—"and he told me 't was in an iron chest, and when my spade struck upon it, the imps that guarded it would appear, and fight for it. But hark!—didn't you hear a noise?"

"A noise! from whence did it come?" "I thought it proceeded from that grove of trees yonder." "Pshaw! its nothing but some cow rustling among the branches. Dig on, my good fellow, or we sha'n't get to it before morning." Zach resumed his labour, but his apprehensions were not entirely silenced. Although he had much confidence in the valour of his comrade, he begun to suspect he had entered upon an undertaking too daring and hazardous for him.

"I heard of a man once," said he, solemnly, "who was digging for money one night all alone, and after working about two hours, his spade struck upon an iron chest, and no sooner was the sound made, than he heard somebody say in a horrid grum voice, 'Let that chest alone,' and upon that—" Here Zach was interrupted by a hollow voice answering as if it had been an echo, "Let that chest alone." The spade fell from his hands as if they were palsied, and his knees began to go at loggerheads together.

"What ails you?" asked his companion, coolly—"why don't you dig on." "Good heavens!" exclaimed the other, "didn't you hear that voice?" "Voice! what voice! it's only your fancy—there's no danger, and I can defend you if there should be any."

Somewhat encouraged by these assurances, Zach resumed his spade, but his limbs were unnerved and his strength flagging. Again he bent to his labour, when, just as he was in the act of throwing up his spade full of dirt, a glaring ball of fire issued with the rapidity of lightning from the grove, and fell but a few feet from the astounded money seekers. For a moment every object was lighted up with a frightful glare, and the pale, lantern-jawed phiz of Zachariah was elongated at least six inches by pure horror. He thought he discovered the dark forms of a troop of misshapen imps among the trees.

Overcome by terror, he called out in loud terms to his companion to protect him. "I'll give it to them," answered he resolutely. He snapped his musket in the direction of the assailants, but it missed fire. Upon this a loud laugh proceeded from the wood, which sounded to the ears of our adventurer like the giggling of demons.

But it had scarcely subsided to stillness, when another of those horrid fireballs was coursing its way through the air towards him. Its light served to show him that his friend was missing. He had no time, however, to comment on the strangeness of the circumstance, for the next instant his hat was knocked ten feet from his head by the ball. It went directly into the hole he had been digging, and the darkness returned blacker than ever.

As yet Zach had been in a sort of stupor, but this last hint served to make him sensible that he must try for his life. Adopting the sentiment that "the better part of valour is discretion," especially when there are infernal foes to contend with, he exerted every faculty and ran. 'T is said that with some, fear has the effect to repress and cripple the muscular powers—"t was not so with Zach—once in motion, he flew over the ground as rapidly as one of his own ghosts, and neither stopped nor looked behind, although the imps pursued him with their fireballs, and what was scarcely less terrible, their hideous laughs until he was fairly at his own door.

Zach was never afterwards found talking about digging money, nor would he even approach the scene of this catastrophe, except in broad daylight. It was shrewdly surmised, that the imps who had so frightfully beleaguered the poor fellow, were neither more nor less than some wild young bucks, who had been let into the secret by the clerk, and who had furnished themselves with cotton balls from a neighbouring factory, and having wet them well with turpentine, sent them lighted at the devoted head of the money digger. But Zach always remained firm in the belief that his enemies were veritable imps of the evil one, sent to protect treasures that had been won by deeds of wickedness. LEO.

SIR HERMAN AND DANNISCHEMEND.

From "Anne of Geirstein," Sir Walter Scott's last novel.

"My lord, my lord, a fiend is in the stable!"

"What means this folly?" said the baron, arising, surprised and displeased at an interruption so unusual.

"Let me endure your displeasure," said Caspar, "if I speak not truth Apollyon!"

Here he paused.

"Speak out, thou frightened fool," said the Baron; "is my horse sick, or injured?"

The master of the stalls again gasped forth the word "Apollyon!"

"Say on," said the baron; "were Apollyon in presence personally, it were nothing to shake a brave man's mind!"

"The devil," answered the master of the horse, "is in Apollyon's stall!"

"Fool!" exclaimed the nobleman, snatching a torch from the wall; "what is it that could have turned thy brain in such silly fashion! Things like thee, that are born to serve us, should hold their brains on a firmer tenure, for our sakes, if not that of their worthless selves."

As he spoke he crossed the court-yard of the castle, to visit the stately range of stables which occupied all the lower part of the quadrangle on one side. He entered, where fifty gallant steeds stood in rows, on each side of the ample halls. At the side of each stall hung the weapons of offence and defence of a man-at-arms, as bright as constant attention could make them, together with the buff coat which formed the trooper's undergarment. The baron, followed by one or two of the domesticks, who had assembled full of astonishment at the unusual alarm, hastened up betwixt the row of steeds. As he approached the stall of his favourite horse, which was the uppermost of the right hand row, the good steed neither neglected, nor shook his head, nor stamped with his foot, nor gave the usual signs of joy at his lord's approach; a faint moaning, as if he implored assistance, was the only acknowledgment of the baron's presence.

Sir Herman held up the torch, and discovered that there was indeed a tall dark figure standing in stall, resting his hand on the horse's shoulder. "Who art thou?" said the baron, "and what dost thou here?"

"I seek refuge and hospitality," replied the stranger; "and I conjure thee to grant it me, by the shoulder of thy horse, and by the edge of thy sword, and so they may never fail thee when thy need is at the utmost."

"Thou art, then, a brother of the Sacred Fire," said baron Herman of Arnheim; "and I may not refuse thee the refuge which thou requirest of me, after the ritual of the Persian Magi. From whom, and for what length of time dost thou crave my protection?"

"From those," replied the stranger, "who shall arrive in quest of me before the morning cock shall crow, and for the full space of a year and a day from this period."

"I may not refuse thee," said the baron, "consistently with my oath and honour. For a year and a day I will be thy pledge, and thou shalt share with me roof and chamber, wine and food. But thou, too, must obey the law of Zoroaster, which, as it says, let the stronger protect the weaker brother, says also, let the wiser instruct the brother who hath less knowledge. I am the stronger, and thou shalt be safe under my protection; but thou art the wiser, and must instruct me in the more secret mysteries."

"You mock your servant," said the strange visitor; "but if aught is known to Dannischmend which can avail Herman, his instructions shall be as those of a father to a son."

"Come forth then from thy place of refuge," said the baron of Arnheim. "I swear to thee by the sacred fire which lives without terrestrial fuel, and by the fraternity which is betwixt us, and by the shoulder of my horse, and the edge of my good sword, I will be thy warrant for a year and a day, if so far my power shall extend."

The stranger came forth accordingly, and those who saw the singularity of his appearance, scarce wondered at the fears of Caspar, the stall master, when he found such a person in the stable, by what mode of entrance he was unable to conceive. When he reached the lighted hall to which the baron conducted him, as he would have done a welcome and honoured guest, the stranger appeared to be very tall and of a dignified aspect. His dress was Asiatick, being a long black caltan, or gown, like that worn by Armenians, and lofty square cap, covered with the wool of Astracan lambs. Every article of the dress was black, which gave relief to the long white beard that flowed down over his bosom. His gown was fastened by a sash of black silk net work, in which, instead of a poignard or sword, was stuck a silver case containing writing materials and a roll of parchment. The only ornament of his apparel consisted in a large ruby of uncommon brilliancy, which, when he approached the light, seemed to glow with such liveliness as if itself had emitted the rays which it only reflected back. To the offer of refreshment the stranger replied "Bread I may not eat, water shall not moisten my lips until the avenger shall have passed by the threshold."

The baron commanded the lamps to be trimmed, fresh torches to be lighted, and sending his whole household to rest, remained seated in the hall along with the stranger, his suppliant. At the dead hour of midnight the gates of the castle were shaken as by a whirlwind, and a voice, as if of a herald was heard to demand his lawful prisoner, Dannischemend, the son of Hall. The warder then heard a lower window of the hall thrown open, and could distinguish his master's voice addressing the person who had thus summoned the castle. But the night was so dark that he might not see the speakers, and the language which they used was either entirely foreign, or so largely interspersed with strange words, that he could not understand a syllable which they said. Scarce five minutes had elapsed, when he who was without again elevated his voice as before, and said in German, "For a year and a day then I forbear my forfeiture; but coming for it when that time shall elapse, I come for my right, and will no longer be withstood."

From that period, Dannischemend, the Persian, was a constant guest at the castle of Arnheim, and, indeed, never, for any purpose, crossed the drawbridge. His amusements or studies seemed centred in the library of the castle and the laboratory, where the baron sometimes toiled in conjunction with him for many hours together. The inhabitants of the castle could find no fault in the Magus, or Persian, except his apparently dispensing with the ordinances of religion, since he neither went to mass nor confession, nor attended upon other religious ceremonies. The chaplain did, indeed, profess himself satisfied with the state of the stranger's conscience; but it had long been suspected, that the worthy ecclesiastick held his easy office on the very reasonable condition of approving the principles, and asserting the orthodoxy, of all guests whom the baron invited to share his hospitality.

MISCELLANY.

EGYPTIAN CAVERNS.

It was early in March, 1812, that [Mr. Legh, a celebrated English traveller and his companions entered Egypt, and continued his voyage down the river Nile. A Greek, named Demetrio, had reported to them the existence, near Manfalout, of certain pits or caverns, containing the mummies of crocodiles, of which they had hitherto seen no specimens in Egypt. Desiring to examine these, they quitted the banks of the river, and at the village of Amabdi engaged four Arabs to be their guides to the caverns, which they found at a short distance, but within the confines of the desert. A circular pit, about 18 feet in depth, brought them down to the level of the excavations; three of the Arabs descended with them, and with lighted torches they made their way through various winding passages, without finding more than a few fragments of crocodile mummies. The following part of the narrative we may best give in Mr. Legh's own words.

Our curiosity was still unsatisfied: We had been wandering for more than an hour in low subterranean passages, and felt considerable fatigued by the irksomeness of the posture in which we had been obliged to move, and the heat of our torches in those narrow and low galleries. But the Arabs spoke so confidently of succeeding, in this second trial, that we were induced once more to attend them. We found the opening of the chamber which we now approached, guarded by a trench of unknown depth, and wide enough to require a good leap. The first Arab jumped the ditch, and we all followed him. The passage we entered was extremely small, and so low in some places as to oblige us to crawl flat on the ground, and almost always on our hands and knees. The intricacies of its windings resembled a labyrinth; and it terminated at length in a chamber much smaller than that we had left; but, like it, contained nothing to satisfy our curiosity. Our search hitherto had been fruitless: but the mummies might not be far distant; another effort, and we might still be successful."

The Arab whom I followed, and who led the way, now entered another gallery, and we all continued to move in the same manner as before, each preceded by a guide. We had not gone far before the heat became excessive;—for my own part, I found my breathing extremely difficult; my head began to ache most violently, and I had a most distressing sensation of fulness about the breast. We felt we had gone too far, and yet were almost deprived of the power of returning. At this moment the torch of the first Arab went out. I was close to him, and saw him fall on his side: he uttered a groan,—his legs were strongly convulsed, and I heard a rattling noise in his throat—he was dead. The Arab behind me, seeing the torch of his companion extinguished, and conceiving he had stumbled, passed me, advanced to his assistance, and stooped. I observed him appear faint, totter, and fall in a moment—he also was dead. The third Arab came forward, and made an effort to approach the bodies, but stopped short. We looked at each other in silent horror. The danger increased every instant: our torches burnt faintly; our breathing became more difficult; our knees tottered under us, and we felt our strength nearly gone.

There was no time to be lost. The American, Barthow, cried to us to take courage, and we began to move back as fast as we could. We heard the remaining Arab shouting after us, calling us Caffrees, imploring our assistance, and upbraiding us with deserting him. But we were obliged to leave him to his fate, expecting every moment to share it with him. The windings of the passages through which we had come, increased the difficulty of our escape, we might take a wrong turn, and never reach the great chamber we had first entered. Even supposing we took the shortest road, it was but too probable our strength would fail us before we arrived. We had each of us separately and unknown to one another, observed attentively the different shapes of the stones which projected into the galleries we had passed, so that each had an imperfect clue to the labyrinth we had now to retrace. We compared notes, and only on one occasion had a dispute, the American differing from my friend and myself:—in this dilemma, we were determined by the majority, and fortunately were right. Exhausted with fatigue and terror, we reached the edge of the deep trench, which remained to be crossed before we got into the great chamber. Mustering all my strength, I leaped, and was followed by the American. Smelt stood on the brink, ready to drop with fatigue. He called to me—"for God's sake to help him over the fosse, or at least to stop, if only for five minutes, to allow him to recover his strength." It was impossible—to stay was death, and we could not resist the desire to push on, and reach the open air. We encouraged him to summon all his force, and he cleared the trench. When we reached the open air, it was one o'clock, and the heat in the sun about 180 degrees. Our sailors, who were waiting for us, had luckily a bardak full of water, which they sprinkled upon us; but though a little refreshed, it was not possible to climb the sides of the pit: they unfolded their turbans, and slinging them round our bodies, drew us up to the top.

Our appearance alone, without our guides, naturally astonished the Arab, who had remained at the entrance of the cavern; and he anxiously inquired for his friends. To have confessed they were dead, would have excited suspicion: he would have supposed we had murdered them, and have alarmed the inhabitants of Amabdi, to pursue us, and revenge the death of their friends. We replied, therefore, they were coming, and were employed in bringing out the mummies we had found, which was the cause of their delay. We lost no time in mounting our asses, recrossed the desert, and past hastily by the village, to regain the ferry at Manfalout.

FRIENDSHIP.

The Goddess has a multitude of worshippers; but many of them pay her only a blind devotion. They form a confused idea of something lovely and desirable, but have no just conceptions of her true character. They imagine her favour may be purchased with the same coin that buys other pleasures, and frequently reckon themselves among her favourites, while utter strangers to her.

The Goddess once appointed a day for all her adorers to appear before her, and present their offerings. The summons was received with universal delight. The appointed day arrived, and a vast multitude assembled—each prepared with a gift. The Goddess appeared, seated on a throne made of a silver cloud, and studded with the gems and brilliants of heaven. Her figure and countenance were most beautiful—celestial beauty, such as earthly language will not describe. There was in her manner a sweet dignity, but nothing to awe or intimidate. She looked round on the admiring throng with a benevolent, discriminating glance, that seemed to say, "I would bestow my choicest favours on you all, if you knew how to appreciate them."

At length, the signal was given for them to bring forward their offerings. Every heart beat quickly, and every one turned, involuntarily, to see if his gift were worth presenting.

The first approached, and kneeling, spread all his treasures of wealth upon her altar; then raised his eyes to determine by her countenance whether the offering was accepted.

The Goddess frowned! "Can gold," she exclaimed, "gain friendship? impotence of hope!" "Remove the trash!" It was done. In its stead, he arranged his titles and honours all in due order before her; again she frowned! He hastily put them aside, and in their place laid the record of his fame. It would not do—with a look of displeasure she bade him take it away. He obeyed;—then throwing himself at her feet, he thus addressed her: "Great Goddess. I have offered thee all that mortals value; I have nothing left—but my heart;"—he paused—her look of displeasure was gone. "I freely surrender it," he exclaimed. She smiled, and accepted the offering.

Then rising from her throne, she addressed the vast assembly: "Children of men, know, that in the eye of friendship, gold is dross, honour a bubble, fame empty air; at her shrine the heart alone is accepted."

The crowd dispersed, though not without murmuring; for many had no hearts, and those who had, were so corrupted by vice, as made them sensible they were not worth offering. The hearts that were heaped on the altar of Mammon, could not be recalled; nor those which lay scattered at the shrine of pleasure. A smiling few approached, and presented the sacrifice of unsullied affections. As she received them, her countenance lighted up with such a resplendent beauty, that its radiance was reflected on the faces of her favourites—and they wear it to this day.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1829.

The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

If G. would be a little less "like —," and pay less attention to the "flowers by the wayside," we think he would be a better writer. We decline publishing "An Excursion," but advise the author to try again—he is capable of better things. Let him bear in mind, however, that common place sentiments are not the most interesting things in the world.

The news from England, for some time past, has been unimportant, and we have therefore neglected to give a summary of it. Papers have been received to the 9th of June. They state that there were rumours of a change in the ministry, in favour of the whigs. On the 4th June, Mr O'Connell delivered an animated speech to a meeting in Dublin. He insists upon the necessity of a parliament, resident in that city, and says, that to the parliament being resident in London are owing "all the impoverishment and degradation which is justly attributed to absenteeism."

The accounts from the east are worthy of very little belief. Some statements are favourable to the Russians, and others favourable to the Turks. Instead of gaining a victory, it is said that, in an affair before Silistria, the Russians suffered a severe loss.

CARSTAIRIAN SYSTEM OF WRITING. We would direct the attention of such of our readers as desire to attain an elegant and expeditious hand writing, to the establishment of Mr. FOSTER, in the Athenaeum Building. The system of Mr. CARSTAIRS, taught by him, differs essentially from the one universally pursued in our common schools, and by "professors" of penmanship; and its superiority is manifested to the satisfaction of every inquirer, both by its apparent practicability, and in the rapid progress and final perfection of pupils. The soundness of the theory upon which it is based has been tested by more than twenty years' experience in England and France, and so generally are its rules and the course of exercises it prescribes adopted, under one name or another, in both those countries, that it seems to be regarded as the only method by which a perfect command of the pen can be acquired. To enter into the detail of its merits would require more time and room than we can at present devote to the subject; but having examined the plan with considerable attention, and being well convinced of its superiority over every other system, we think it our duty to award it our approbation. The Trustees of the Albany Female Academy deserve much praise for opening the way to its introduction into our public seminaries; and we think that parents and guardians generally, would consult the interests of the rising generation, by devoting more attention to this important improvement upon the usual method of instruction.

THE FESTIVAL OF SAINT JOHN THE BAPTIST. In Somerstooth, (Great Falls) Maine, several hundred of the brethren assembled at the congregational meeting house, and formed a procession, consisting of Master masons, Royal Arch masons and Knights Templars, in the regalia and costume of their several orders, preceded by a fine band of martial musick. The procession proceeded to the Great Factory, where (says the Dover Gazette) "an eloquent and appropriate masonic address was delivered, in the presence of about twenty-five hundred persons, by the Hon. John Holmes, of Alfred, Maine, which for its frankness and ability, must have carried conviction home to every breast of the purity of freemasonry." The throne of grace was addressed by the Rev. Mr. Hawes and Rev. Mr. Brickell. After the ceremonies had closed, an elegant entertainment was served up by Mr. Sheldon, on the high land overlooking the village, for the fraternity and invited guests, at which John Williams, esq. presided as president of the day. In Thomastown, Maine, the day was celebrated by Jerusalem Chapter, and Orient, Amity, St. George, Union and Aurora Lodges. The brethren assembled at Masons' Hall, and proceeded to the new meeting house, where religious exercises were performed by the Rev. Mr. Washburn, of Thomastown, and Rev. Br. Campbell, agent of the National Colonization society, and an excellent address delivered by Br. Charles Cleland, esq.

In Oxford, Massachusetts, Oxford Lodge, assisted by a large number of brethren from Sutton, Dudley, Southbridge, Charlton, Leicester, and other towns in the vicinity, celebrated the day in a very appropriate manner. Colonel Alexander De Witt and captain William Sigourney were marshals of the day. In the meeting house, the exercises were a prayer by the Rev. Mr. Maynard, a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Turner, and an address by Linus Child, esq. After the religious exercises at the meeting house, the brethren repaired in procession to a bower prepared for their reception, where about two hundred sat down to an excellent dinner, served up by Mr. Town. The following were among the sentiments drank on the occasion:

Freemasonry. Most revered by those best acquainted with the principles it inculcates.

Washington. The illustrious patron of masonry. Hear his language—"the great object of masonry is to promote the happiness of the human race. I shall always be happy to advance the interests of the society and to be considered by them as a deserving brother."

The Memory of Warren. The first Grand Master of the first Grand Lodge in America, a name consecrated by patriotism and philanthropy.

Religion and Freemasonry. The one teaches us how to live,—the other how to live and die.

The Delaware Gazette contains the account of a celebration at a village in that state, on the 11th instant, in honour of the 4th. Twenty-seven toasts were given, each of which was immortalized (we believe without the help of any of the rum or brandy family) by "three cheers and a gun." The gentlemen were confirmed Jacksonites and great admirers of the ladies. Ecce signum:

By Howard Ogle. The Jackson Republicans are strenuously and no less justly urging the necessity of thorough reformation in the constitution and policy of our state—may they first effect a reformation in the legislature, by electing thereto men who will not disgrace it by being not only incompetent to draft a bill themselves, but often incapable of understanding one when drafted for them.

Three cheers and a gun.

Her noblest work she claims, O,
Her 'prentice han' she tried on men,

The following is very good, but rather old—being a piece of thievery:

Three cheers and a gun.

Mrs. ROYALL. The Grand Jury of the District of Columbia, a week or two since, very ungallantly found an indictment against Mrs. Royall, setting forth that she was a "common slanderer, a common scold, and a common nuisance." She plead not guilty to the second charge, but demurred at the first and third, and the demurer was sustained by the court, on the ground that the charges were not sufficiently specific. The trial of the lady for being a "common scold," came on a few days since. The National Intelligencer says "the examination and cross examination of the numerous witnesses occupied nearly five hours. Being at length finished, Mrs Royall rose and made a pathetic appeal to the jury, urging them to defend her against oppression; to prove themselves the protectors of personal rights and liberty; warning them against sanctioning a system of clerical domination and persecution, which, if not checked by the freedom of speech and of the press, and these defended by independent juries, would produce a state of things which would endanger the judge on the bench and even the president himself; declaring that this system and this prosecution were part of a general scheme, of which the attempt to stop the mails on the Sabbath was another feature, &c. &c." The jury, after a few minutes' consultation, rendered a verdict of guilty, and the defendant gave security to appear and answer the judgment. It is said that she has moved an arrest of judgment—the evidence clearly proving that she is an "uncommon scold."

ADVANTAGES OF DRUNKENNESS. A curious case was recently tried in the city of New-York, under a commission of lunacy, (we believe it is called) granted by the chancellor. The individual was accused of incapacity in consequence of drunkenness. Several witnesses were adduced on both sides, and it was proved by all that the defendant was continually intoxicated. The question then was, whether his habit of drinking rendered him non compos mentis. Those for the prosecution contended that it did; those for the defence testified that "they knew the party well; that it was true he was generally drunk, but that this did not prevent his attending to his concerns. On the contrary, he was never so well calculated for business as when drunk, and it was well known that he made better bargains and conducted himself more sensibly when in that situation, than when sober. After the case had been fully discussed, the jury found that the fact of his being continually drunk, was no proof of his insanity, and that he was not incompetent to manage his affairs."

WONDERFUL! An Ulster county anti-masonick editor, whose brain has been in a state of fermentation during a week or two past, in speaking of a little squad of his friends at Saugerties, or some other mighty place, says, "they are embarked for life," and "their path is plain and straight before them, and the world at the ballot boxes, or in arms, cannot turn them from it!" Whew! They belong to the Topham race, probably. If this sapient editor could manage to cage them, we are sure they would be considered great curiosities.

GENERAL OGLE, JR. The anti-masonick papers, have lately endeavoured to make some noise about a renunciation of masonry, said to have been made by a General Alexander Ogle, jr. of Pennsylvania. We do not believe that it would turn the world topsy-turvy, if the General should become a thorough-going anti; but whether it would or not, the following paragraph shows that he is not disposed to become one, how agreeable soever such an event might be to the "proprietors" of anti-masonry. When the General enters the field he will probably fight "upon his own hook," and live "alone in his glory."

From the Somerset (Pa.) Whig, June 1.

If the editor of the Anti-Masonick Herald thinks to count General Ogle, jr. one of his proselytes, he labours under a great mistake. The General is not a Morgan mason; he is one of the true grit. He is much obliged to him for the encomiums passed upon him relative to his official station, and his standing in society, and the respect people entertain toward him, but hereafter he would advise him not to publish any statement but what comes under his own hand.

ALEXANDER OGLE, JR.

THEATRE. The excellent drama of Ambrose Guinnett, or a Sea Side Story, will be repeated this evening. The play is an interesting one, and in connection with the farce of Wool Gathering, should attract a full house.

POLITICAL HUMBUGS. The anti-masons have a peculiar faculty of suiting their testimony to the times. They said and swore, at first, that Morgan had his "throat cut from ear to ear, his tongue torn out, his bowels burnt before his eyes," and the remnant of his corpus sunk with heavy weights, "five fathoms deep," at the junction of the lake and river. When poor Timothy Monroe floated ashore, without a single mark of violence upon him, the anti changed their tune—and, after the hair and whiskers were taken off, they turned up their eyes, and attributed the discovery of the body to the special intervention of the Almighty—while Weed and others said that, at any rate, "it would make a good enough Morgan till after election." Bot that hoax was detected even before election." Very lately, one of the anti-masonick brotherhood at Niagara started on a new track. The skeleton or bones of a man were found in the sand on the shore near Fort Niagara. Another hue and cry was raised. Morgan was surely found now! The Niagara anti-masonick paper garnished up the story of this skeleton, and asserted in proof that it was actually Morgan, that it had around it the very rope and heavy weights which were used to sink the body, nearly three years before! As though a corpse so sunk, could not only, after the flesh was rotted from its bones, retain its hold on the rope and weights used to sink it, but, in defiance of weights, rope, and common sense, rise from its watery bed, swim ashore, and actually bury its marrowless bones in the sand! The skeleton was that of an Irishman drowned in crossing the Niagara the previous year—and the rope (for there were no weights found,) had then been employed to drag the putrid carcase to the temporary grave on the shore, where this skeleton was found.

Such is a brief sketch of some of the humbugs with which unprincipled men have tampered with public credulity for two or three years past. The days of Salem witchcraft—those times of infatuation, when even our Puritan fathers were so "excited" as to take suspicion for proof, and to believe the wildest monstrosities that accorded with their prejudices:—those times, we repeat, are not without a parallel now. But the people, honest, though occasionally misled, cannot be long deceived; and will not fail of visiting on the guilty authors of such frauds, a just and severe retribution. [Rochester Republican.]

ELDER BRADLEY. We see by the last Telegraph, that this minister of the gospel has come out and renounced masonry. We remember him well. He is the man who wrote a book, some few years ago, in favour of the institution, praising it to the very skies. The last we saw of him, he was travelling from lodge to lodge, to persuade the masons to erect a seminary of learning, to educate their children, exclusively. The masons, seeing that such a course would be inconsistent with their principles of general philanthropy, refused. Had they adopted his selfish plan, they would have been justly obnoxious to the charge which is now falsely made against them, of trying to build up their own interests in opposition to the rest of the community. But the Elder, having failed to pervert the institution to his own sinister purposes, and having sold all his books, has now renounced: and we suppose we shall have a book on anti-masonry. His "is a pen of all work." [Norwich Jour.]

AWFUL. It is gravely affirmed in an article in Solomon's last wonderful magazine, that about three hundred anti-masonic postmasters have been removed, and masons appointed in their stead, since president Jackson's election—and that every appointment made by the president and postmaster general, excepting Mr. Van Buren's, "probably to the amount of one hundred, has been masonic!" Whew!—That's right, Solomon. When a man undertakes to lie at all, he may as well do it by wholesale. These thorough-going thumpers do vastly more execution than one of your petty falsehoods; because, like an overcharged blunderbuss, the fellow who lets it off has the worst of it. Three hundred postmasters—and seven hundred other officers—all masons! Only think of that! What are we coming to! [Boston Bulletin.]

THE RHODE ISLAND HORSE STORY. The hiring editors have been some time doling forth Jeremiads over the bones of a Rhode Island horse, whose owner was obtaining subscribers for an anti-masonic paper, when the poor animal, they assert, fell a victim to the dirks of freemasons. We have watched this tale of woe, to see if these "moral effects" people would ever give the facts as they occurred; and we have found them true to their cause. The anti-masonic version of the story is as above; while the facts have proved to be, that an ox, in the same inclosure with the horse, gored the animal to death in the night. One horn of the ox was bloody, and the skin of the horse was torn, not cut, &c. All this was shown at the time, but the owner offered one hundred dollars reward for the detection of the horse murderer, and gave the whole affair to the winds, in the hope of gain. The man, for his folly, suffered disgrace in the eyes of his neighbours at home, but furnished a new falsehood wreath to grace the dull pages of our tardy hirelings in this region. [Buf. Jour.]

THE FRUITS OF ANTI-MASONRY. In an anti-masonic town in this county, not long since, a leading anti-mason sued a mason. The plaintiff called upon the constable after he had served the summons, and told him "he thought he should have a jury, and should he send him the venire, wished he would select anti-masons for the jury." The constable, though an anti-mason, indignantly told him "he would do no such thing; if he sent the venire, he would take the best men he could conveniently get, without any reference to anti-masonry." The result was, the venire was sent to another anti-masonic constable, several miles off, who selected the anti-masonic jury the plaintiff wished. This anti-masonic jury returned a verdict in favour of the anti-masonic plaintiff. From this judgment, as may naturally be supposed, the defendant has appealed. [Morrisville Obs. & Recorder.]

The Boston Free Press says it is printed by steam; and we should think it was also edited by steam, from the continual steam it appears to be in. [Fredonia Censor.]

ITEMS.

Statistics of Intemperance. At the celebration on the 4th, by the Temperance Society, the Rev. Mr. Ridgley, chaplain of the navy yard, stated that, by extensive and careful enquiry, it had been ascertained that one-third of the maniacs, two-thirds of the paupers, and nineteen-twentieths of the culprits of the United States were reduced to their respective conditions by intemperance:—that there are four hundred thousand drunkards in our country; and that the loss and waste of time, shortening of life, and the cost of spirituous liquors, may be fairly estimated at the annual expense of one hundred millions of dollars. Mr. R. mentioned that in many places where the principle of entire abstinence had been adopted, the consumption had been reduced one-half and one-third of the previous demand. Where moderate or temperate drinking has been attempted to be substituted, no good results have followed; and experience proves the true philosophy of temperance to consist in making the use of spirits an ungentle practice. The prudent and cautious dispensation of this doctrine must have a most happy influence on the moral and physical prosperity of our country. [Phila. Nat. Gaz.]

Mr. Owen of New-Harmony, has passed through this city on his way to Europe. We learn, from him, that he has been fully occupied since his debate with Mr. Campbell. He remained two months after the discussion in the city of Cincinnati, preparing a work which he published there, and which contains a narrative of his voyage to and proceedings in Mexico, and a review of the public meeting with Mr. Campbell. It seems that the public discussion between Mr. O. and Mr. C. had not produced any animosity between these gentlemen: for we are informed, Mr. Owen called upon Mr. Campbell at his house, at Bethany. Mr. Owen spent three days with his hospitable opponent and relatives, and he was much pleased with his visit. [Nat. Intel.]

A Curiosity. A fountain of carburetted hydrogen gas has been discovered in the bottom of Catskill creek, near the foot of Main-street, in this village. The water has been observed for many years to be unusually troubled, and to emit an extraordinary quantity of air. No experiment was however made, until last Monday a week, when by the direction of Mr. Apollon Cooke, fire was applied to the surface of the water, and the result was an immediate combustion resembling burning alcohol. We have witnessed several experiments since, which are sufficient to satisfy us that with proper apparatus, a quantity of gas might be collected to answer extensively useful purposes in lighting the village. There are said to be many similar fountains in this vicinity; but we know of no other experiments to prove their inflammability. [Catskill Recorder.]

March of Intellect. The Brownsville [Pa.] Galaxy of the 7th inst. contains the following caution:

"Whereas, Fanny Morton, alias Kerr, has without cause, refused cohabitation and is floating on the ocean of tyrannical extravagance, prone to prodigality, taking a wild goose chase, and kindling her pipe with the coal of curiosity, to abscond and abolish such insidious, clandestine, noxious, pernicious, diabolical and notorious deportment, I therefore caution all persons from harbouring or trusting her on my account, as I will pay no debts of her contracting from this date, unless compelled by law. JAMES KERR."

Here's a storm; and if Mrs. Fanny Morton, alias Kerr, does not throw a whole column of Webster's Dictionary after Mr. James Kerr, it must be because she remembers herself of Xantippe's missiles, which are in all similar cases, decidedly preferable to mere verbiage. [U. S. Gaz.]

Great Age. In noticing the celebration of the 4th inst. near Raleigh, (North Carolina) the Register states, that "Mr. Arthur Wall, now in his 109th year, was particularly invited; he excused himself on account of being 'busy with his crop,' but said he would send one of his boys, a lad of 82, with his toast. No toasts, however, were drank, for there were no intoxicating liquors on the ground. Long before the shades of evening, the gratified company, after a day of sober and rational enjoyment, departed for their homes, with improved national and neighbourhood feelings."

In Barre, (Vt.) the 4th of July was celebrated by the ladies, who partook of a public dinner, "ornished," the Montpelier Patriot says, "with the richest dainties nature and art could produce, and in a style never excelled in this country." These patriotic ladies toasted Mr. Adams and Mr. Jackson, in very respectful terms, and wound up with the following spirited sentiment: "Our afternoon beverage of tea—Great Britain knows we can drink or refrain from drinking."

Phrenology persecuted in Italy. A letter from Italy communicates the fact that Dr. Uccelli has been just turned out of the Professor's chair at Pisa, for having written a work upon Comparative Anatomy, two volumes of which are devoted to Gall's system of Phrenology. By a singular regulation he is permitted to enjoy the salary of the professorship, but forbidden to instruct youth.

A Fish Paying Tribute Money. One of the men on board the schooner Blank, Captain Hopkins, which arrived at Truro on Sunday last, drew up a fish while at the banks, having in its maw six half dollars. We do not recollect of hearing of a parallel case since the miracle of finding in the mouth of a fish, a piece of money to pay tribute to Cæsar. [Barnstable Gaz.]

About 6000 sheep have been sheared at Nantucket this season, little more than half the number shorn last year. Thomas Gardner, aged 94, plied the "sounding shears" with a skillful hand.

The Methodist Society in the United States is making wonderful advances in numbers, wealth and intelligence. A Wesleyan University is about to be established at Middletown, Connecticut. The buildings recently occupied by captain Partridge's Military School, which has been discontinued, will be purchased by the society for this purpose.

China. The population of China, according to the last census, (1790) is 143,124,734.

Admiral Coffin lately established a school at Nantucket, for the children there who are the descendants of his ancestor Tristram. The building was calculated for 600—but 800 young Coffins presented themselves.

The coinage of half dimes (five cent pieces) has been commenced by the mint. Such a coin has long been wanted, and a very great convenience will result from a free circulation of them.

We have wondered among all the notices lately taken of the many anti societies in existence, that one has not been mentioned, which is very large and of pernicious effect, in this country and we fear elsewhere, called the anti-pay-the-printer society. It is composed of a large class of the inhabitants of all parts of the country. [Pough. Tel.]

An anti-masonic celebration was had at Hartford, in this county on the 4th inst., at which Elder Colver officiated as chaplain, governor Crary, as reader (and copious remarker) of two declarations of independence, and esquire Rogers, as orator. It is reported that several men, women and children were present on the occasion. [Sandy Hill Herald.]

At an anti-masonic celebration at Hartford, Washington county, the "Honourable" Solomon Southwick was toasted. Where did he derive his honour? He never exhibited any. [Saratoga Sen.]

ROLAND ADAMS,

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

There are, who say that love is ever brief;
That beauty, too, is fading as the flower;
Of all their witching pleasures, that the chief
Are but the fleeting visions of an hour.
It may be so—but has ought else the power,
Beneath the sun, of pleasing without end?
No—all is transient—then when tempests lower
Around life's path, as on our way we tend,
Who would not fain be cheered by woman as a friend.

Life's pathway does not so abound with joys
That offered harmless they should be disdained;
'Tis churlishness, not wisdom, calls them toys,
Fit but for those whom folly has enchained;—
Let pleasure's harmless goblet then be drained
With cheerful heart, not bound in vice's thrall.
This useful rule the wise have e'er maintained,
And practised too—to pluck and feast on all
The pleasant fruits of life, before they fail or fall. Q.

THE PILGRIM MAIDEN TO HER LOVER.

BY MRS. MALE.

Farewell, my love!—beneath the sky
We ne'er shall meet again,
For when these lines salute thine eye
Afar upon the main
Will Mary be—yet blame me not,
Nor deem my heart untrue;
My country—that may be forgot;
Yet shall I think on you.

Farewell, my love—thy soul I know
Was fondly knit to mine,
And thou wilt grieve that I should go—
Yet might I e'er be thine?
Thou wilt not worship where I kneel,
My God thou dost despise;
And could I look to heaven, yet feel
Reproved by these dear eyes?

Farewell, my love—thy gorgeous hall
May centre earthly bliss;
And thou hast fame, and gold, and all
The world calls happiness—
These baubles have enthralled thy mind,
And thus thy bane will be—
There comes an hour when thou wilt find
They cannot comfort thee.

Farewell, farewell!—my course is bound
Across the roaring billow;
And I may rest on desert ground,
A wreath of snow my pillow—
There deep, dark forests stretch afar,
By savage footsteps trod;
Yet there the beams of Bethlehem's Star
Shall guide us to our God.

And there, in that lone world, we'll rear
To Him a shrine so pure,
Though guilty nations shake with fear
Our temple shall endure;
And faith can see Jehovah bless
Our refuge with his grace,
And freedom make the wilderness
Her chosen resting place.

Farewell!—thy favourite rose I bear
To that far distant land;
And fondly shall I tend it there,
And watch its buds expand;
The first sweet flower—I'll name it thine—
And e'er the soft leaves wither
I'll lay them on this heart of mine,
That they may fade together.

Farewell, a last, a long farewell,
Since thus our fate must be—
Thou wilt not follow where I dwell,
Nor I return to thee;
The favour of the world thou hast,—
But mine is heavenly peace—
And that like meteor's glare is past,
While this will never cease.

Farewell: the grove where oft we met,
Thou must now seek alone;
There, should one tear of fond regret
Gush forth that I am gone—

O, hallow then to me that tear,
And be one, one prayer given,
That though our paths are severed here,
They may unite in heaven.

From the same.

OLD AND NEW TIMES.

When my good mother was a girl—
Say thirty years ago,
Young ladies then knew how to knit,
As well as how to sew.

Young ladies then could spin and weave,
Could bake, and brew, and sweep;
Could sing and play, could dance and paint,
And could a secret keep.

Young ladies then were beautiful
As any beauties now,—
Yet they could rake the new mown hay,
Or milk the "brindled sow."

Young ladies then wore bonnets too,
And with them their own hair;
They made them from their own good straw,
And pretty, too, they were.

Young ladies then wore gowns with sleeves
Which would just hold their arms;
And did not have as many yards
As acres in their farms.

Young ladies then oft fell in love,
And married too, the men;
While men, with willing hearts and true,
Loved them all back again.

Young ladies now can knit and sew,
Or read a pretty book,—
Can sing, and paint, and joke, and quizz,
But cannot bear to cook.

Young ladies now can blithely spin
Of "street yarn" many a spool;
And weave a web of scandal too
And dye it in the wool.

Young ladies now can bake their hair,
Can brew their own cologne;
In borrowed plumage often shine,
While they neglect their own.

And as to secrets, who would think
Fidelity—a pearl?
None but a modest little miss,
Perchance a country girl.

Young ladies now wear lovely curls,
—What pity they should buy them;
And then their bonnets—heavens! they fright
The beau that ventures nigh them.

Then as to gowns, I've heard it said
They'll hold a dozen men;
And if you once get in their sleeves
You'll ne'er get out again.

E'en love is changed from what it was,—
Although true love is known:
'Tis wealth adds lustre to the cheek,
And melts the heart of stone.

Thus Time works wonders;—young and old
Confess his magic power.
Beauty will fade; but Virtue proves
As gold in man's last hour!

A VOICE IS HEARD.

BY J. G. PERCIVAL.

A voice is heard in the winds and waves
In the sound of the ever rolling sea;
It whispered amid the gloom of graves;
It speaks from the hill top loud and free:
It is murmuring in every breath of air;
And it pauses not when the leaves are still;
Where the waters are falling it rattles there,
And it ripples along the heathery hill.

Upon the brown and briery steep,
Where the prambling stirs with the nestling bird—
Down in the green and glassy deep,
When the coral rustles that voice is heard:
Far it is borne on the summer breeze,
O'er sunny billow and flowery plain—
Then it steals to the glancing trees,
And is lost in their shadowy gloom again.

Hark! its wandering echoes wake—
They are now in the heart of the rifted rock;
Now they lie on the slumbering lake;
Now are at play with the bounding flock:

Not a withering leaf by the wind is stirred,
Not a murmur moves through the bending corn.
But far that summoning voice is heard,
Like the loud clear note of the winding horn.

O! 'tis a voice that comes from heaven,
Borne like a spirit, in light along—
Now like the rush of a tempest driven—
Murmuring now in the charm of song:
Hear ye the voice?—then come away,
Far from the haunts of ruder men—
Come where the leaves and fountains play—
You may love and be happy then.

WOMAN.

Ab, woman! in this world of ours,
What gift can be compared to thee?
How slow would drag life's weary hours,
Though man's proud brow were decked with flowers:
And his the wealth of land and sea,
If still ordained to breathe alone,
And ne'er call woman's heart his own.

My Mother!—at that holy name,
Within my bosom there's a gush
Of feeling, which no time can tame,
A feeling, which for years of fame,
I would not—could not hush.

And sisters, they are dear as life,
But when I look upon my wife
My life blood gives a sudden rush,
And all my fond affections blend
In Mother, Sisters, Wife and Friend.

Yes!—woman's love is free from guile,
And pure, as bright Aurora's ray
The heart will melt before its smile
And earthly passions fade away.
Were I the monarch of the earth,
Or master of the swelling sea,
I would not estimate their worth,
Dear woman—half the price of thee!

SONG OF ARCHIE ROVER.

The knight may rein his braw braw steed,
May don his mailed glove,
In marshalled list, on tented plain,
To win his lady love;—
But what 's the brave knight's belted train,
The landsman's gear to me?
My war steed is mine own good ship,
My battle-plain, the sea!

To horse! the merry bugle-call
May bid the bold dragoon,
And hackbut men at tuck of drum
Unslung their musketoon;
But nought for tuck of drum reck I,
Ner trooper's trumpet bray,
My call 's the boatswain's whistle shrill,
My drum, the war hurra!

By brake and scour, all rent and torn
The landsman's corse must lie;
Foul pathway for the hoof of horse,
And red artillery;
But the rider's tramp shall wound not me,
Nor the roll of the rattling gun;
For a thousand, I ween, in the deep sea wave
May sleep as sound as one.

MASONICK RECORD.

THE REV. JOSHUA BRADLEY IN 1827.

Extracts from a Discourse delivered in St. Louis, on the 24th of June, 1827, in the Presbyterian Church, by the Rev. JOSHUA BRADLEY, A. M., Kt. R. C., K. M., K. T., and Principal of Rock Spring Seminary, Illinois.

The great imperfections of our natures; errors that abound in every community; the selfishness of every individual, and the many deprivations that some have to suffer, in carrying their plans of learning, of experiments, of visitations, and labours, towards perfection, all combine to urge the necessity of privy councils, of solemn obligations, and mutual benefactions to those members, should failures happen, or sickness deprive one from actively providing for his necessities—or death close the scene of his useful operations, and his family be left in poverty. Multitudinous are the societies of this description.

The masonick is not the least among the thousands that flourish, in these days of illumination. This society has been more cautious, more vigilant, and moral, than any other, in forming its constitution so perfectly that not one particle can be found to incline any of its members to trample upon the laws of their country, or to interrupt any religious denomination in the free and full enjoyment of their sentiments, and the administration of their ceremonies. Though our particular labours in admitting members, and explaining all parts of our system; are done in retired apartments, from the noise of the world, and the gaze of the ignorant; yet all our laws are published, and no one is desired to become a member till he has read them, and is fully satisfied that they are founded in righteousness and worthy of his obedience. Should any one wish to be dismissed from our connexion, it is granted, unless he has blemished his character. Admonitions, suspensions, and expulsions, are all the punishments that masons can inflict upon their unworthy and crime committing members.

The whole charge given to a candidate, on the commencement of his connexion with us, embraces the outline of his deportment among his kindred, and mankind, wherever he may sojourn, settle, or transact the concerns of life. There is not a single article in our constitution, nor a sentence in any of our charges, that can lead any one to infer that our secret assemblies and labours are designed or in the least calculated to injure the morals, tarnish the virgin purity of republicanism, or condemn the all important doctrines of christianity.

The sons of morals, science and religion, of different nations and opinions, meet, as masons, in one hall, treat each other as brothers, and move forward in the participation of our rights.

It is good and pleasant for masonick brethren to dwell together in unity. 1st. For they have experienced similar trials, and engaged to perform similar duties. Every mason is, or ought to be, a moral, social, and benevolent man. None should be recommended to unite with us, who are deficient in these characteristics; for every particle of our institution is laid for the expansion of charity—the embellishment of our minds, and the government of our passions, that we may be qualified to fill every station in life to which it may be called.

Every emblem of our order invites to union, and every explanation, consistently given, concerning them, tends to soften the heart, and prepare us to sympathize with the sons and daughters of affliction.

In the suitable administration of our rites, we are taught the frailty of our existence—the certainty of our dissolution, and the appearance of our souls in the august presence of Jehovah, there to receive his approbation, and dwell in the everlasting splendours of his kingdom; or to feel his frowns, and hear his voice announce, “depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.” Our system abounds with the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead—of rewards and punishments. Every rite, and every degree in masonry, acknowledged by the learned of our order, are full of meaning. As we advance in the knowledge of these experimentally, we are conscious of our ignorance, and are constrained to acknowledge our littleness and vanity. The brave and dauntless general, that has laid cities in ashes, and an empire withering before his countenance, when brought into a lodge, bows before the altar, listens to the voice of instruction, and is voluntarily obedient. The haughty monarch, around whose throne, and before whose chariot, millions prostrate and kiss the dust, when made a mason, takes his seat among the least of the fraternity, and considers himself honoured, when he is permitted, in the lodge-room, to take lessons from the lips of those who wear no titles in his kingdom, except those that masons confer upon the worthy.

At the threshold of our temple, political distinctions and ecclesiastical dignities are laid aside, and men meet on the level.

Though our gates are open to all who acknowledge the existence of one eternal, all wise, omnipresent God, and who with this confession, and after critical examination, are found to sustain characters of morality, and possess amiable dispositions, and necessary qualifications to render themselves useful among us and mankind: yet masonry cannot admit any within her walls to contend about the peculiarities that divide them on the wide field of the world. This is the only system in which different denominations agree to meet, instruct each other, and labour for the happiness of themselves, families, and mankind. And doubtless this order is designed by the Great Architect of all things to flourish in every clime, till all political and religious partisans shall rise into light, liberty, and indescribable union, and the whole world move in the beauty and cloudless effulgence of the latter day glory.

Union, among us, will be good and pleasant, if we consider, 2dly. The multitudes who oppose us, and the various positions that individuals have taken to represent our system as injurious to government, and hostile to christianity. “This sect is every where spoken against.” The objections raised against us, in ancient and modern times, have, in the opinion of the speaker, been candidly answered: therefore, he is not disposed, on this occasion, to give even a momentary resurrection to them. We know of no system ever proposed, even by the Deity himself, for the benefit of mankind, that has not been opposed and misrepresented.

Opposition to a system, generally draws its members into a closer union. It has a tendency to make them more watchful, more diligent, more learned, and more extensively known and useful. Our opponents have appeared in different ages and countries, wrapped in prophetick garments, declaring that our system was defective and would shortly crumble to atoms. Their predictions have not yet been fulfilled.

Masonry has progressed in every region of the globe, where freedom, learning and religion have flourished. In America it has taken deep root, sprung up, and spread over every state. We have now in our connection more than 80,000 members. Among so large a number, some may not be worthy of the name they bear: others sustain characters of the highest respectability: many fill offices of trust, and are much esteemed by a free and enlightened people. Their learning, valuable labours, political sagacity, pure morals, evangelical piety, and unabating attachment to our country and government, are of such primary importance to mankind, that ages to come will delight in announcing their deeds, as we do now the virtues of the immortal Washington, and the achievements of all the magnanimous heroes of America.

Wherever the fraternity have been the most ardent, the most active, and benevolent, there jealousy, intrigue, and malevolence have rallied all their forces, taken the heights of prejudice, and commissioned defamation “to stand sleepless” on his tower, and blow his alarming trumpet louder and louder, till all the sons and daughters of deception and evil mindedness should start from their midnight slumbers, and with frantick wildness, run about the world to wake up all their kindred and raise a mighty army under the command of some intemperate, profane, and atheistical desperadoes. These generals, rising from sweeping the streets, or from the obscure recesses of bacchanalian hilarity, “speaking great swelling words” to their adherents, promising to march them into regions of light, where they may behold, on paper, at a very cheap rate, all that Masons have done for ages, and all they now do, and know about mysteries. Furthermore they promise, that we shall be compelled to abandon our professions, or be hurled from every office in our Republican government, and these brave invaders of Masonick dominions shall be robed in honour, and “fare sumptuously every day.” Can the men of this generation enlist in such a cause, and be governed by such pretenders?

Whom shall the people believe! Can they put confidence in these men, who are puffing and swearing about those who have done them no injury? Who are these men that burn day and night with such quenchless zeal for justice, the peace of the community, and our republic! What is their character at home? Who has ever known them to belong, or remain supporters of any moral society, or devout assembly of christians? We venture the assertion, that none will ever appear in opposition to our sentiments and strive to have the order disbanded, who is a mason, and maintains an unblemished character in the fraternity; or is a member of any church of Christ, and lives in the enjoyment of that religion which fills the soul with good will to mankind.

The present whirlwind, raised into a storm by disordered minds and excited to irritability, may beat against our temple, and carry away the rubbish that has been gathered around it, while the wise and foolish have slept together, but can never move the edifice. The thunder of anathema and destruction will soon cease to roar, and all will be calm. The dust raised about masonry by a few worthless creatures, galloping after lucre, who could not obtain it by loitering about cities and villages, will soon be wiped from the eyes of a cheated multitude, and then every man will be seen walking in his own likeness, and he that is without sin among them, may cast the first stone at Masons.

The pure system that descended from Heaven for the salvation of the world, has been misrepresented and set at naught, and its founder crucified. Thousands of deluded mortals have assailed that system, and proclaimed to nations that it was not worthy of their acceptance: that it could be exterminated—its professors dismayed and ruined forever. Have they dried up the streams of mercy, and covered the heavens with blackness? Have they, by puffing, blown away the purifying influences of grace from every repentant heart? Have they shut the gates of infinite glory, and shrouded immensity to atheistical darkness? No, my brethren; the undiminished powers of Immanuel are still abroad in the earth, and millions are seeking salvation. Those vain boasters and despisers of the Gospel, have perished in their puny warfare, and their pigmy disciples begin to lick the dust. A few more revolving years, and not one of these contaminating and staggering sons of dissipation will be seen trembling on the shores of time. Let us adhere to our profession, move onward in peace, and show how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell in unity. This will appear important if we consider, 3dly. The labours and benefactions to which we, as Masons, are called. In our large community, there are some who have borne the burden and heat of the day. They have suffered many losses, and are now bowed down under the weight of years and infirmities. These we must visit. We must contribute freely from our funds for their support. We must soften the hardness of adversity, and show that Masons can love their brethren at all times. We must watch with them when they are sick; and be ardently engaged for their present and future happiness. Nay, more, when we have wiped the cold dews of death from their foreheads, and laid their bodies in the grave overspread with an emblem of a glorious resurrection, their surviving relations demand our respectful attention and liberality. The widow and fatherless must not be driven away to waste their sighs and tears in the vale of obscurity and wretchedness. These hands now spread before you, have borne liberal donations from Lodges to the abodes of dying brethren, mourning widows and orphans. O, what homage of gratitude have I seen, even at the very gates of death, when a Brother's eyes, just sinking in their dying sockets, half glazed, but open, and fixed upon his weeping wife and children, had beheld the fruits of our labours presented for their refreshment, and heard accents of promise from faithful brethren, that his family should not suffer. Turning his eyes upwards he breathed out thanks to God, that there were Masons to survive him. One moment and he leaves the world. He struggles and agonizes all over. He gathers a little strength to raise his hands towards Heaven, and exclaim, "O Lord my God, having peace in believing in Jesus, and my family under the patronage of true and faithful brethren; now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." The curtain of eternity lifts up, and he enters Heaven. These, these, my brothers, are seasons of no ordinary feelings.

Can I, can you, give up labouring in Masonry, to raise funds for these noble, these important distributions? "The poor," said the Saviour, "you have always with you." Can he be my friend—can he love charity—can he wish to aid the widow and the fatherless, who tells me, that I must not be a Mason? That I must not meet with them—I must not bear their gifts to the penniless sojourner—conduct a physician to the sick—and carry light and food into the dark chambers of poverty and lamentation? Can he be a meek disciple of Christ and a promoter of his glorious Gospel, who wishes to demolish all our Lodges, disband the Fraternity, and shut the sanctuary doors against the preaches who are Masons? He may be a revealer of secrets, a publisher of pamphlets, and folios of criminations and hearsays about Masons; he may employ an hundred pedlars and send them about the world with his books; he may, through their instrumen-tality, gather wealth, spread discord among brethren, and throw whole congregations into confusion; but he never can break up one Lodge of well disciplined members—but he can never have the consciousness of doing good, of being a peacemaker, or a zealous advocate of the pure doctrine of man's redemption. I wish to pursue a different course. Let me inherit the friendship of my brethren, die in their fellowship, and be buried by their hands. Is this your desire? I beseech you to examine critically the principles we profess, and adorn them by living virtuously, and putting on daily a robe of righteousness girded with truth.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE EARLY LIFE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

From the conclusion of his Memoir of his Own Times.

JANUARY 6, 1821. At the age of 77, I began to make some memoranda, and state some recollection of dates and facts concerning myself, for my own mere ready reference, and for the information of my family.

The tradition of my father's family was, that their ancestors came to this country from Wales, and from near the mountain of Snowden, the highest in Great Britain. I noted once a case from Wales, in the law reports, where a person of our name was either plaintiff or defendant; and one of the same name was Secretary to the Virginia Company. These are the only instances in which I have met with the name in that country. I have found it in our early records; but the first particular information I have of any ancestors, was of my grandfather, who lived at the place in Chesterfield called Osborne's, and owned the lands afterwards the glebe of the parish. He had three sons: Thomas who died young, Field, who settled on the waters of the Roanoke, and left several descendants, and Peter my father, who settled on the lands I still own, called Shadwell, adjoining my present residence. He was born February 29, 1707—8, and intermarried 1739, with Jane Randolph, of the age of 19, daughter of Ishman Randolph, one of the seven sons of that name and family, settled at Dungeness, in Goochland. They trace their pedigree far back in England and Scotland, to which let every one ascribe the faith and merit he chooses.

My father's education had been quite neglected: but being of a strong mind, sound judgment, and eager after information, he read much and improved himself, inasmuch that he was chosen with Joshua Fry, Professor of Mathematicks in William and Mary College, to continue the boundary line between Virginia and North Carolina, which had been begun by Colonel Bryd, and was afterwards employed with the same Mr. Fry to make the first map of Virginia which had ever been made, that of Captain Smith being merely a conjectural sketch. They possessed excellent materials for so much of the country as is below the Blue Ridge, little being then known beyond that Ridge. He was the third or fourth settler, about the year 1737, of the part of the country in which I live. He died August 17th, 1757, leaving my mother a widow, who lived till 1776, with six daughters and two sons, myself the elder. To my younger brother he left an estate on James River, called Snowden, after the supposed birth-place of the family; to myself, the lands on which I was borne and live. He placed me at the English school at five years of age, and the Latin at nine, where I continued until his death. My teacher, Mr. Douglas, a clergyman from Scotland, with the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages, taught me the French; and on the death of my father, I went to the Rev. Mr. Maury, a correct classical scholar, with whom I continued two years, and then, to wit, in the Spring of 1760 went to William and Mary College, where I continued two years. It was my great and good fortune, and what probably fixed the destinies of my life, that Dr. Wm. Small, of Scotland, was then Professor of Mathematicks, a man profound in most of the useful branches of science, with a happy talent of communication, correct and gentlemanly manners, and an enlarged and liberal mind. He, most happily for me, became soon attached to me, and made me his daily companion when not engaged in school; and from his conversation I got my first views of the expansion of science, and of the system of things in which I am placed. Fortunately, the philosophical chair became vacant soon after my arrival at College, and he was appointed to fill it per interim; and he was the first who ever gave, in that College, regular lectures in Ethicks, Rhetorick, and Belles Letters.

He returned to Europe in 1762, having previously filled up the measure of his goodness to me, by procuring for me, from his most intimate friend, George Wythe, a reception as a student of law under his direction, and introduced me to the acquaintance and familiar table of Gov. Fauquier, the ablest man who had ever filled that office. With him, and at his table, Dr. Small and Mr. Wythe, his amici omnium horarum, and myself formed a partie quarree; and to the habitual conversations on these occasions, I owed much instruction. Mr. Wythe continued to be my faithful and beloved mentor in youth, and my most affectionate friend through life. In 1767, he led me into the practice of the law at the bar of the General Court, at which I continued until the Revolution shut up the Courts of Justice.

THE GATHERER.

From the Boston Mercury.

THE LAST DAY OF GRACE.

—Ye Powers!
That do awful note—Day of Doom.

I awoke in the morning before the usual time. My sleep had little of quiet. I dreamed of duns and Deputy Sheriffs. I was no better off when awake, for my note was to be paid by two o'clock, and my pockets were empty. I put on my clothes. Dressing is bad at any time; but dressing when you have a note to pay before night is horrible. Every thing goes wrong. You fasten the wrong buttons, stick pins into your flesh, and twist your clothes villainously out of shape.

At breakfast nothing was better. The coffee was scalding hot; the toast fell into my lap, buttered side down, (Nankeens on.) No appetite. Felt dyspeptical. Thought of my note—two o'clock and it must be paid.

"I have a whole forenoon at least, before me," said I as I sallied forth intending to make a desperate effort to raise the money by borrowing. "Mr. Q—, my dear friend, I have four hundred dollars to raise this forenoon, all which I must borrow."

But Mr. Q— had no cash. As to money, it was all sunk in the bottom of the sea, he believed. The banks would not discount. Horrible words! I had as lief hear it thunder as "the banks won't discount."

So I went to Mr. X. and Mr. W. and Mr. Z.—Not a dollar. Hard times—People failing, banks won't discount.

"Then nothing remains for me" said I "but to go to Sharp the broker." This was a worthy who assisted needy gentlemen at critical times, out of pure friendship.

The rascal knew I was in search of him as he stood talking with somebody at the corner of Congress street. I shambled about near him, now trying to catch his eye, and now glancing at the dial on the Old State House, the hands of which moved with a fearful rapidity toward the point beyond which there was no salvation of credit. What could he be talking about so long? It was strange he could not see me.

After waiting a long time I succeeded in catching him as he pretended to be moving off. "Mr. Sharp" said I "have you any money to-day?"

"Not a dollar. I overdraw my cash account at the bank yesterday. Never saw such a time for money in my life."

"If the thing be possible" said I, "I should like to get a note cashed."

"Ahem!" said he, "money is money now. I have a sum to raise myself, but if you are in urgent want of this —"

"So much so?" answered I, "that if it were for my own particular use, I could not want it more."

"I think," said he, "that I know a man that can do it for you, a particular acquaintance of mine — (very particular, I dare say, thought I.) I'll step over the way and see him. Call on me in ten minutes."

"Very well" said I, and walked off.

My worthy friend saw me out of sight and then went into his office and sat down. Presently I came in. I knew very well what he was about to say.

"I have been to see the person I spoke of" said he, "but could not find him. Wait a moment and I will try again." I sat down, and Mr. Sharp walked up the street, took a turn round the Old State House and came back.

"Ah I have found him" said he, "but he is so short of money — (I looked at my watch.)

"Cannot he do it all?" asked I.

"Why ye-es, but he demands fourteen per cent. for cashing your note at thirty days."

I looked at my watch again,—it wanted ten minutes of two. I looked at my obliging and conscientious friend — "There is no remedy" thought I "when a man is between the devil and the deep sea." "Here is my note Mr. Sharp."

"You have made so hard a bargain with him" said he "that I ought not to demand any thing for my trouble." ("How generous" thought I.) But as I must provide for my family—"your family must be horse-leeches" thought I, "if they want providing for at this rate") I must say five dollars for my trouble."

There was no remedy again, so five dollars more went. I got to the bank one minute before two. Coming away I saw a great monster of a dog with a poor miserable half starved puppy under his paw, squeezing the breath out of his body.

"There's a broker and his customer" thought I.

SCOTHISH INNS.

BY SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The courtesy of an invitation to partake a traveller's meal, or at least that of being invited to share whatever liquor the guest called for, was expected by certain old landlords in Scotland, even in the youth of the author. In requital, mine host was always furnished with the news of the country, and was probably a little of a humourist to boot. The devolution of the whole actual business and drudgery of the inn upon the poor gude-wife was very common among the Scottish bonifaces. There was in ancient times, in the city of Edinburgh, a gentleman of good family, who condescended, in order to gain a livelihood, to become the nominal keeper of a coffee-house, one of the first places of the kind which had been opened in the Scottish metropolis. As usual, it was entirely managed by the careful and industrious Mrs. B—; while her husband amused himself with field-sports, without troubling his head about the matter. Once upon a time the premises having taken fire, the husband was met walking up the High Street, loaded with his guns and fishing-rods, and replied calmly to some one that inquired after his wife, "that the poor woman was trying to save a parcel of crockery, and some trumpery books;" the last being those which served her to conduct the business of the house. There were many elderly gentlemen in the author's younger days, who still held it part of the amusement of a journey "to parley with mine host," who often resembled in his quaint humour, mine Host of the Garter, in the Merry Wives of Windsor; or Blague of the George, in the Merry Devil of Edmonton. Some times the landlady took her share of entertaining the company. In either case, the omitting to pay them due attention gave displeasure, and perhaps brought down a smart jest, as on the following occasion:—A jolly dame who, not "sixty years since," kept the principal caravansary at Greenlaw, in Berwickshire, had the honour to receive on her part a very worthy clergyman, with three sons of the same profession, each having a cure for souls; be it said in passing, none of the reverend party were reckoned powerful in the pulpit. After dinner was over, the worthy senior, in the pride of his heart, asked Mrs. Buchan whether she ever had had such a party in her house before. "Here sit I," he said, "a placed minister of the kirk of Scotland, and here sit my three sons, each a placed minister of the same kirk. Confess, Luckie Buchan, you never had such a party in your house before." The question was not premised by any invitation to sit down and take a glass of wine or the like, so Mrs. B. answered drily, "Indeed, sir, I cannot just say that ever I had such a party in my house before, except once in the forty-five, when I had a Highland piper here, with his three sons, all Highland pipers; and deil a spring they could play among them."

LEGAL CRUSHING TO DEATH.

At the assizes in Sussex, August, 1735, a man who pretended to be dumb and lame, was indicted for a barbarous murder and robbery. He had been taken up upon suspicion, several spots of blood, and part of the property being found upon him. When he was brought to the bar, he would not speak or plead, though often urged to it, and the sentence to be inflicted on such as stand mute, read to him, in vain. Four or five persons in the court, swore that they had heard him speak, and the boy who was his accomplice, and apprehended, was there to be a witness against him; yet he continued mute; whereupon he was carried back to Horsham jail, to be pressed to death, if he would not plead—when they laid on him 100 weight, then added 100 more, and he still continued obstinate; they then added 100 more, which made 300 lb. weight, yet he would not speak; 50 lb. more was added, when he was nearly dead, having all the agonies of death upon him; then the executioner, who weighed about 16 or 17 stone, laid down upon the board which was over him, and, adding to the weight, killed him in an instant.

EPITAPH.

The Marquis de Bouvrac lately wrote a letter to the superintendent of the burial ground of Pere la Chaise, for permission to put an inscription on the grave of a deceased friend. It was the following:—

Sacred to the Memory
Of FRANCOIS DOMINIQUE LE MOINE.
Gifted by Nature
For the highest places of Society,
No one rose more rapidly.
He was impartial,
For he cared as much and as little
For the Jesuit and the Jacobin,
As for the Jansenist and the Ultra.
He was just,
For he took bribes alike from all men.
He was wise,
For his first and last care was himself.
He was moral,
For he neither loved nor hated either man nor woman.

The superintendent wrote a letter of condolence to the Marquis on the loss of so rare a friend, and the grave-stone was prepared. The Marquis thanked him in return, and begged his pardon for the inadvertence of omitting some lines of the Epitaph—they were—

He should have been a minister of state:
He was not the less fit for the office,
because he was—a Morkey.

A SPLENDID COFFIN.

The Coffin which received the corpse of the late king of Madagascar, Radam, was a large and massive one of silver. It was about eight feet long, three feet and a half deep, and the same in width; it was formed of silver plates, strongly riveted together with nails of the same metal, all made from Spanish dollars; twelve thousand dollars were employed in its construction. Immense quantities of treasures of various kinds were placed in or about the coffin, belonging to his late majesty, consisting chiefly of such things as during his life he most prized. Ten thousand dollars were placed in the silver coffin for him to lie upon; and either inside, but chiefly outside the coffin, were placed or cast all his rich clothing, especially military; there eight suits of very costly British uniforms, hats and feathers, golden helmet, gorgets, epaulets, sashes, gold spurs, very valuable sword, daggers, spears, (two of gold,) beautiful pistols, muskets, fowling pieces, watches, rings, broaches, and trinkets. His whole and fine side board of silver plate, and large and solid gold cup, with many others presented to him by the king of England; large quantities of costly silks, satins, fine cloths, very valuable silk Lambas of Madagascar, &c. The missionaries say, that the expense of the funeral could not have been less than sixty thousand pounds sterling.

EXCELLENT RULES.

The following rules, from the private papers of Doctor West, were, according to his memorandum thrown together, as general waymarks in the journey of life. They were advantageous to him, and, while they exhibited an honourable testimony to his moral worth, may be useful to others.

Never to ridicule sacred things or what others may esteem such, however absurd they appear to me.

Never to resent a supposed injury till I know the views and motives of the author of it. Nor on any occasion to retaliate.

Never to judge a person's character by external appearance.

Always to take the part of an absent person, who is censured in company, so far as truth and propriety will allow.

Never to think the worse of another on account of his differing from me in political or religious opinions.

Never to dispute, if I can fairly avoid it.

Not to dispute with a man more than seventy years old; nor with a woman; nor with an enthusiast.

Not to affect to be witty, or to jest so as to wound the feelings of another.

To say as little as possible of myself and those who are near to me.

To aim at cheerfulness, without levity.

Not to obtrude my advice unasked.

Never to court the favour of the rich, by flattering either their vanity or their vices.

To respect virtue though clothed in rags.

To speak with calmness and deliberation on all occasions; especially in circumstances which tend to irritate.

Frequently to review my conduct and note my failings.

On all occasions to have in prospect the end of life and a future state.

Not to flatter myself that I can act up to these rules, however honestly I may aim at it.

PORK.

"Pork, or swine's flesh in any shape," says Sir Walter Scott, in a note to his new edition of "Waverly," "was, till of late years, much abominated by the Scotch, nor is it yet a favourite food amongst them. King Jamie carried this prejudice to England, and is known to have abhorred pork almost as much as he did tobacco. Ben Jonson has recorded this peculiarity, when a gipsy in a masque, examining the king's hand, says:—

"You should by this line
Love a horse, and a bound, but no part of swine."

James's own proposed banquet for the devil, was a loin of pork and a poll of ling, with a pipe of tobacco for digestion.

A GOOD APOLOGY.

In the Court of Sessions in Scotland, the Judges who do not attend, or give a proper excuse for their absence, are, by law, liable to a fine. This law, however, is never enforced; but it is common, on the first day of the Session, for the absentee to send an excuse to the Lord President. Lord Stonfield having sent such an excuse, on the president mentioning it, the late Lord Justice Clerk Brazfield said, in his broad dialect, "What excuse can a stout fellow like him hae?" "My Lord," said the President, "he has lost his wife." The Justice, who was fitted with a Xantippe, replied "has he?" that is a gude excuse indeed; I wish we had a' the same!"

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

PYRENEAN ADVENTURE.

From "The Chelien Pensioners,"—by the author of "The Subaltern."

At the period when the left column of the British army occupied the pass of Irun, the particular regiment of which I was a member pitched its tents on a sort of platform, or natural terrace, in the side of the Quatracone mountain. The situation of the camp was one of extreme beauty; indeed it was more than beautiful—it fairly deserves to be styled romantick. Sheltered from the rays of the sun by a grove of graceful dwarf-oaks, our back ground was formed by the bald rocks and giant shapes of the mountain, which, tier above tier, and precipice above precipice, rose in barren majesty into the clouds. On either side of our platform was a ravine: that upon the right, abrupt and of considerable depth, was darkened both to its base, and to the brow of the opposite hill, by the foliage of a dense forest; that upon the left, more gradual in its declivity, afforded room for a few corn-fields and other cultivated spots, as it sloped away into the level country. In front again, were the mouth of the pass, the high road, the Bidassoa, Fontarabia, and the ocean, all of them so hemmed in by the heights of Audaye, and San Marcial, as to compose one of the most splendid vistas which it has ever been my good fortune to behold. Whilst the corps was stationed here, and indeed as often as circumstances would allow, it was my custom to wander away from the camp with a gun over my shoulder, and a dog at my heels, for the double purpose of picking up a little provent for the mess, and indulging a spirit of roving and adventure which was then natural to me. It seldom happened that these excursions proved unproductive of at least temporary gratification. If it came to the worst, and no other advantage arose out of them, they at all events enabled me to become acquainted with some of the grandest and most sublime of Nature's works; whilst they afforded many opportunities of beholding the dispositions both of our own and of the enemy's army, such as men of more sedentary habits could not possibly obtain. Nor were these the only consequences which attended upon them. On more than one occasion I have found myself thrown into situations upon which even now I cannot look back without experiencing something of the excitement which affected me at the moment. With the circumstances attending one of these excursions, I propose, on the present occasion, to make you acquainted, warning you at the same time, that I possess no powers of description competent to convey any thing like a vivid picture either of my own feelings, or of the events which called them into play. One fine day, towards the end of September, in the year 1813, my faithful Juno and her master set out, in high health and spirits, to pursue their wonted occupation. It happened that an extraordinary pressure both of publick and private business had so far occupied my attention throughout the previous week, that I had not been able, during the whole of that period, to wander once beyond the bounds of the encampment; and as my fondness for liberty and field sports was then neither blunted by time nor stifled by circumstances, the fact that noon had passed ere the breaking up of a court martial set me free to indulge my own inclinations, proved no inducement either to remain at home, or to confine my ramble within narrow and well ascertained limits. On the contrary, having a great deal of lost time to make good, I considered that by seeking out fresh ground, a better chance would be afforded of success, than if I returned to haunts repeatedly visited before; more especially as these haunts lay at a distance from our position, and were familiarly known to other sportsmen as well as myself. I have said that on the right of the terrace occupied by our tents was a wooded ravine of considerable depth and steepness. At the bottom of that hollow ran a beautiful rivulet, which, after falling from a sort of detached shoulder of the Quatracone, wound onwards through the valley, till it joined the Bidassoa near the ruined bridge. I had often experienced a desire to trace that stream to its source, partly because I felt satisfied that the labour of the journey would be more than compensated by the magnificence of the scenery to which it must lead, and partly because I longed to shoot one or more of the many eagles which, from their nests among the cliffs, looked down upon us, as if in anxious expectation of the moment when the fortune of battle should consign us to their talons.

This morning I resolved at all hazards to gratify that inclination; so, striking off by the rear of the camp, I made at once for the waterfall. I may not so much as attempt a description of the various and magnificent spectacles which the progress of that toilsome, and occasionally hazardous excursion, from time to time spread out before me. As long as my route conducted up the face of the cliff, from a basin on the summit of which the rivulet tumbled, I could, as often as I chose to turn round, look down upon towns and villages, corn-fields and meadows, tents and ships, redoubts and cottages; but from the instant that the ridge was passed, every vestige of human skill and human exertion was shut out. A long, narrow, winding vale lay beneath me; gloomy with forests, apparently trackless, and of the growth of ages; and girdled in by rocks and precipices hurled into every variety of fantastick shape. On either hand, and far off in my front, hill rose above hill, and cone above cone, as if a thousand earthquakes had been at work, or the globe had never, in this corner at least, escaped the state of chaos. But words are wanting to describe such a panorama. If any of the party can imagine the effect which the wildest combinations of mountain scenery are capable of producing, he may, perhaps, arrive at something like a correct notion of the landscape on which I now gazed; if he be incapable of making this mental exertion for himself, I cannot pretend to assist him in it. It is sufficient to observe, that accustomed as I had been from childhood, to highland scenery, this perfectly astonished me, insomuch that I remained for several minutes rivetted to the spot, from which it first burst upon me. Nor was I more struck by the objects which affected my sense of sight, than by a sort of preternatural stillness which prevailed. Either the breezes blew not at all, or the trees and shrubs in the valley were entirely sheltered from them; for not a bough or leaf was in motion. The only sounds, indeed, which reached me, were a sort of indistinct murmur, produced by the waterfall, now many hundred feet below me, and the occasional shrill cry of an eagle, as it sailed overhead, at a height which placed it far beyond the reach of danger from any power except that of the storm. Having indulged for some time the feelings which such a scene was calculated to excite, as well as recovered my breath and rested my limbs, I began to look around for the purpose of ascertaining how I might most easily attain the object of my present ambition, by reaching the top of the mountain. You will understand that I was now seated upon a sort of sugar-loaf hill, connected on both sides with other hills, three or four times more lofty than itself. That upon the right seemed peculiarly rough and uneven; that upon the left, besides that the stream trickled down its surface, was more grassy and accessible; so I resolved to scale it. But I found, on putting my determination into force, that even it was far from being devoid of difficulties. Projections, which, when viewed from a distance, appeared trifling and of easy ascent, proved when attained to, wholly impervious; whilst the grass itself was in many spots so dry and slippery as to render it extremely hazardous to pass along. Nevertheless, I had proceeded too far to return now. I pushed on, winding around the base of such rocks as I found myself unable to scale, and creeping on all fours, when to walk upright became impossible; and I was rewarded, after two hours and a half severe labour, by beholding what I took to be the last of the ridges. It was a large perpendicular cone; but there seemed to be a pass or, as a Highlander would call it, a balloch, on one side of it, and to that I directed my steps. I was approaching rapidly to this object of my wishes, when the cry of an eagle, coming, as it appeared to me, from the opposite side of the brow, attracted my attention. In a whisper I ordered Juno to heel, and putting a ball in one barrel, instead of small shot, I lay down on my belly, and in that position dragged myself towards the summit. I gained it with some difficulty; but you may imagine what my feelings were when, on peeping over the ridge, I beheld in a narrow glen or hollow, the diameter of which could not exceed twenty or thirty yards, the bones and mutilated remains of not fewer than forty or fifty human beings. Upon these some dozen or two of eagles were sitting; not in the act of gorging, for in truth nothing now remained upon which they or other carnivorous animals could feed; but scraping and turning the bones about, and with their beaks tearing as if in mockery, into minute shreds, a few remnants of what had once been military clothing. So little had I anticipated such a spectacle in these wild regions, that surprise, and to a certain extent, horror, completely overcame me. I lay with my finger on the trigger, but abstained from firing, till my dog sprang upon the brow, and the alarmed birds, rising in an instant, escaped. Less annoyed at having thus permitted my prey to elude me, than curious to ascertain how so many bodies could have come into a situation so singular, I looked about for some path or sloping declivity, by which I might descend into this place of the dead; but I looked in vain. The skeletons lay in a hole, which I can compare to nothing more nearly than a disused coalpit of extraordinary dimensions; that is to say, they occupied a spot closed in on three sides by perpendicular rocks. The fourth was, indeed, open; but as far as I could judge by examining it from my present position, it was open only to a precipice. Having indulged in some vague conjectures, therefore, and satisfied myself that I could do nothing more, I turned away, and striking off to the right, soon entered the precincts of a thick wood. Here, my dog beginning to quest, I had the satisfaction to find that I had at last arrived where game promised to be abundant. She led the way down the side of the mountain. I followed, and my attention being wholly engrossed, I went on, sometimes firing with success, at other times missing, till the gradual diminution of light warned me that it was high time to think of returning to the camp.

He gets benighted and bewildered in the passes of the mountains, but at last meets with a guide among a body of guerillas. His guide relates that he and his companions had been the happy inhabitants of a secluded mountain valley; that at the close of a rustic holiday, a body of French soldiers broke in upon them, spoiled their property, burnt their cottages, and butchered their women and children. The Spaniard tells the consummation of the story in the following words:—

"Nothing now remained for us but vengeance. We betook ourselves, eighteen in number, to the neighbouring fastnesses, and choosing Francisco for our leader, we became guerillas. But we went not beyond the precincts of our own valley. No; our cry, day and night, was for vengeance; and to obtain it, we hovered round the ruins of our houses, like beasts of prey. Not a Frenchman strayed from his cantonments who returned alive; and many and many a time have we roused the whole band from their unholy slumbers with our war-shout. Exasperated at this behaviour, the miscreants completed the bloody work which they had begun. Every male, and every aged female, who fell into their hands, perished on the first day; now they butchered and threw out to us our wives and little ones. But there was mercy in this; for how could we again receive those whom the dogs had defiled? You have seen the hollow on the top of that rock. It is called the Fuente; for tradition says that it was once a small lake, and that the ravine, across which we passed, was the channel of the river that flowed from it. I know not whether there be truth in this, but its situation is one of the most remarkable in all these districts. You observed how it is enclosed on three sides; on the fourth there is a fall of many feet; and the rocks stretching out on either hand beyond the fall, render it perfectly inaccessible. At one corner, however, it is separated from the mountain by a chasm of little more than eighteen feet in width: we laid a narrow bridge of plank over the chasm, and made the old lake our fortress. From this point we were in the daily habit of sallying out upon the enemy; and at last we made it the scene of a glorious revenge. At the suggestion of our leader, we determined, if it were possible, to lure the monsters into our den, and to destroy them there. For this purpose, we laboured hard at a huge rock which hung immediately over our bridge, till we had so loosened it as that a push from the arm of a child would roll it down the gulf. That being effected, we proceeded to carry the rest of our scheme into execution, thus. One morning, as usual, we rushed down upon the valley, and having maintained a skirmish rather longer and more animated than usual, the bloodhounds were so enraged as to pursue us up the hill. As soon as we reached the forest, all except Francisco, who was the object of their bitterest hatred, avoided the old channel and escaped into the woods. Francisco, affecting to be wounded, made for the bridge. He crossed, and forty-five of the miscreants, including their commander, followed. This was all that we desired. Instantly the crag fell, and striking the planks exactly in the middle, it dashed them down into the abyss, cutting off all hope of escape from those within the Fuente. In the mean while we had taken our stations on the ridges, and looked down in savage exultation upon our prey. For Francisco we feared nothing, because we knew his intention, and we shouted aloud in order to give him an opportunity of carrying it into effect. We were successful. Whilst the Frenchmen, paralysed with horror, were gazing upwards upon the death which hung over them, Francisco, uttering a loud cry, ran towards the chasm, and with one desperate bound cleared it. Oh, sir, had you seen the expression of the murderers' countenances then; had you beheld their uplifted hands, and heard their screams for mercy, your blood would have boiled within you, as mine boils now. Our captain answered them. "Mercy!" cried he, "ay, such mercy as ye granted. Look down, fiends, upon the village ye have destroyed! behold the bodies of the aged and the feeble whom ye have butchered! listen to the cry of those whom ye have violated! and now take your reward." This was the signal, and we opened our fire upon them. It was in vain that they ran from side to side, seeking for a place of shelter or escape, or reached the brink of the chasm in hopeless despair. Three wretches only tried the leap, and they were dashed to pieces. The rest died, one after another, as our bullets took effect; and we left them where they fell, that their bones might bleach in the rains of heaven, after their flesh should have been devoured by the eagles." The Spaniard here ended his story, and to my astonishment I found that we were already in the camp. I offered him money, but he refused it: indeed he seemed like one beside himself with the recollection of the scenes which he had been describing. Having satisfied me that I was at home, he abruptly turned away, and I could hear the boughs and leaves crash before him, as with the speed of a racehorse he rushed down the glen.

THE TRAVELLER.

EGYPTIAN MUMMY HUNTING.

From Mrs. Lushington's "Journey from Calcutta to Europe."

I accepted the invitation of Signor Piccinini, a Lucchese, in the service of the Swedish Consul at Alexandria, who had resided about nine years at Thebes, to see the opening of a mummy, that I might myself take out the scarabæus, or any such sacred ornament as might be found in the coffin. The signior's dwelling was nothing more than a mud-hut on the hills of Goornoo. I ascended to the only apartment by a few steps; this room contained his couch, his arms, his wine, his few drawings, and all his worldly goods. The window-shutters, steps, and floor, were composed of mummy coffins, painted with hieroglyphical figures, perhaps four thousand years old; and it was curious to observe the profuse expenditure of materials to which I had been accustomed to attach ideas of value, from seeing them only in museums and collections of antiquities. I had accompanied Signor Piccinini with great glee, thinking what a fine thing it would be to tell my friends in England. What my notions of opening a mummy were I cannot define,—something, however, very classical and antique—certainly any thing but what it proved in reality. Half a dozen Arabs were standing around, panting under heat, dust, and fatigue. They had only just brought in their burthen, and were watching with eager look the examination of its contents, (their profits depending upon the value of the prize,) while the candles which they held to assist the search lighted up their anxious countenances. The outside of the case of the mummy was covered with hieroglyphicks, and the inner one consisted of a figure as large as life, with the face and eyes painted like a mask. On lifting up this cover, nothing was seen but a mass of dark yellow cloth, which though it must have consisted of at least fifty folds, yielded like sand to the merciless hand of the operator, and the skeleton appeared to view. It was some time before I could recover from the horror with which the scene impressed me: I saw no more, but this little was sufficient to make me consider the employment as disgusting as that of a resurrection-man, and the manner of performing it not less unfeeling. It may be called the pursuit of science, but to me it appeared nothing more than ridding the dead for the sake of the trifling ornaments with which the corpse is generally buried. This, indeed, was the fact; for the moment it was ascertained that the mummy contained no ornament, the skeleton, together with the papyrus, on which were inscribed numerous distinct hieroglyphicks, and the other materials, was cast forth as worthless rubbish. Sufficient papyrus and relics have been procured for the interest of science; and I think it would redound to the pasha's credit if he were to issue an edict, to clear his country from these mummy-scamvengers. He had, indeed, ordered all the corpses to be reinterred; but, according to evident demonstration, this order was habitually disregarded. Scarabæi are scarce; a few were brought us by the Fellahs, while wandering about the ruins, though none of value. Ancient coins are procurable in abundance, but they were too numerous to prove curious, and they had certainly no beauty to attract us to be purchasers. Signor Piccinini had found on a mummy some bracelets, about an inch wide, of small coloured beads, which were remarkable, from resembling so much the fashion of the present day, yet, from the absence of all device, not nearly so pretty. The beads, which were of coral, cornelian, garnets, amethysts, and vitreous porcelain of a bright blue colour, were strung together, and separated at every inch by a gold wire, or link, to which they were attached, in order to keep the bracelets flat on the arm. The signior thought them very handsome; but they appeared to me of no value, except for their antiquity. During the many years he had resided at Thebes, he had only discovered one mummy likely to indemnify him for the labour of excavation. Passing through this miserable kitchen, the shelves of which were also made of ancient coffins, we entered a tomb, where lay the mummy in question, supposed to be that of a high priest. It was placed in a stone case, the lid of which was removed, and enclosed in three coffins, each having a gilt mask at the upper end. The entire lid of the last coffin was also covered with gilding, in vivid preservation, and the body was wrapped in a garment curiously wrought with gold lace, and apparently of a tough texture. The whole figure seemed as fresh as if it had been prepared a few months before, but the envelopment remained unfolded. Signor Piccinini said he might obtain five hundred dollars for this mummy at Alexandria, but he considered it of such value, that he thought of taking it himself to Tuscany. Whether or not this appreciation was to excite the cupidity of purchasers, I pretend not to determine. The mountains in this neighbourhood, called Goornoo, have for centuries been the cemeteries for the dead; and notwithstanding the havoc which during some years has been made amongst them, their contents appear inexhaustible. It would scarcely be an exaggeration to say, the mountains are merely roofs over the masses of mummies within them. The coffins serve as fire-wood to the whole neighbourhood: I saw nothing else burnt. At first I did not relish the idea of my dinner being dressed with this resurrection-wood, particularly as two or three of the coffin-lids, which, as I said before, were in the shape of human figures,—were usually to be seen standing upright against the tree under which the cook was performing his operations, staring with their large eyes as if in astonishment at the new world upon which they had opened. The coffins were usually made of sycamore wood, which may serve in some degree to account for the almost total extinction of that tree in Upper Egypt, that under which my tent was pitched being the only one in the neighbourhood. This extinction, perhaps, may also be explained by the increasing aridity of the soil. As numerous pits full of mummies have been discovered in the heart of the mountains, without coffins and merely embalmed, it may be inferred that these were the bodies of the poorer classes, who could not afford that expensive mode of interment.

From Widdowson's "Van Dieman's Land"

ABORIGINES OF VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.

So little is known of these children of nature, and still less has been done to gain any knowledge of them, that not much can be offered as to their present numbers or condition. From what I have seen and read, the natives of Van Dieman's Land are unlike any other Indians, either in features, their mode of living, hunting, &c. There are many hundreds of people who have lived for years in the colony, and yet have never seen a native. * * * The features of these people are any thing but pleasing: a large flat nose, with immense nostrils; lips particularly thick; a wide mouth, with a tolerable good set of teeth; the hair long and woolly, which, as if to confer additional beauty, is besmeared with red clay (similar to our red ochre) and grease. Their limbs are badly proportioned; the women appear to be generally better formed than the men. Their only covering is a few kangaroo skins, rudely stitched, and thrown over the shoulders; but more frequently they appear in a state of nudity; indeed, so little knowledge have they of decency or comfort, that they never avail themselves of the purposes for which apparel is given to them. Lieut. Collins, in his account of the natives of New South Wales, describes their marriage ceremonies as being most barbarous and brutal; and I have also heard from individuals who have visited New South Wales, that it is not uncommon to see a poor woman almost beaten to death by her lover, previous to his marrying her. From the shyness of the natives of Van Dieman's Land, and the constant warfare that has been carried on between them and the remote stock-keepers, (which is not likely to render them more familiar,) I have never been able to ascertain whether there is any trace of religion among them, or if they have the slightest idea of a Supreme Being. I believe, and it is generally supposed, they have not. It is but fair to remark, however, that nothing has been done for them; the few that can speak a little English, only curse and swear, and this they catch up very readily from the different convicts they meet with. * * *

There are but few instances of any native having entirely forsaken his tribe, however young he may have been taken away; they appear to dislike any thing in the shape of labour, although, if they take to cattle, they are, beyond any thing, quick in tracing and finding those lost. So acute is their power of discrimination, that they have been known to trace the footsteps of bush-rangers over mountains and rocks; and, although the individual they have been in pursuit of has walked into the sides of the river as if to cross it, to elude the vigilance of his pursuers, and has swam some distance down and crossed when convenient, yet nothing can deceive them. Indeed, so remarkable is their discernment, that if but the slightest piece of moss on a rock has been disturbed by footsteps, they will instantly detect it. The aborigines of this island have no appointed place or situation to live in; they roam about at will, followed by a pack of dogs, of different sorts and sizes, but which are used principally for hunting the kangaroo, opossum, bandicoot, &c. They are passionately fond of their dogs; so much so, that the females are frequently known to suckle a favourite puppy instead of the child. They rarely ever move at night, but encircle themselves round a large fire, and sleep in a sitting posture, with their heads between their knees. So careless are they of their children, that it is not uncommon to see boys grown up with feet exhibiting the loss of a toe or two, having, when infants, been dropped into the fire by the mother.

The children are generally carried (by the women) astride the shoulders, in a careless manner. They live entirely by hunting, and do not fish so much, or use the canoe, as in New South Wales, although the women are tolerably expert divers; the craw-fish and oyster, if immediately on the coast, are their principal food. Opposums and kangaroos may be said to be their chief support; the latter is as delicious a treat to an epicure, as the former is the reverse. The manner of cooking their victuals is by throwing it on the fire, merely to singe off the hair; they eat voraciously, and are very little removed from the brute creation as to choice of food; entrails, &c. sharing the same chance as the choicest parts. They are extremely expert in climbing, and can reach the top of the largest forest-trees without the aid of branches; they effect this by means of a small sharp flint, which they clasp tightly in the ball of their four fingers, and having cut a notch out of the bark, they easily ascend, with the large toe of each foot in one notch, and their curiously manufactured hatches in the other. Their weapons of defence are the spear and waddie; the former is about twelve feet long, and as thick as the little finger of a man; the tea-tree supplies them with this matchless weapon; they harden one end, which is very sharply pointed, by burning and filing it with a flint prepared for the purpose. In throwing the spear they are very expert; indeed, of late, their audacious atrocities have been lamentably great, although, at the same time, I have little hesitation in saying, they have arisen from the cruel treatment experienced by some of their women from the hands of the distant stock-keepers. Indeed, these poor mortals, I know, have been shot at merely to gratify a most barbarous cruelty.

After killing a white man, the natives have a sort of dance and rejoicing, jumping, and singing, and sending forth the strangest noises ever heard. They do not molest the body when dead, nor have I ever heard of their stripping or robbing the deceased. Among themselves they have no funeral rites; and those who are aged or diseased are left in hollow trees, or under the ledges of rocks, to pine and die. These people are subject to a disease, which causes the most loathsome ulcerated sores; two or three whom I saw were wretched-looking objects. I remember a very old man, who was thus affected, being tried and hung, for spearing one of Mr. Hart's men; the culprit was so ill and infirm as to be obliged to be carried to the place of execution. I think the colonial surgeons call the disease the "bush scab;" and that it is occasioned by a filthy mode of life. The population of natives is very small in proportion to the extent of the island: several causes may be alleged for their smallness of numbers; the principal one is their having been driven about from place to place, by settlers taking new locations; another cause is the great destruction of the kangaroo, which obliges the natives to labour hard to procure food sufficient for their sustenance: this, and their having no means of procuring vegetables, besides being constantly exposed to the weather, together with their offensive habits of living, produce the disease above mentioned, with its fatal consequences.

CHINESE CITIES.

The cities of China are generally of a square form, surrounded with lofty walls, having projecting towers at regular intervals, and are usually encompassed by a ditch, either dry or full of water. Distributed through the streets and squares, or situated in the vicinity of the principal gates, are round, hexagonal or octagonal towers, of various heights, triumphal arches, beautiful temples dedicated to idols, and monuments erected in honour of those who have rendered important services to the nation, or the people; and lastly some public buildings more remarkable for extent than magnificence.

The squares are large, the streets long and of different breadths, the houses have, for the most part, but a ground floor, and rarely exceed one story. The shops are varnished, and ornamented with silk and porcelain. Before each door is fixed a painted and gilded board, seven or eight feet high, supported on a pedestal, and having inscribed on it three large characters chosen by the merchant for the sign of his shop, to distinguish it from all others. To these are often added a list of the articles to be disposed of, and the name of the seller. Under all, conspicuous for their size, are the characters "Pou-How," (no cheating here.)

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

Major Biddle, of the territory of Michigan, has been elected to congress, and the anti-masons are capering and hurraing as if the event were a sort of panacea for all their troubles. As these gentlemen have no successes at home to occupy their attention, they are excusable for travelling a little in search of them; but they have as good a claim to the election of general Jackson on anti-masonick grounds, as they have to that of major Biddle. This gentleman is a friend of the national administration; and as such, he was supported and elected. We have the authority of his own voluntary assertion for saying, that he is "neither a mason nor an anti-mason;" and that he wishes to have no connection with this new political speculation.

It is ludicrous enough to see the self-styled "friends" of "religion," "truth," &c. in this state, endeavour to tax their "popularity" abroad [Lord save it!] for the support of their "importance" at home! Were one to credit their assertions, he would believe that they held the destinies of all the world (excepting their own neighbourhood) in the palm of their hands, and that a political fortune hunter had only to cry "Morgan!" and he would be on the ascendant! If anti-masonry is so fashionable in other quarters, the "Central Committee" would do well to emigrate, since its unexampled usefulness does not appear to be much esteemed at home.

It would be well enough, however, for them to understand the truth of this Michigan matter, lest they lay too much stress upon it. It is true that major Biddle was nominated by the anti-masons; and it is equally true that he declined the nomination, declaring that he was not an anti-mason. On the contrary, his opponent, the Rev. Mr. Richards, a Roman Catholic Clergyman, is an anti-mason, and so mild a one, too, that he a few years since refused "Christian burial" to a man, because he had been a mason. So that if they must have a candidate in Michigan they will be obliged to take the one who is unfortunately in the vocative.

Extract from a letter to the editor of the Masonick Record, dated Columbus, Mississippi, April 13, 1829.

"The institution of masonry in this section is in a flourishing condition. The most happy and visible effects are produced by its moral influence, upon not only the members, but society in general. My opinion is, that our good condition is owing to a greater zeal for IMPROVEMENT than for numbers; exercising a considerable caution in investigating the characters of applicants, and rejecting those whose characters will not stand the test of morality. You may, perhaps, be somewhat surprised, when I inform you, that I have never witnessed such a thing as a game of cards, horse-racing, cock-fighting, or any other disorderly conduct, either by inhabitants or visitors, in our little village, for five years or more. Your surprise will be lessened when I tell you, that nearly all the citizens, and very many through the country, belong to the fraternity. Their correct deportment, effected by the determined course of the officers of this lodge, (Columbus Lodge, No. 5,) together with the very unanimous desire of carrying into operation the designs of the institution of masonry, seems to produce a tone of harmony and morality throughout the inhabitants within our sphere of operation. Vice is attacked wherever found, without regard to person, and it has been most vigorously and victoriously combated and overcome, when presented in the hydra-headed shape of intemperance."

A writer in the Philadelphia Mechanick's Free Press states "that Stephen Girard," is causing to be built, a block of convenient brick houses, somewhere in the North Liberties, which he offers to mechanicks or other working men, at a yearly rent that shall amount in ten years to the cost of the freehold, and at the expiration of said term, provided the rent has been duly paid, he offers to bind himself his heirs or assigns, to give to the occupant a deed in fee simple for the premises." The poor have often felt the effects of Mr. Girard's philanthropy; and the annals of humanity afford repeated proofs of his practical benevolence. Charities like this, are of the wisest and best kind, and deserve the highest commendation.

When Mrs. Royall was at Harrisburgh, last winter, Gen. Ogle and herself were as well pleased with each other as if they were "birds of a feather." It is said they ogled each other most industriously. An old statute of the District of Columbia says the lady must be ducked "upon a three legged stool." Would not a similar operation upon the General be of benefit to his brain?

The outrage at Niagara Falls, on the 4th inst. was occasioned by the following toast, which is certainly one of the most civil things said at the anniversary. We do not see how any man could conceive himself insulted by it. Those who were guilty of the outrage were malicious, feverish, and sensitive fools, with as little knowledge as the tiger, of christianity and republicanism.

Masonry—unblemishable—inpenetrable: may its members continue steadfast.

The annual examinations of students at the two institutions for the education of females in this city, have taken place during the present week. We were not present at either, but are informed by those who were, that the progress of the pupils is highly creditable to themselves and to the abilities of the teachers. Some of the compositions gave evidence of a maturity of judgment and a command of language not expected from the age of the authors.

From the Saratoga Sentinel.

RENUNCIATION. A Mr. Ives, of Vermont, wanting no office, but distractedly in love with morals and his country recently renounced masonry, and is now holding forth to the citizens of that state. It appears from documents collected and published in a Vermont paper, that this Ives was a resident in Mississippi in 1824; that for gross unmasonic conduct he was expelled from the lodge of which he was a member; and that he appealed to the Grand Lodge of the state, who not only confirmed the expulsion, but requested printers throughout the Union to publish it for the benefit of other lodges. The gross conduct complained of was seducing the wife of Mr. Thomas Barker. This is the key of his renunciation; and if facts were brought to light, it would appear that two thirds of these renunciations sprang from no higher motive—that their authors had either been expelled, or were taking a hostile course for mere purposes of revenge.

A case occurred in this vicinity not long since, equally ludicrous. A man who, (out of respect to his connections,) we shall distinguish by the name of A—, came into this village—was employed as a mechanic, and, owing to the standing of his relatives more than an intimate acquaintance with himself, he gained admission into the lodge here. He assumed the character of an unmarried man—attended a dancing school, and was particular in his attentions to one or two young ladies—expressing sufficient tenderness to induce a belief that he had no other objects than wedlock in view. But in the height of his courtship, he was disturbed by the sudden and unexpected appearance of his wife, who had sought out his retreat, and came to claim his protection and support. His plans being thus frustrated, he gave leg bail, taking the precaution to furnish himself with a suitable outfit of cash and other matters from the store of his principal benefactor, which he broke open for the purpose. He was pursued by an officer of justice, but could not be found—and was, as a matter of course, expelled from the lodge. For this indignity offered by the masons to this double refined patriot, he publicly renounced the institution in some of the western anti-masonick papers, accompanied with libellous charges against his benefactor. This renunciation, like that of Ives and several others of a kindred character, went the rounds, and was commented upon largely by the broken down politicians of the day, as another evidence of the direful consequences likely to flow from a continuance of masonry. The last we heard of A—, he was in jail on a charge of highway robbery.

Another instance of this renouncing spirit, will suffice for this chapter. A fellow in the western part of this state of the name of Hamilton, who had been expelled from one of the lodges, not only renounced the institution, but turned an anti-masonick lecturer, travelling from village to village, and holding forth something in the style of his compatriots of the day. In an evil hour, however, notwithstanding his renunciation and resolution to live a pure life, he committed a crime on a little girl, 13 years old, for which he was provided with a lecture room in the Auburn state prison.

We mention these cases, which are matters of notoriety in the vicinities of their occurrence, not for the purpose of ending the continuance of masonry, (for that must be left to the discretion of its members) but for the purpose of shewing who some of these persons are that furnish fuel for down hill politicians, and the reliance that should be placed in testimony coming from such a source. Were we disposed, we could fill our paper with portraits of equal deformity; and could show that the credulity of many an honest man has been operated on by the fabrications of individuals wholly wanting in political or moral honesty; and whatever may have been the views of some misguided men, that the grand actors in this drama are perfectly abandoned, and unworthy of any confidence whatever—that for the sake of office or revenge, they would resort to any expedient, however degrading; and even enkindle the flame of civil war, were it necessary, to effect their own aggrandizement. From such men all confidence of a public or private nature should be withdrawn. They should not be intrusted with office—but should be watched with a jealous eye. "Mark them which cause divisions."

The violence and bitterness of the anti-masonick party journals are becoming truly notorious. With the recklessness of madness, they seem equally regardless of truth and decency. In a late number of the Boston Free Press there has appeared a letter, purporting to be from "a friend residing in the midst of the scene of masonick outrage and bloodshed," and explaining the statement of Giddins in his Almanack. This letter, dated at "Batavia," contains the following most scandalous paragraph, in relation to the lamented Clinton. Can any citizen of New-York, we may add of the United States, read it, without being shocked at so base an insinuation? We know not whether more to detest the wickedness, than pity the weakness, of those who circulate such unfeeling and groundless slander against the memory of the dead.

[Washington Co. Post.]

Query—Did not King and Clinton commit suicide? Clinton was a man of great discernment, he saw the result of the excitement in prospect; he saw, because he must have seen, that he would be more than implicated if he lived; he was then at the zenith of his popularity, or rather upon the decline; considering his situation, &c., did he not choose DEATH TO DISGRACE?

UNPARALLELED BRUTALITY. The Anti-Masonick Rhode Islander and Boston Free Press, together with some of their kindred prints in this quarter, have published a letter dated at Batavia, but probably written by the notorious Giddins in Rochester, which asserts, among other things, that our late lamented chief magistrate—De Witt Clinton—whose works are the pride, whose name is inseparably associated with the glory of our state—was "More than implicated" in the outrage on Morgan, and actually KILLED HIMSELF! at the "very zenith of his fame," to evade the disgrace which [it is alleged] he foresaw would follow the exposure of his crime!!!

Where will this infamous system end?

The whole body of freemasons—the good with the bad—or what society is perfect?—have been indiscriminately proscribed—denounced as a gang of conspirators and murderers—denied the ordinary rights of men—and ministers and members have been hurled from churches professing the benign doctrines of Jesus Christ, for refusing to belie their consciences by echoing the denunciations fulminated for political purposes against masons!

Death itself is no longer a shield from calumny or the fury of the modern reformers! The grave is not with us a sanctuary "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." The bloodhounds of Pizarro were comparatively merciful—for, with the destruction of life, terminated their ferocity towards their Indian victims!

But there is a redeeming spirit among the people, which will ultimately, and ere long, (for all history proclaims that such delusions are short lived,) spurn the polluted authors of such atrocities—such outrages on the dead—such insults to humanity!

[Roch. Rep.]

MORE ANTI-MASONICK "LAW AND ORDER." The practice of the political anti-masons furnishes rather a striking commentary on their professions. Although the noisy advocates of "law and order," they are usually the first to outrage the injunctions of the one and mar the harmony of the other. We have already stated that the anti-masons have, for considerable time been the aggressors in every riot at the polls and otherwise—that a Morgan committee man (one who aided in establishing, and appeared to be part owner of the Anti-masonick Enquirer) had been convicted, on his own confession, of a brutal outrage on a brother lawyer, who happened to be a mason—and we have now to add that the last week has witnessed a similar scene of violence, in which one of the publishers or editors of the Anti-Masonick Enquirer was the principal actor. The assault was made on a physician, who is a mason—took place in a public street, in broad day light—and was attended with a degree of ferocity which should never be manifested in the quarrels of honourable men. We forbear to enter into particulars, as the affair will undergo legal investigation. It is a fact worth mentioning, that not a single mason, however much they are accused of perpetrating and justifying "outrage," has been guilty for a long time past, of any such disgraceful breaches of the peace; while neither the injunctions of hospitality, the obligations of law, nor the principles of religion, can protect from insult and outrage those who have by any means incurred the ire of the political anti-masons.

[Ibid.]

It was said of old, "there is no new thing under the sun"—but this was prior to the existence of anti-masonick politicians. The hirelings, having exhausted all the devices with which they have been furnished, and being driven in upon their own resources, are now gravely parading their assertion that DE WITT CLINTON and colonel King committed suicide! but "it is their vocation," and comment is unnecessary.

[Buf. Jour.]

ITEMS.

More from Solomon Southwick! On the 14th instant Solomon gave a list of the anti-masonick papers in this state, in the way of testing the strength of that party. Eight papers are now, he says, "in the full tide of successful experiment, and all well supported." This is a beggarly assertion. There is not one in the state that obtains a living support. They feel and know that they are fast on the road and "in the full tide" to "Davy Jones's locker."

[Oneida Obs.]

A countryman, who paid his tip, the other day, to ascend the Philadelphia state-house steeple, gasped with wonder till his mouth rivalled the circumference of the bell. "What's that?" "The fire bell." "Heighjees! if that strikes fire, I wonder it do n't blow up the town."

Anti societies are all the vogue. The latest are—an anti-neighbor society—an anti-kick-the-bucket society—an anti-run-away society—an anti-pistareen society—and an anti-love-the-ladies society. It is doubted whether the last will go. Strange things; however, may be expected about dog-days.

[Rutland Her.]

Now that political anti-masonry is on the wane, antis of other kinds spring up like mushrooms. Timothy Ware keeps an anti-grog-selling tavern on the road between Williamstown and Pownall. His bar-room is divided by the boundary line between Massachusetts and Vermont, so that he effects a "reform" in both states. Anti-grog-selling will do better than political anti-masonry in that region of "steady habits."

Colonel Knapp, in his address to the Society of Mechanics and Traders in New-York, estimates the whole number of mechanics in the United States at 480,000, lawyers 90000, doctors 12,000, ministers 7000, permanent schoolmasters 36,000.

A trifling Gift. The famous Christiana, Queen of Sweden, among other presents to the sister of Pope Clement IX., gave her a diamond cross, valued at 24,000 Spanish crowns.

By-gone Days. The Vermont Advocate publishes the following as a literal copy of the records of the whole proceedings of a term of the County Court in the Clerk's office, Orange county:

Feb. 25, } The Court set out from Moretown, (now 1771. } Bedford, (for Kingsland, (now Washington,) travelled until night, there being no Road, and the snow very deep, we travelled on Snow Shoes or Rackets. On the 26th we travelled some ways and held a council, when it was concluded to open the Court on the Spot, as we saw no line and knew not whether it was in Kingsland or not, but we concluded we were far in the woods. We did not expect to see any house unless we travelled three miles in Kingsland and no one lived there, when the court was ordered to be opened on the spot.

The Mirror, published in Lynn, Mass. a town celebrated for the number of shoemakers it contains, observes, in reference to the late celebration of Independence, "in this town the occasion was suffered to escape without a single demonstration of publick feeling:

Not a drum was heard, nor a frolicsome note,
As, dressed in our best, to the commons we hurried.
Not a trumper was seen in his blue and red coat,
Nor a soul of St. Crispin the festival worried."

AIRY CASTLES.

In youth's fair prime, that age of sweetest joys,
Fancy is found most busily at play;
Raising at pleasure with her fairy wand,
To the mind's eye the most alluring scenes;
With magick power, her curious world she decks
In every loveliness, while all that tends
To darken or deform is hid from view.
These 's nothing, truly, half so sweet in life
As that young dream—and nought that mem'ry seeks
With retrospective eye, one half so pleased.
True, the aerial scene, when highest wrought,
Is prone to disappear as swift as light,
And vanish into air—while, if 't is told,
The old will smile, and call it castle-building—
And say 't is childish folly. But can they Assurance give that they too have not dreamed,
When life was young with them and hope rose high?

I well remember that while yet a lad,
Scarcely emerged from childhood's antick days,
Imagination raised a fairy scene,
Engraved it deep on mem'ry's magick sheet,
And it remains in vivid brightness yet.
It was a solitude, remote and wild,
Secluded deep in lonely woods, where roamed
Secure, and fearing not the face of man,
The unconscious brute. A clear and limpid stream
Came tumbling down a high and craggy hill,
Crowned to the summit with a tangled wood,
Until it reached the base, and there a wide
And level vale expanded, and received
The reckless torrent in its verdant breast.
There, soothed by the caress, it gently roamed
Through flowery banks awhile, and then anon,
Poured its calm stream into a little lake,
Through whose still waters deep, yet clear, was seen
The white and sandy bottom; while midway,
The natives of the deep did leap and sport,
And chase each other through the limpid pool.
Its shores around were lined with stately trees,
The monarchs of the wood, and through their trunks,
The prospect deep retired in vistas long,
Stripped of all shrubbery or impediment.

Reposing on the bosom of the lake,
A little island sat—'t was such a spot
As Fancy's magick only calls to view.
Not that fair isle, where Venus and her loves
Were wont to dwell, had e'er more charming seemed.
Around its borders was a lovely fringe
Of shrubbery and flowers, whose blossoms rose
And nodded frequent to the passing wind.
'T was on this fairy spot I had a hut,
Beside the margin of a bubbling fount,
Built of rude logs, but neat withal,
And shadowed round the sides by clambering vines:
Within a chaste simplicity prevailed—
Here, in a small recess were chosen books,
To while away the hours of quiet rest;
And there my implements for making war
On bird, and beast, and fish.
Around this lovely cot, I caused to bloom
A garden, filled with each variety
Of fruit tree, flower, and culinary plant;
Through whose sweet bowers continued zephyrs played,
Fanning with wing invisible the air.

And here I used, on Fancy's pennons borne,
To hie myself, and dwell alone. Full oft
I've roamed through those imaginary bowers,
And oft have pushed my light canoe across
The quiet lake, and dropped from line and rod,
Into its waters clear, the tempting bait—
And there I've sat and watched the simple fish,
As greedily they seized the barbed hook—
Entangled then, I drew them struggling forth,
With change of element ill pleased.

Sometimes, with gun in hand I sallied forth
To hunt the stately deer—my faithful dog,
My sole companion. Creeping with silent tread,
I come upon my prey, quenching his thirst
By side of Sylvan spring. Unseen, I stop,
And poise the deadly piece, and fire.
Then, as the roar upon the stillness breaks,
The stricken animal springs frantick forth
In the wild bound of death, and then expires.

Then, from the bough of lofty tree above,
Is heard the wailing of a sorrowing child—
So at least it seems—but looking up,
Meets the astounded wonder-stricken gaze
The panther's glaring eye-balls, keenly fixed
Upon his destined prey. Impelled by fright,
I forthwith charge with deadly messenger
My trusty gun; at whose bright flash, the foe
Falls headlong down, his fierceness tamed at once.

Such are the visions that I used to form,
In Youth's enchanting day. I always loved
To be alone—to draw myself from face of men,
And in retirement commune with myself.
This beau ideal of paradise I made
Without a human being but myself,
And thought if I could find a solitude
Like this, I should be happy.

STANZAS.

I have lived eighteen years, and they
Like clouds that stain the summer sky,
All heavily have passed away,
And dark their shadows on me lie;
But yet at times there comes a dream
So brightly mingled up with fame,
That forth my darkened feelings stream,
To win a bright and ever glorious name.

Oh! irksome has been every thought,
Unknown to youth's few years of joy,
And being has been ever fraught
With its own deep and dark alloy;
But whiles when I am sad, there steals
Unto my listening ear, a breath
Of melody my spirit feels,
Which shall be cherished even until death.

Oh! in the midnight of the soul
How pants the spirit for relief!
The passions, spurning all controul,
Plunge wildly in the paths of grief;—
The angel Hope has fluttered by,
Nor has he where to rest his wings,
But perches on the wave—to die,
And dark Despair around its fetters flings.

Awake! my soul, the lethargy
That bound my spirit now is broken,
And there has rose a star for me,
And gently in my thought is spoken
A wish that I might cease to be
A slumberer in glory's field;
And smiles that light my destiny,
Breaketh up feelings in my breast congealed.

BALLAD.

BY THOMAS PRINGLE.

Our native land—our native vale,—
A long—a last adieu!
Farewell to bonny Teviot-dale
And Cheviot's mountains blue!
Farewell, ye hills of glorious deeds,
And streams renowned in song!
Farewell ye blithesome braes and meads,
Our hearts have loved so long!
Farewell ye broomy elfin knowes,
Where thyme and harebells grow!

Farewell ye hoary haunted howes,
O'erhung with birk and sloe!

The battle mound, the border tower,
That Scotia's annals tell,
The martyr's grave—the lover's bower,
To each—to all—farewell!

Home of our hearts! Our father's home—
Land of the brave and free!
The sail is flapping on the foam,
That bears us far from thee!

We seek a wild romantick shore,
Beyond the Atlantick main;
We leave thee to return no more,
Or view thy cliffs again,

But may dishonour blight our fame,
And quench our household fires,
When we, or ours, forget thy name,
Green island of our sires.

Our native vale—our native vale—
A long,—a last adieu!
Farewell to bonny Teviot-dale,
And Scotland's mountains blue!

NORWEGIAN WAR SONG

From Conway's "Journey through Norway."

Sons of the mountain, sons of the lake,
Sons of the forest, Old Norway awake!
They come from the East, ten thousand or more:
But lakes are behind them, and foes are before.

Shall Old Norway cease to be Norway the free?
Each face to a Swede, and each back to a tree,
Were our foes twice ten thousand, our rocks should repeat
The groan of the Swede as he falls at your feet.

Your mothers have nursed you; your fathers till now,
Have filled you with bread by the sweat of their brow.
But let peace be around him—the sire of fourscore—
And drive the invader far, far from his door.

Then down from the mountain, and up from the lake
And out from the forest! Norwegians, awake!
And rush like the storm on the thick-coming foe,—
With hearts for Old Norway, and death in your blow.

NORWEGIAN LOVE SONG.

From the same.

Meet me, maid, by the pine-fringed lake,
When the woods are asleep, and the stars are awake.
When the marten has ceased the waters to skim,
And all, but thy hazel eye, is dim.

By the dusky lake, I will tell thee more
Than ever was told in thy ear before;
For thy small hand and the fading light,
Will give me courage that flies with the night.

Thou seest the mantle of snow that spread
Since the days of old on the mountain's head:
The same as it is, it ever will be,—
And so will my love live on for thee.

Then come to me, maid; already the day
Has fled to the hills that are far away;
Before the great owl begins to hoot,
I'll list for the tread of thy lightsome foot.

MASONICK RECORD.

DR. PALMER'S ADDRESS.

Extracts from an Address delivered before St. John's Lodge, No. 41, in Thetford, Vermont, at the opening of the new Masonick Hall in that place, February 18, 1829,

BY DAVID PALMER, M. D.

Master of the Lodge.

A society so unpretending and simple in its character, would seem to have been entitled to go down the stream of time without meeting with any of the jealousy and opposition which those institutions have encountered, that have endeavoured to direct the religious and political opinions of the world. Accordingly, we find sovereign princes mingling with their subjects in masonick assemblies, and men of every religious opinion exchanging within our walls the pledges of masonick fraternity.

Occasional opposition, we have indeed encountered. The monarchs of Spain and Russia, the Grand Turk of Constantinople, and the Pope of Rome, at different periods have denounced freemasonry. And these are believed to be all the potentates of the old world, who have seriously set themselves to harm the brethren of the mystick tie. And their open and avowed reason for doing so, has been, that the institution was favourable to the propagation of liberal principles. And the names of freemason and liberal, have become synonymous in the dialect of the despotick courts of Europe.

Perhaps it was not to be wondered at, that the tenants of the rotten thrones that had been raised by violence, and supported by the misery and oppression of the people, should tremble at associations of intelligent men, who were capable of acting in concert, and of instructing the people in relation to those rights that had been wrested from them by their unfeeling oppressors; and yet it does not appear, that freemasonry has ever been the means of creating political disturbance.

But it has been reserved to our own country, and to the present period, to exhibit the curious phenomenon of people living under a free government, commencing a barbarous, unprovoked attack upon the society of freemasons. Tyrannical princes and bigoted priests have heretofore been our only enemies; and if we could conciliate these, the people have always been willing to benefit by our instructions, and to participate in our charities. But in our most enlightened age and nation, means have been found to influence the rabble with a spirit little less ferocious than that which characterized the wildest outrages of revolutionary France. A crime was said to have been committed in the fall of 1826, by some members of the society; but as the fact has never been proved, and as the public mind was divided as to the probability of its having been committed, the individuals, by every principle of law, ought to be presumed innocent until some proof of their guilt has been adduced. Instead of this, not only the persons implicated, but the whole society have been boldly pronounced murderers! And our peaceful towns, and societies, and churches, are rent by anti-masonick dissensions.

To a spectator of the scene, who was unacquainted with the intimate structure of American society, and the causes by which it is moved, this fermentation of its elements would be wholly unaccountable. He would be totally at a loss to conceive how the good people of this country could be made to believe that the institution over which Washington and Franklin presided; and which they regarded as the purest and wholesomest of all human institutions, should contain principles hostile to the liberties and happiness of the American people. He would be astonished at the credulity that could swallow the monstrous belief—that a society under the especial patronage of the venerable Marshall, the Chief Justice of the country, should yet be guilty of practices subversive of all human laws. And more than all, would he be astonished, when told that a community that numbers amongst its members a great proportion of the enlightened clergy, and professors of every religious denomination, should yet be in direct opposition to the whole spirit of christianity!!

Freemasons have mingled with society at all periods. Their conduct has been observed, and their characters estimated, from age to age. Some of them have been found in almost every town and parish; and the publick—the whole civilized world, have possessed the most perfect facility for the forming a correct opinion of the character and the worth of the institution. And the result of all has been a general conviction upon the publick mind, that the society was composed of the more intelligent part of the community; that they were bound by some obligation to an upright course of moral conduct; and that they seldom or never suffered their members, or their widows, or orphans to come to want. Occasionally too, the publick accounts have noticed the amount of our annual donations to purposes of more general charity—such as the diffusion of the bible, the emancipation and relief of the suffering African, and promoting the cause of education among the poor. We do not desire to be the heralds of our own charities; but when driven to speak on this subject, we are able to say with truth, that our advances for these objects have been numbered, not by hundreds, or thousands, but by millions. Thus the general principles, and even the more intimate structure of the masonick society, was well understood. It was believed that its secrets served only to enable the members to distinguish one another: and that the society was on the whole an important part of the apparatus of a civilized community. But publick opinion in this country, is like the ocean with its tides and its currents; and the newspaper press the tornado, that raises its mountain waves. The illustrious Jefferson deliberately declared in 1814, that it had then become rotten; and that it had forfeited all title to be believed. And it was then as pure as the waters of Eden, compared with its present filthy, noxious current. Witness the late presidential contest, that has damned the fair fame of America; and realized the worst wishes of her worst enemies. Two of our most distinguished citizens have for four years been bedaubed with every opprobrious epithet; and the foreign journalists have assured their readers, that the two worst men in America were candidates for the presidency. And the pious and enlightened people of the country have seconded and supported these outrages of the press; and the number of newspapers circulated during the presidential contest has vastly increased. But it was foreseen by the conductors of the press, that Gen. Jackson's shooting the six militia men, and Mr. Adams's squandering the publick money for billiard balls, would soon cease to make music in the publick ear. They had vitiated the taste of their readers with high seasoned, inflammatory dishes, and they dreaded the experiment of treating them to plain and wholesome fare. In this dilemma, it was discovered by some sagacious member of their fraternity, that sounding the anti-masonick alarm was an expedient eminently calculated to serve their purpose.

There was a latent disposition among the ignorant to attach something mysterious to the name of freemason, and by blowing these almost extinguished embers, they have succeeded in setting the country in a flame. Nearly an hundred presses are now employed, and probably a thousand individuals obtain their livelihood by hurling the firebrands of discord through our otherwise peaceful community. And the literal incendiary who fires your dwelling at midnight, that he may plunder from the smoking ruins, is a saint, compared with him who thus kindles a moral conflagration in a whole community, that he may reap the petty profit derived from the sale of a false and filthy newspaper.

There is a superficial literature; a smattering of learning possessed by all the classes of our community, and in many respects, in almost all, this general diffusion of even a moderate share of intelligence has a salutary effect on our institutions. But there is no doubt that this salutary effect would be vastly increased, if the amount of popular knowledge was greater than it is.

Nor can it be doubted, that in some instances, this shallow, skin-deep cultivation is productive of evil instead of good effects. All our people can read a newspaper, while, comparatively, few can judge of the probable truth or falsehood of its contents. And the combustible passions of the populace lie fair and exposed to the torch of the newspaper incendiary. And there is a strong affinity between the prejudices of the lower classes, and the absurd declamations with which the anti-masonick publications are filled. A relish similar to that which is felt for works of fiction, for romances, and novels, and tales of ghosts and witchcraft; while the sober truths of religion and morals, such truths as are inculcated in every well governed lodge, are turned away from with indifference or disgust.

The passions of the populace have been under the controul of a political as well as a newspaper influence. Disappointed office-seekers, men of desperate political influence, who have nothing to lose, and may perhaps be gainers, are among the foremost to raise the storm which they hope to direct. And where no parties previously existed, they have succeeded in arraying fathers against sons, and sons against fathers, in this unholy contest. As a proof that there is nothing of principle in all this bustle, but that the whole originates either in the atrocious profligacy of the press, or the ambition of political partizans, it may be mentioned, that in the neighbouring state of New-Hampshire, where political parties are nearly equally balanced, and where the political journalists have sufficient employment in bedaubing one another and opposing candidates for office, anti-masonick virulence is unknown; and the politicians of that state would laugh to scorn the suggestion that their cause would be promoted by enlisting the passions of the people against the masonick institution. Connecticut river forms the eastern boundary of the anti-masonick territory, for the plain reason, that nothing can at present be acquired, either of office or money, by extending the contagion further. There is already sufficient excitement among our eastern neighbours, to suit the views of the warmest friends of faction. With us, the case was different. Our elections had for a long time been nearly unanimous. The surface of our politics was calm and tranquil "as a summer sea." But the dregs had subsided, and were festering and fermenting at the bottom. And their prospect of rising to the surface depends on the continuance of the anti-masonick storm. And to keep up this storm, the independence of the press has been invaded; and those of its conductors who could not be seduced by the promise of patronage, to enlist in the cause, have been threatened with proscription and persecution.

It is true, that in this absurd and unprincipled crusade against the peace of society, there are some well meaning individuals engaged. When the popular current sets strong in any direction, the weak minded and timid are liable to be carried away by its force. And no scheme, however absurd, has been broached, that has not found followers. The best blood of Great Britain flowed on the scaffold, like water, to gratify the rage of the government and people, on account of the imaginary popish plot, in 1678. And the historian has recorded their mad delusion as a warning to succeeding generations—and the pages that shall transmit to posterity the present period of our national history, will be like the handwriting on the wall, the "Mene, tekem, upharsin," of our national degradation.

It is a curious fact in the history of the anti-masonick epidemic, that the conscientious and very pious persons who are said to have renounced their connexion with the society, have for a series of years been members, have sought masonick degrees with avidity, and considered themselves honoured by their connexion with the society. Their consciences were very easy on this subject, while masonry was in good repute; but the moment the newspaper clamour reached their ears, they made the discovery that they were connected with a society of traitors to their government and blasphemers of their God!! Shall we believe that they were cordial and hearty members of such a society while it was popular; and left it only when its character was made known to the world? or shall we rather believe that they never were masons except in name? that their hearts were never thoroughly imbued with the masonick principles, and that when they saw a prospect of attracting public notice by their renunciation, they became the slanderers of an institution whose real principles they never had truly imbibed? I leave them to their choice in this dilemma. May God preserve me and my friends from either of the alternatives.

I have no doubt but we are now paying the penalty for our too great readiness to initiate those who make application, without sufficiently scrutinizing their characters. We have desired too much the augmentation of our funds, that our means of relieving the pecuniary distress of our indigent brethren, and their widows and orphans, might be increased; and we have suffered to pass our threshold, men, whose characters were unfit for the profitable reception of our instructions. But the intelligent and candid part of society are beginning to appreciate their revelations as they deserve. By their own account, they are all guilty either of common falsehood in all they say on this subject, or of the more aggravated guilt of wilful and deliberate perjury; and here too, we may leave them to choose their alternative. The miserable subterfuge that an oath, when voluntarily taken, is not morally binding, because the individual taking it cannot be prosecuted, in a civil court, for its violation, is the morality of the followers of Loyola, but will find few advocates in this age or nation.

When the effervescence has subsided, seceding masons will find themselves expelled from the lodge and rejected by the world; and compelled to seek out for themselves a middle region of contempt. And it will subside, and masonry will continue to exist as it has done for ages. If crimes have been committed by individuals of the order, it is much to be hoped that they will be detected and punished. But it is the height of absurdity to suppose, that because a few members of a society have sinned, the whole must be punished, or that a charitable and moral institution must cease to exist, because a senseless clamour has been excited against it.

The character of the age too in which we live, requires a more vigorous and energetic development of masonic principles. The improvements in morals, in literature, and the sciences, have altered the nature of those duties which masons owe to one another and to the public.

We shall probably never again be the instruments of saving the sacred scriptures from destruction. Providence seems to have ordained that they shall be translated into every language under heaven, and that the copies shall become as numerous as the families of the earth. And in promoting this great object, freemasons have been, and will continue to be, most extensively employed. And the same society that once secreted the Book of the Law from the idolaters who meditated its destruction, will now assist in multiplying its numbers until idolatry shall be banished from the world. Nor are the elements of human science to depend, as they have heretofore done, upon the masonic society for their chief cultivation, if not for their very existence. The doctrines of Euclid and Pythagoras are taught in our schools and colleges; and the world at large may easily learn what was once to be obtained by masonic initiation. But shall we remit our exertions because the uninitiated world are treading close in our footsteps? Shall an institution that has been the means of conferring such incalculable benefits upon mankind, be now deserted because new energies are to be put forth—when the field on which those energies are to be exerted offers such liberal promise of an abundant harvest? There are no such thoughts among true masons. Harvest as we are to each other, and to the world, by the ties of an enlarged and liberal philanthropy—and speaking a language that is understood by our brethren in all parts of the globe—our power, under Providence, in promoting the welfare of our species, is irresistible.

And, while there is ignorance to enlighten, or vice to reclaim, or misery to alleviate, masonic labours will continue to be required, and masonic societies will continue to exist.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

The Hon. CHARLES R. SHERMAN, a judge of the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio, an able jurist, and a distinguished mason, died at his residence in Lebanon, Ohio, on the 24th of June last. The following tributes of respect to his memory, are from the masonic institutions, over which he was the presiding officer:—

At a special meeting of Lancaster Chapter, No. 11, convened at their hall in Lancaster, Ohio, on Monday evening, June the 29th, A. L. 5829, the presiding officer addressed the Chapter as follows:—

COMPANIONS—We have been convened this evening, by special notice, on a melancholy occasion: an occasion, which, whilst it draws forth our sympathies, rouses those fraternal feelings inseparable from the masonic principles we have pledged to each other to maintain. The loss of a worthy companion in our order bereaves us of a prop and a stay to our fabric; it deprives us of a key stone in the arch that requires our utmost skill, attention and labour to replace. The loss to society is no less serious because we are thereby deprived of a distinguished practical example of those virtues without which we are unprofitable. Companions! our loss is irreparable! In our Most Excellent High Priest, ES R. SHERMAN, the masonic family have suffered. The quality which can be sufficiently appreciated only by those who have shared in the labours of the fraternity with him, and there I've a distinguished officer. In accordance with the memory of our worthy companion, As greedily they seized manifold excellent qualities that distinguished him, I drew forth demonstrations of respect to evince to the world and our brethren at large, that we duly appreciate the virtues of those whose exemplary lives were subjects of commendation. Such have been our unfeigned sentiments of the individual who has presided in the elevated station of Most Excellent High Priest of this Chapter, and this the melancholy occasion on which, as masons, we ask your condolence.

Whereupon, on motion, the following resolutions were adopted.

Resolved, that the Lancaster Royal Arch Chapter deeply regret the loss they have sustained in the deprivation of the services of their Most Excellent High Priest, CHARLES R. SHERMAN, by his unexpected demise. That emulating the virtues and masonic zeal of their late estimable companion, they sincerely, affectionately, and fraternally deplore his early fate. That in thus recording on their minutes the high sense entertained of his exalted character, and ardent devotion in the cause of masonry, they will cherish in remembrance his exalted virtues, as being worthy of imitation by the masonic fraternity. And that as he was a steady and warm supporter of the principles of our order, disseminating good will and fellowship among the brethren in this terrestrial Chapter, we are consoled with the hope that his immortal spirit is enjoying its reward in the celestial temple above, "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Resolved, that, as a further mark of respect, we will wear crape on the left arm thirty days.

The above resolutions being unanimously adopted, it was also resolved that the address and resolutions be published.

JACOB D. DIETRICK, Sec'y.

At a special meeting of Lancaster Lodge, No. 57, held in the Masonick Hall, in the town of Lancaster, on Thursday evening June 30, the following preamble and resolution, were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, the members of this lodge have learnt with heartfelt sorrow the demise of our worthy and highly esteemed brother, CHARLES R. SHERMAN, who departed this life at Lebanon, Ohio, on the 24th inst. Therefore,

Resolved, that, as a token of respect for the deceased, the members of this lodge will wear crape on the left arm for the term of thirty days.

GEO. MYERS, Sec'y.

The following refutation of another vile and pitiful slander furnishes another illustration of the mild and truth-loving spirit of anti-masonry.

From the Northern Sentinel.

MESSRS. E. & T. MILLS—Gentlemen, having observed in the Statesman of the 24th ult. printed at Castleton, a false and slanderous paragraph relating to the late conflagration of the court house in this town; the cause of truth cannot be better served than by sending you for publication the article and accompanying statement, by inserting which, you will oblige the lovers of truth and good order generally, and more particularly those attached to the masonic family. The article from the Castleton paper is as follows:—

"Brilliant Effects of Masonry. The last luminous masonic act which has occurred is the destruction of the Chittenden county court house by fire. It appears that a part of the court house was occupied as a Masonick Hall, (a Masonick Hall in a Court House!) the lodge met as usual at midnight, held their carousal, took a swig or two from the old skull bone, cursed the anti-masons, set the house on fire, and went home. Now, whether they had been heating their gridiron and carelessly placed it away before it was cooled, or saw the downfall of their order, and that they would have no further use for their temple, remains a secret with them, and matters not, but the house was soon consumed,—squares, trowel, plumb, death's head, &c. &c. all departed together."

Statement respecting the Fire. We, the undersigned, officers and members of Burlington Chapter and Washington Lodge, do hereby certify, that on the evening of the 15th of June 1829, a few minutes after eight o'clock, we opened the Masonick Hall, on the second floor of the court house, in Burlington, and went there for the purpose of making out the annual returns to the Grand Chapter, which was to convene at Rutland on the 17th of that month. Before the necessary papers were completed, a lamp was lighted by the aid of a common phosphorus match, and after completing them and remaining in the Hall about half an hour, the hall was closed, the lamp taken to a room occupied as an office, on the lower floor, and carefully extinguished. We further certify that no person within our knowledge, except ourselves, entered the hall on the evening alluded to—and that we are not conscious of any neglect, want of care, or prudence, either in lighting, trimming, or extinguishing the lamp used by us, which could have caused the destruction of the court house on the morning of the 16th inst. by fire.

Signed,

DAVID RUSSELL,
JAS. S. SAWYER.

Burlington, June 29, 1829.

We, the undersigned officers of Chittenden County Court, hereby certify that we are personally acquainted with David Russell and James L. Sawyer, esqrs. whose signatures are annexed to the above certificate, and take pleasure in saying that they are gentlemen of probity, of high standing in community, and that we consider their assertion entitled to perfect credit.

BATES TURNER, Chief Judge.
ALVAN FOOTE, } Assistant
NATH'L NEWELL, } Judges.
CHARLES ADAMS, States At'y.
MOSES BLISS, Sheriff.

In addition to the foregoing statement, and in reply to the exclamation of "a Masonick Hall in a Court House!," the base slanderers are informed that the edifice alluded to, was built in 1801, by the liberality of the citizens of this vicinity—the amount then subscribed was $1744—fifteen hundred and seventeen dollars of which were subscribed by masons—for the truth of all which you have a pledge from Yours respectfully,

NATHAN B. HASWELL,
H. P. of Burlington Chapter, and Master of Washington Lodge.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

RESUSCITATION.

The last number of Mr. Silliman's Journal contains an account of a resuscitation by oxygen gas, from apparent death by drowning. The subject was a favourite young beagle hound, which fell into a celler filled with water and was drowned. How long he lay there could only be known from conjecture. He was heard yelping and flouncing in the water, and had been silent for a long time, when he was found and dragged out. When carried to the owner, his body and limbs were so cold, hard and inflexible, that taking him by the foot, he was turned over, like a block with four pegs attached to it. A large bladder was filled with oxygen, not diluted with any portion of nitrogen, to which was attached a small brass stop-cock with a long beak; by a violent pressure of the bladder, a copious dose of the gas was then infused into the lungs of the dog; he instantly made a conclusive and solitary yelp, to the full pitch of his usual shrill voice in the chase; the dose was repeated till the gas was consumed; the dog was placed by the fire in warm blankets, friction constantly applied, and a strong dose of diluted volatile ammonia forced into his stomach; his body and limbs became relaxed, and his respiration short and rapid. The experiment commenced at one o'clock, P. M. and at eleven that night the dog raised himself on his feet and made a few feeble steps; the next morning he left the kitchen and walked to his kennel, a distance of fifty yards. On the fourth day he took a small portion of meat, and the vital functions soon seemed to be perfectly restored. Eight or ten days after that, his appetite, repletion, and vivacity, indicated a thorough renovation of the animal functions. It is worthy of notice that his voice, naturally sharp and shrill, was astonishingly altered to a full and coarse tone.

These particulars are communicated in two letters from J. E. Muse, Cambridge, Md. to the editor of the Journal. The circumstances took place at the close of last winter. [N. Y. Courier.]

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

MANIA A POTU.

We extract the following report of a singular case of homicide, from the last number of Dr. Drake's Medical and Physial Journal. It is accompanied in that work, by a long and lucid essay upon mania a potu, from the pen of the able editor, which we wish our limits would allow us to republish. The extract which follows, will, we think prove interesting to the general reader.

James Birdsell, of the village of Harrison, in the western part of this county, on the 3d inst. was arraigned before the Supreme Court of Ohio, for homicide. Present on the bench, Judges Pease and Sherman. In the indictment it was laid, that the defendant, on Thursday evening, 5th of March, 1829, murdered his wife, by cutting through her neck from side to side, with a narrow axe, at a single blow, which severed the spinal column, and caused instant death. The proof of the fact was perfect and uncontroverted. The defence set up was Mania a potu. Having recorded the principal facts, and also been furnished with the notes of the prosecutor and one of the advocates, I propose to lay before the reader such portions of them, as have a relation to the subject of Medical Jurisprudence.

The defendant was to appearance about fifty years of age, and had been married nineteen or twenty years to a second wife, by whom he had several children, one of whom was a witness in the case. It appeared from the testimony, that for several years he had been subject to occasional fits of intoxication, which in the latter part of the time had been followed by Mania a potu, which generally lasted for several days, and went off spontaneously. In these paroxysms he had the physical and moral symptoms which usually characterize that malady. The former were, great tremours of the hands, a pale face, red eyes, and sometimes a copious perspiration even when exposed half naked to a cold atmosphere. The moral phenomena were, disordered perceptions of sight and hearing, so that he often insisted that he saw himself surrounded by snakes and other reptiles, or by armed men who sought to kill him; or supposed he heard strange sounds of trumpets, or vocal musick, or conversation of which he was the subject, and the object of which was mischief to himself. He was thus filled with apprehension for his safety, and sometimes ran about the village at night, as if attempting to escape from bad persons who were pursuing him. On a certain night, he made so much clamour as to excite the idea of several men engaged in a riot. At another time, in his own house, he concealed himself between the feather and straw bed, where he was almost suffocated. On another occasion, he was found, after dark, standing in the street without shoes or hat, and had described around him a circle in the dust, and declared that if any one entered it, that person would kill him. At other times he would peep from his window, and point his gun, as for defence, against imaginary persons, who were approaching to seize him. Again, he would fancy that two armies were engaged in battle, and that he must join one of them. In all his paroxysms he had so great a degree of watchfulness, as to sleep little or none for several nights in succession. But his prevailing maniacal conception was, that his wife was in combination with three of his neighbours, one of whom was his son by a former wife, and that they had conspired against his life. Of these men, when they were not in his presence, he was afraid. In the paroxysms he was accustomed to charge his wife (unfoundedly in the opinion of witnesses) with a criminal intimacy with these persons. He even threatened to kill her if she did not desist, and had been heard to utter this threat, when he was thought by one of the witnesses to be rational.

On the Sunday before the murder, he drank freely, and was intoxicated, in which condition, as usual, he was quiet, dull, and disposed to lie in bed. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday presented nothing special. On Wednesday evening he complained to a neighbour of feeling unwell, and asked his son's assistance in the performance of some necessary manual labour for his family. He seemed to the witness to be rational. During the night he slept none, and complained of a cramp in his stomach. The next morning his family thought him crazy, but were not alarmed, as they were accustomed to such attacks. In the course of the day he took an axe on the shoulder, and walked rapidly to the house of a neighbour, whom he desired to go home with him, saying they wanted to kill him; and about the same time he told another of the supposed conspirators, that he had overheard his wife and him that morning whispering about taking his (the witness') life.

He spent the day at home in the midst of his family, apparently in agitation and terror, but said he would not hurt any one, and did not wish to be hurt. In addition to the axe, which he placed under the bed, where it was often kept, he provided a scythe, which he brought into the house. He manifested jealousy of his wife, and told her to act better, for she had already caused the death of 30,000 men. He fancied that the persons of whom he was jealous, were in the loft manufacturing ropes to hang him, and going up, returned and said he had cut the ropes to pieces, and brought down the fragments with him, though he had nothing in his hands. In the course of the afternoon, he fastened both the doors of his house. At the usual time his wife went out to milk, and he barred the door after her. On her return he fastened it again. She was seated near the fire, and he was walking the room. At length he took the axe from under the bed, and suddenly gave the fatal blow, following it up with two others on the face. His oldest daughter caught the instrument, which he yielded up, and then seized the scythe, with which he attempted to strike her. She defended herself with a chair, till the smaller children having opened the door, she made her escape. He took his youngest child in his arms, and sat down by the window. The child exclaimed, "mamma bleeds!" which he said made him feel bad. When the neighbours arrived immediately afterwards, he gave himself up, acknowledged what he had done, said he knew he would be hung for it, but that he ought to have done it nine months sooner; and that if he had it to do again, he would strike two blows where he only struck one. Talked so rationally, that many of the witnesses could not believe him deranged. Evincing no dread of punishment for his crime, but was still in great apprehension from the persons who, he had believed intended to kill him. Was glad that he had defeated their calculations. On his way to the city to be committed to jail, talked rationally and composedly about his affairs, and on various subjects; but frequently asked the guard if they did not hear sweet sounds of different kinds, and on being answered in the negative, insisted that he could not be mistaken. After being committed he became regular, and expressed his regret at what he had done.

Three medical gentlemen were required to deliver professional opinions on the testimony. They came to the same conclusion, which was, that the defendant was subject to Mania a potu, and that he laboured under that malady when he perpetrated the homicide.

On this opinion, and the facts which support it, the counsel for the prisoner rested his defence. It was alleged, that Mania a potu should not be confounded with the delirium of a fit of intoxication; but associated with insanity, and, like it, might be offered as a legal excuse for the perpetration of what, in its nature, is felonious. They admitted, that drunkenness can not be plead as an apology for crimes, but argued, that when it gives birth to insanity, the maniac should experience all the immunities of a non compos from any other cause. They averred, that if a man, in the commission of a felonious deed, should receive a blow on his head, which was followed by mental alienation, his acts, during that state, would not be regarded as criminal; and that the subject of Mania a potu is in that condition; lastly, that the habitual drunkard is urged on by a physical necessity which he can not resist; and should not, therefore, be held accountable for his conduct when labouring under the derangement, which follows his inebriation.

To which the prosecutor replied, that Mania a potu should be referred to drunkenness rather than insanity; that it follows as the necessary consequence of the former, and soon abates; that the defendant, Birdsell, was aware that his intoxication was productive of delirium, and hence, that he voluntarily did what he knew would derange his intellect; that Mania a potu being a natural effect of intemperance, can not be offered as an excuse, like the insanity which might follow a blow on the head, received during the perpetration of a felony; which blow and insanity should be regarded as mere contingent or accidental events; finally, that the law does not recognise, in the drunkard, a physical necessity to drink; but holds him accountable for his actions when intoxicated; and, of course, in the delirium which follows that intoxication.

The opinion of the court was looked for with anxiety; but in their charge, they waived a discussion of the point in controversy, and submitted it, with the facts, to the jury, who returned a verdict of murder in the first degree, as laid in the indictment.

We make another extract. Dr. Drake thinks that "whatever may have been the natural disposition of the monomaniack, or the nature of his delusion, it can never be pronounced absolutely safe to allow him unrestrained liberty;" and is of opinion that individuals of this class should not be held accountable for their actions, as men of sane minds. In the course of his illustrations, he relates the following anecdote:

Since I began this paper, I have more than once laid down my pen, to listen to the story of a monomaniack. Five or six days ago a stranger applied to me for professional advice, and recounted so many bad symptoms, as at first to astonish me.

At length I asked him the cause of his indisposition, and he told me with a low and earnest voice, that he had been poisoned by a woman in a distant state. Suspecting insanity, I advised him to take a warm bath, to promote the expulsion of the poison through the skin, and call on me again. Three days afterwards he joined me in the street, and informed me, with great concern, that the woman who had poisoned him, was now on her way up the Ohio river, and would certainly take his life. I said, I hoped not. But, said he, how can it be prevented? Let me know, I replied, when she arrives, and I will protect you. But, how can you, he asked, she works secretly! I must not tell you, said I, or it will take away my power. This seemed to increase his confidence, and with many expressions of gratitude, he left me to watch the arrival of the steam-boat. The next day he came to my office, in a state of increased alarm, to inform me, again, that she was hourly expected; that her husband was with her, and that lodgings had been provided for them in a certain part of the city, which he described; that she was considered a respectable woman, in society, but had killed several men; that he had loved and addressed her, but was superseded by the richer man, to whom she is now married; that she first gave him arsenick in an apple, and afterwards poison on a rose, which had penetrated all parts of his body, except his heart, which was only protected and his life saved, by wearing over it a charm cut out of paper; that when she arrived, she would certainly kill him, and afterwards must kill her husband, because of their having addressed her as rivals. At length he declared, that if he should see her in the street, he would take her life. But, said I, that would be wicked; to which he replied, should I not do it to save my own life? That is true, I remarked, but you would be taken up and hung, and you had better die by her hand than that of the hang-man. This seemed to confound him, but not to quiet his alarm. I succeeded, however, in composing him, by renewed assurances of my power to countervail her designs, even without seeing her, provided I could know when she arrived; and he left me for the night, to watch her coming. The next morning he returned to tell me in a whispering and agitated voice, that she would be at the quay in half an hour, accompanied by two negroes as accomplices, and begged me to be prepared; I renewed my assurances, and advised him to be quiet and keep out of her reach. At noon, he came to me in the street, to say, that he had watched throughout the morning, but she had not yet arrived;—since which, one night has elapsed, and I have not seen him. This unfortunate man has an agreeable but anxious countenance, dressed decently, possesses some intelligence and converses well when his attention can be diverted from the narrative which I have given. I have no doubt that he is deranged. The story of the expected arrival of a woman may be an illusion; but suppose it real, and that he believes her in quest of him to take his life, after having twice attempted it already, would it be either remarkable or criminal, if he should kill her? It certainly would not; and yet if he were to do so, I apprehend that according to the proofs of madness required in the case of Birdsell, he would be punished.

The Cincinnati Chronicle of 25th ult. states that the punishment of Birdsell has been commuted by the Governor to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary. The commutation was not, however, agreed to by the criminal, till he was taken to the gallows and the cord placed round his neck. The disappointment and vexation of an immense crowd of men and women, who had nobly braved the elements to witness the delightful spectacle of an execution, were exceedingly cute when the commutation was agreed to.

In the sea-fight off Minorca, in 1756, a gunner had his right hand shot off, just as he was going to fire off a gun. The brave fellow took up the watch, saying, quite unconcernedly, "So then you thought that I had but one arm."

Dr. R. maintained that poverty was a virtue. "That is making a virtue of necessity," said Mr. Canning.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the (Boston) American Manufacturer.

BEDOUIN,

A TALE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

The last rays of sun-set were streaming on the uppermost peaks of Ventoux, whose enormous shadow had already wrapped in premature obscurity the delightful villages, of its eastern valley. Among these, the rich and populous one of Bedouin lay silent and beautiful on its romantic site, over-looking the far-spread vale of Vaucluse. The hum of its many manufactories had passed away; the workshop and field had been abandoned, and the peasants had gathered together in small groups, to pass away the mild evening in familiar conversation or innocent hilarity. The earthquake which had shaken the strong places of the nation, had only rumbled in the distance,—the revolutionary storm had thundered and lightened around them, but had not yet found its way to the peaceful vallies of the Rhone. The industrious villagers had started up at the first dawning of Liberty, not in wrath, in madness or desperation, but in the firmness and dignity of men, worthy of the boon for which they contended. They had knelt at the shrine of Freedom, as the creatures of God should kneel, with pure hearts and weaponless hands, not as mad idolaters, with their oblation of human blood.

On the summit of an eminence that overlooked the village, two horsemen were seen in the twilight, pausing to survey the dim scenery below them. One was a tall, spare figure, in military costume, his thin locks of hair straggling around a pale and forbidding countenance. His companion was younger and slightly formed, with a look of boldness and intelligence.

"It must be done to-night," said the elder horseman; "these wealthy and aristocratic manufacturers must be humbled. Such are my directions from the Representatives of the sovereign people; plain, unequivocal directions, sir: and I shall take care to improve upon them."

"But how is the plan you propose, to be accomplished?" enquired the other.

"Nothing easier. Take a few of our brave fellows,—furnish them with the garments usually worn by the villagers, and at midnight—"

"Do you take me for a thief; a mean, dastardly assassin?" interrupted the other. "If, as you say, these men are criminal, let us go about their condemnation manfully. Where is the need of a midnight manoeuvre?"

"You must know, young man, that there must be some real and immediate, cause assigned for all my movements. Now these rich manufacturers are no better than aristocrats, every man of them, but so long as they keep themselves so completely disguised, by their skilful management and studied correctness; so long as they allow the tree of Liberty* to remain in their soil, as an object of reverence, notwithstanding our knowledge of their traitorous principles, we can have no tangible cause for cutting them off. Root up yonder tree, and fix the stigma of the unhallowed deed upon the hypocrites who planted it, and our purpose is gained."

"To say nothing of the hazard of such an enterprise, the chance of success would be extremely doubtful."

"Ha! it is cowardice, then," returned the other, bending on his companion a grim scowl of contempt, "Shame on you, De Mayville. A republican, entrusted with the commands of the sovereign people, and yet a coward!"

"Coward!" and the hot blood cast a deeper shading upon the dark features of De Mayville, as he repeated the opprobrious epithet, "Citizen Maignet, you shall answer for this."

The pale lip of the elder horseman quivered, and his voice shook with his curbed violence. "I can readily forgive this ebullition of passion," he said, "provided you prove yourself worthy of this condescension on my part. Let your conduct tonight manifest that I have been mistaken in your character. Are we friends, De Mayville?" and he extended his hand as he spoke.

There is something in that kindness which comes unlooked for, from the offender to the offended, which seldom fails of producing a reconciliation. The proud and passionate youth took the proffered hand of his companion.

"To-night, then!" said Maignet. "May I depend upon you for the execution of our project?"

"You may."

The parties separated. The younger urged his horse at full speed down the eminence, to a retired part of the village. He halted at a plain, unostentatious dwelling, half-hidden in the rich shrubbery which surrounded it. A young girl of unusual beauty met him at the door.

"You have been long absent, Lewis," she said, "we almost feared you had forgotten us. But you are ill—very," as the light of the apartment fell upon his features, yet agitated by the interview which we have just described.

"I am only fatigued with my hard day's ride," said the young soldier as he entered the apartment where Mons. Aubin, the father of his fair conductress was seated. After the usual congratulations were over, De Mayville remarked that Citizen Maignet would shortly visit the village in order to purify it from the pollution of aristocracy.

Both father and daughter shuddered at this information. De Mayville fancied he could read in the countenance of the beautiful Adelaide a look of sorrowful reproach—of mingled love and terror, which she had never before bestowed upon him.

"Citizen Maignet!" exclaimed the old man, "God and the holy virgin forbid. We are all republicans here—all friends to our country; but the spoiler has not reached us—our fair valley has not yet re-echoed with the groans of the dying and the curses of the murderer. I have long foreseen that such must be our portion, and already the flowers of Vaucluse are bruised by hostile paces and the majestic Rhone rolls by us with a deeper tinge upon its waters—the stain of human blood."

The young republican writhed. Citizen Maignet, he said, but obeyed the orders of the sovereign people.

"Boy!" said the old man, his dim eye lighting up with unusual energy, "You are deceived—deceived. The baleful infection has reached you—the moral pestilence which is scattered over this fair land from the hideous wings of a foul and bloody spirit,—that spirit which has usurped the place of Liberty, and turned our halls of Legislation into places of slaughter, and heaped with human victims the altars of the Most High God. Awake young man to your danger. The avenger of blood is mighty to accomplish his purpose, and wo to those on whom his displeasure shall fall."

"Excesses have been committed, I freely acknowledge," said De Mayville, "but in accomplishing the great work of the revolution—in overthrowing the gigantic power of religious and political tyranny, they were to be expected. The visit of Maignet at this place will only effect the wealthy and aristocratic—the true friend of liberty and equality will suffer nothing."

"Wealthy and aristocratic!" repeated the old man, "and this is the miserable cant by which you justify deeds of abhorrent cruelty! Go abroad among our industrious and enterprising villagers, and then talk of their wealth and aristocracy. If they are wealthy, it is the consequence of their own industry, and as for their aristocracy, they have sent their sons by hundreds to the dangerous frontiers to pour out their young blood in defence of liberty. Lewis! Lewis! You are dear to all of us—but lift your hand against our peaceful neighbour—light one dwelling with the brand of desolation—and we cast you off forever. This old arm—weakened and wasted as it is, would yet find strength to arrest your unhallowed progress."

"Father," exclaimed Adelaide bursting into tears, "do not speak so harshly. Lewis—dear Lewis, you were surely but jesting. You will not join those terrible men—you will not aid in the massacre of our friends."

Lewis De Mayville trembled. He was enthusiastically attached to the new doctrines of liberty and equality—but at this moment the better feelings of his nature triumphed over the delusions of a false but specious theory. He threw himself at the feet of the old man. "Whatever may have been my determination," he said, "respecting the designs of Citizen Maignet, I now abjure his authority."

"And may God and the holy Saints bless you for it my son," exclaimed the delighted old man; while the eyes of the beautiful Adelaide glistened with joy.

Ere Lewis could reply to the congratulations of parent and daughter, the recollections of his rash promise to Maignet flashed upon his mind.

"I must leave you," he said, starting on his feet, "Fear nothing—you shall never have reason to blush for the conduct of Lewis De Mayville."

He hurried from the cottage and throwing himself upon his horse, hastened to the lodgings of Maignet.

"Are you ready to undertake the enterprise?" demanded the stern republican.

"Citizen Maignet," replied the other, "since I parted with you I have had leisure for reflection. I must recall my rash obligation. I can not act the part of a base assassin."

The brow of Maignet darkened, "Boy!" he exclaimed, "I am not to be trifled with. Your promise has been solemnly given—fulfil it, or take the consequences of your falsehood."

"Boy, as I am, I am ready to meet them," returned De Mayville, the proud blood darkening his features. "I am willing to serve the sovereign people openly and firmly, but I can not stoop to the meanness of your proposal."

"Coward! Traitor!" cried the enraged republican, aiming a furious blow at De Mayville.

"Tyrant! assassin!" retorted the enraged youth, laying hold of his sheathed sabre. "Defend yourself or perish."

Maignet with all his ferocity of disposition was far from being a brave man. He called out lustily for assistance, which was promptly answered by some sans culottes in an adjacent room. De Mayville was seized, disarmed, and placed in close confinement.

The morning presented a dismal spectacle to the inhabitants of Bedouin. The tree of liberty which all with one accord had assisted in rearing, had been torn up during the night, and its branches scattered through all the streets of the village. Consternation was depicted on every countenance.

It was well known that an outrage of this nature, would not fail to call down alike upon the innocent and guilty the vengeance of the revolutionary troops, who were stationed near them. Every exertion was made to discover the real offenders, but to no purpose. The secret rested with Maignet and a few of his chosen myrmidons.

The day passed on, in inquietude and horror. The setting sun flashed on the republican banner of Maignet and on the polished weapons of his soldiery. Their victims had already been selected, and their first act of vengeance consigned nearly half the industrious villagers to imprisonment, and among others the old and universally beloved citizen, at whose expostulations De Mayville had renounced the society and authority of Maignet.

The next morning a mock trial was instituted by the Revolutionary authorities. A hurried examination followed, the result of which, delivered over to the hands of the executioner the wealth and respectability of the village. The guillotine rose up, like the work of magic among the peaceful bowers of Vaucluse. The beardless youth and the grey-haired old man were alike dragged to the fatal plank.

It was a beautiful morning that summoned the young and chivalrous De Mayville to prepare himself for death. The revolutionary guards conducted him from the prison through the deserted streets of Bedouin. The flourishing manufactories, the neat and clustering cottages, lay blackening in ashes. Instinctively De Mayville looked in the direction of the cottage of his Adelaide.

* It was customary at the commencement of the French Revolution to plant a small tree in every village for the same reason that liberty poles were formerly erected in this country. Any outrage offered to the tree of liberty was sure to be followed by a bloody retribution.

A cold, black heap of ruins alone marked the spot.

All then was lost, and the awful sense of desolation fell like a leaden hand upon his heart. Why should he seek to live? What had the world to offer him in exchange for those on whom his lonely spirit had leaned? Why should he not go cheerfully to the scaffold? He strode onward with a hurried but firm pace. He ascended the black scaffold and paused to give his farewell look to the scenes of his childhood. Ventoux rose awfully before him, girdled with white mists and flashing with waterfalls. The great Rhone rolled onward to the Ocean, sheeted with sunshine. The vale of Vauluse—the classic haunt of Petrarch lay before him in all its unequalled beauty. It seemed that some new and peculiar beauty rested upon the delightful scenery around him, as if to aggravate the horrors of the parting moment. But De Mayville felt it not,—the world to him had become a desert, and he turned to his executioner, as to a friend that was to release him from the evils of mortality.

A dreadful shriek was heard. A female form rushed up the scaffold and threw her arms around the unfortunate victim. It was Adelaide.

"Would to God I had been spared this," exclaimed De Mayville, "Oh Adelaide, forget your wretched lover. Leave this dreadful spot and live to comfort your afflicted father." "My father!" shrieked the unfortunate girl, and she looked at the fiend-like executioner and his terrible apparatus, with a convulsive shudder. Lewis understood her, and he groaned in the agony of his heart, at the thought of her utter desolation.

The rude hand of the impatient headsman parted the lovers. Adelaide cast one look upon her betrothed—uttered one shriek of agony, and was dragged away insensible by the rude and unfeeling soldiery.

Lewis bent himself to the block; there was a moment of fearful preparation, and then the noise of the descending guillotine mingled with the savage shouts of the multitude. The young and gallant De Mayville was a headless and ghastly corpse.

And where was Adelaide—the young and beautiful flower of Vauluse! Ask the peasant, who survived those days of trial, and he will tell the sad tale of her departure. He will speak of the wild, young maniac, wandering among the hills, and weeping all night over the grave of her lover, and how she pined away and died—alone, with nought but the cold stars watching over her, and was buried at last by the heart-stricken villagers, at the side of the unfortunate Lewis De Mayville.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Foreign Quarterly Review.

SCHINDERHANNES, THE GERMAN ROBBER.

At the commencement of the French Revolution, and for some time after, the two banks of the Rhine were the theatre of continual wars. Commerce was interrupted, industry destroyed, the fields ravaged, and the barns and cottages plundered; farmers and merchants became bankrupts, and journeymen and labourers thieves. Robbery was the only mechanical art which was worth pursuing, and the only exercises followed were assault and battery. These enterprises were carried on at first by individuals trading on their own capital of skill and courage; but when the French laws came into more active operation in the seat of their exploits, the desperadoes formed themselves, for mutual protection, into copartnerships, which were the terror of the country. Men soon arose among them whose talents, or prowess, attracted the confidence of their comrades, and chiefs were elected, and laws and institutions established. Different places of settlement were chosen by different societies; the famous Pickard carried his band into Belgium and Holland; while on the confines of Germany, where the wild provinces of Kirm, Simmerm, and Birkenfeld offered a congenial field, the banditti were concentrated, whose last and most celebrated chief, the redoubted Schinderhannes, is the subject of this brief notice.

His predecessors, indeed, Finck, Peter the Black, Zughetto, and Seibert were long before renowned among those who square their conduct by the good old rule of clubs; they were brave men, and stout and pitiless robbers. But Schinderhannes, the boldest of the bold, young, active and subtle, converted the obscure exploits of banditti into the comparatively magnificent ravages of "the outlaw and his men;" and sometimes marched at the head of sixty or eighty of his troop to the attack of whole villages. Devoted to pleasure, no fear ever crossed him in its pursuit; he walked publicly with his mistress, a beautiful girl of nineteen, in the very place which the evening before had been the scene of one of his criminal exploits; he frequented the fairs and taverns, which were crowded with his victims; and such was the terror he had inspired, that these audacious exposures were made with perfect impunity. Free, generous, handsome, and jovial, it may even be conceived that sometime he gained the protection from love which could not have been extorted by force.

It is scarcely a wonder that with the admirable regulations of the robber, they should have succeeded even to so great an extent as they did in that unsettled country. Not more than two or three of them were allowed to reside in the same town or village; they were scattered over the whole face of the district, and apparently connected with each other only by some secret mystery of their craft. When a blow was to be struck, a messenger was sent round by the chief to warn his followers; and at the mustering place the united band rose up, like the clan of Roderick Dhu from the heather, to disappear as suddenly again in darkness when the object was accomplished. Their clothing, names and nations were changed perpetually; a Jew broker at Cologne would figure some days after at Aix-la-Chapelle or Spa as a German baron, or a Dutch merchant, keeping open table, and playing a high game; and the next week he might be met with in a forest at the head of his troop. Young and beautiful women were always in their suite, who, particularly in the task of obtaining or falsifying passports, did more by their address than their lovers could have effected by their courage. Spies, principally Jews, were employed throughout the whole country, to give notice where a booty might be obtained. Spring and autumn were the principal seasons of their harvest; in winter the roads were almost impassable, and in summer the days were too long; the light of the moon, in particular, was always avoided, and so were the betraying foot-prints in the snow. They seldom marched in a body to the place of attack, but went thither two or three in a party, some on foot, some on horseback, and some even in carriages. As soon as they had entered a village, their first care was to muffle the church-bell, so as to prevent an alarm being rung; or to commence a heavy fire, to give the inhabitants an exaggerated idea of their numbers, and impress them with the feeling that it would be more prudent to stay at home than to venture out into the fray.

John Buckler, alias Schinderhannes, the worthy whose youthful arm wielded with such force a power constituted in this manner, was the son of a currier, and born at Muhlen, near Nastooten, on the right bank of the Rhine. The family intended to emigrate to Poland, but on the way the father entered the Imperial service at Olmutz, in Moravia. He deserted, and his wife and child followed him to the frontiers of Prussia, and subsequently the travellers took up their abode again in the environs of the Rhine.

At the age of fifteen, Schinderhannes commenced his career of crime by spending a louis, with which he had been entrusted, in a tavern. Afraid to return home, he wandered about the fields till hunger compelled him to steal a horse, which he sold. Sheep stealing was his next vocation, but in this he was caught and transferred to prison. He made his escape, however, the first night, and returned in a very business-like manner to receive two crowns which were due to him on account of the sheep he had stolen. After being associated with the band as their chief, he went to buy a piece of linen, but thinking, from the situation of the premises, that it might be obtained without any exchange of coin on his part, he returned the same evening, and stealing a ladder in the neighbourhood, placed it at a window of the warehouse, and got in. A man was writing in the interior, but the robber looked at him steadily, and shouldering his booty, withdrew. He was taken a second time, but escaped as before on the same night.

His third escape was from a dark and damp vault in the prison of Schneppenbach, where, having succeeded in penetrating to the kitchen, he tore an iron bar from the window by main force, and leaped out at hazard. He broke his leg in the fall, but finding a stick, managed to drag himself along, in the course of three nights, to Birkenmuhl, without a morsel of food, but on the contrary, having left some ounces of skin and flesh of his own on the road.

Marianne Schoeffer was the first avowed mistress of Schinderhannes. She was a young girl of fourteen, of ravishing beauty, and always "se mettait avec une elegance extreme." Blacken Klos, one of the band, an unsuccessful suitor of the lady, one day, after meeting with a repulse, out of revenge carried off her clothes. When the outrage was communicated to Schinderhannes, he followed the ruffian to a cave where he had concealed himself, and slew him. It was Julia Blaesius, however, who became the permanent companion of the young chief. The account given by her of the manner in which she was united to the destiny of the robber is altogether improbable. A person came to her, she said, and mentioned that somebody wished to speak to her in the forest of Delbach; she kept the assignation, and found there a handsome young man who told her that she must follow him—an invitation which she was obliged at length by threats to accede to. It appears sufficiently evident, however, that the personal attractions of Schinderhannes, who was then not twenty-two, had been sufficient of themselves to tempt poor Julia to her fate, and that of her own accord.

"She fled to the forest to hear a love tale."

It may be, indeed, as she affirmed, that she was at first ignorant of the profession of her mysterious lover, who might address her somewhat in the words of the Scottish free-booter—

"A lightome eye, a soldier's mien—
A bonnet of the blue,
A doublet of the Lincoln green,
'Twas all of me you knew."

But it is known that afterwards she even accompanied him personally in some of his adventures, dressed in men's clothes.

The robberies of this noted chief became more audacious and extensive every day, and at last he established a kind of "black mail" among the Jews, at their own request. Accompanied one day by only two of his comrades, he did not hesitate to attack a cavalcade of forty-five Jews and five Christian peasants. The booty taken was only two bundles of tobacco, the robbers returning some provisions on a remonstrance from one of the Jews, who pleaded poverty. Schinderhannes then ordered them to take off their shoes and stockings, which he threw into a heap, leaving to every one the care of finding his own property. The affray that ensued was tremendous; the forty-five Jews who had patiently allowed themselves to be robbed by three men, fought furiously with each other about their old shoes; and the robber, in contempt of their cowardice, gave his carbine to one of them to hold while he looked on.

His daring career at length drew to a close, and he and his companions were arrested by the French authorities, and brought to trial. The chief, with nineteen others, were condemned to death in November, 1803, and Julia Blaesius to two years' imprisonment. The former met his fate with characteristic intrepidity, occupied to the last moment with his cares about Julia and his father.

ROB ROY.

The following, from the new edition of the Waverley Novels, by Sir Walter Scott, is illustrative of the scene in Donald Bean Lean's cave, when Waverley made his first visit to the Highlands:—

An adventure very similar to what is here stated, actually befel the late Mr. Abercrombie, of Tullibody, grandfather of the present Lord Abercrombie, and father of the late celebrated Sir Ralph. When this gentleman, who lived to a very advanced period of life, first settled in Stirlingshire, his cattle were repeatedly driven off by the celebrated Rob Roy, or some of his gang; and at length he was obliged, after obtaining a proper safe-conduct, to make the cateran such a visit as that of Waverly to Bean Lean, in the text. Roy received him with much courtesy, and made many apologies for the accident, which must have happened, he said, through some mistake. Mr. Abercrombie was regaled with collops from two of his own cattle, which were hung up by the heels in the cavern, and was dismissed in perfect safety, after having agreed to pay in future a small sum of black mail, in consideration of which, Rob Roy not only undertook to forbear his herds in future, but to replace any that should be stole from him by other freebooters. Mr. Abercrombie said Rob Roy affected to consider him as a friend to the Jacobite interest, and a sincere enemy to the Union. Neither of these circumstances were true; but the laird thought it quite unnecessary to undeceive his highland host, at the risk of bringing on a political dispute in such a situation. This anecdote I received many years since (about 1792,) from the mouth of the venerable gentleman who was concerned in it.

YOUNG NAPOLEON.

This poor boy, whose destiny has suffered so remarkable a change, appears to have been a child of great promise, both for intelligence and goodness of heart. The anecdotes concerning him are of the most pleasing kind. From the time that he knew how to speak, he became, like most children, a great questioner. He loved, above every thing, to watch the people walking in the garden and in the court of the Tuileries, over which his windows looked. There was always a crowd of people assembled there to see him. Having remarked that many of the persons who entered the place, had rolls of paper under their arms, he desired to know of his gouvernante what that meant. He was told that they were unfortunate people, who came to ask some favour of his papa. From this moment he shouted and wept whenever he saw a petition pass, and was not to be satisfied till it was brought to him; and he never failed to present himself, every day at breakfast, all those which he had collected in the course of the day before. It may be easily supposed, that when this practice was known to the publick, the child was never at a loss for petitions.

He saw one day under his windows a woman in mourning, who held by the hand a little boy about four years old, also in mourning. This little fellow had in his hand a petition which he held up from a distance to the young prince. The boy would know why this poor, little one was clothed all in black. His governess answered that it was, no doubt, because his papa was dead. He manifested a strong desire to talk with the child. Madame Montesquieu, who seized every occasion of developing his sensibility, consented, and gave an order that he should be brought in with his mother. She was a widow whose husband had been killed in the last campaign, and finding herself without resources, had petitioned the emperor for a pension. The young Napoleon took the petition and promised to deliver it to his papa. The next morning he made up his ordinary pocket of petitions, but the one in which he took a particular interest he kept separate, and after putting the mass into the hands of the emperor according to custom; "Papa," said he, "here is the petition of a very unfortunate little boy; you are the cause of his father's dying, and now he has nothing. Give him a pension, I beg." Napoleon took up his son and embraced him tenderly, gave him the pension, which he antedated, and caused the patent to be made out in the course of the day.

From Barton's Account of China.

CHINESE DRAMA.

China is full of strolling players, who carry all the baggage and decorations of the company in a cart. When a wealthy individual chooses to entertain his friends in this way, the theatre is made in the twinkling of an eye, in a corner of the banquet-room. Even in the capitol there is no established theatre. The inhabitants of any district who wish to enjoy a dramatick representation, join together to erect one. It is merely a sort of barn, built of bamboo hurdles, shut in on three sides, and covered with mats. The audience are in the open air, on the side where the opening is left. The galleries for the ladies so that they can see without being seen. They have no actresses; the female parts are performed by beardless young men. Economy characterizes them in the drama as in all other things. A company seldom exceeds seven or eight in number; the same actor plays two or three parts, changing his dress, and specifying the name and subject of his part each time.

As in the Greek theatre were brought forward chorusses of wasps and birds, so the Chinese frequently introduce the figures of animals, and even of the inanimate productions of the earth and sea. These animals, trees, and fishes speak and hold long dialogues together. The scenery remains the same throughout the performance, which is no bar to the supposition of the frequent changes of scene. If a general is ordered on distant service he mounts a stick, and goes twice or thrice round the stage, singing and cracking his whip, after which he stops at the supposed end of his journey. To represent a town taken by assault, instead of walls, a line of soldiers is ranged along the middle of the stage, to characterize a rampart which the assailants must surmount.

They have a favourite pantomime called "The Marriage of the Sea with the Land." The land divinity makes a display of various productions, such as dragons, elephants, tigers, eagles, ostriches, chesnut and pine trees, &c. The ocean on the other hand, collects whales, dolphins, porpoises and other sea monsters, together with ships, rocks, shells, corals and sponges; all these objects are represented by performers concealed under cloths, who play their parts admirably. The terrestrial and marine productions make the tour of the stage, and then open right and left, to leave room for an immense whale, which places itself directly before the emperor, and spouts out several hogshhead of water. When the English saw this play at the Court Theatre, the spectators in the pit were perfectly inundated by the whale; but the water soon drained off through holes in the boards; and the trick was loudly applauded by the audience.

A KERRY CREDITOR.

In Crofton Croker's Legends of Killarney we read the following story, illustrative of the relation between debtor and creditor:

Murtogh Mac Mahon's mansion was named Cloonina, and though now it is, with its grass covered avenue, the very abstract of desolation and solitude, yet it once was the scene of unrestrained hospitality and mirth. Mac Mahon had a good stud of horses, a noble pack of hounds, and an excellent wine cellar. His deer park was on a hill opposite to the house; and here the gentry of Clare frequently (to express it poetically)

"came
The joys of Murtogh's hall to find,
And chase with him the dark brown game
That bound o'er Callan's hills of wind."

An itinerant pedlar, either a Swiss or an Italian—by name, as it is traditionally pronounced, John Operrow, one morning went to the house of Cloonina, and displayed his wares, ribands, shawls, knives, and scissors. Murtogh Mac Mahon saw the display, and it found favour in his sight, for he bought, or at least declared himself the purchaser of the whole stock in trade of the wandering merchant. It was Christmas time, and this stock was in less than half an hour distributed without much difficulty, among the pretty girls in the neighbourhood; but what was the amount named for the purchase money never transpired, neither, indeed, is it now of any great consequence that it ever should. Murtogh Mac Mahon, who, was going out to hunt, desired the pedlar to wait until "John White," his steward, should return from Kilrush, in the evening when it should be paid. He then gave orders that Operrow should be well treated in the servants' hall, mounted his horse, and rode off to his sport. It so happened that John White did not return that day, or even the next; and Operrow, who found himself in excellent quarters, was, to use the local phrase, "by no manner of means" over anxious for his arrival. Neither when John White did return was he at all pressing for the payment of his demand; and as Murtogh Mac Mahon was "by no manner of means" pressing on his side of the matter (which is proved by his never having made the most remote allusion to the subject, from the day of the purchase to the day of his death,) John Operrow remained unpaid, the inmate of the house of Cloonina, upwards of fifty years.

SOUTH AMERICAN BANDITTI.

The vicinity of Lima is occasionally infested by banditti, carrying on their operations in open day with so much system, that all who chance to travel at that time are sure to be relieved of their valuables. These robbers are composed chiefly of free mulattoes and others of a mixed race. The evil has existed from time immemorial, and is of purely Spanish origin; for Indian honesty, in retired villages, is so great, that when a family for a time leaves its cage-like hut, the latchless wicket is left ajar; a brush is placed on the sill, and it would be worse than sacrilege for any one to cross the threshold under any pretence. It has happened that the brigands, well armed and well mounted, have assembled at distant and uncertain periods within a mile of Callao. They direct their course towards Lima, stop all whom they meet, and having very civilly lightened them of their purses, oblige the plundered persons to accompany the robbers, till all arrive near to the city gate, when the banditti disperse. Some ride boldly into the town; many conceal themselves in thickets of canes; whilst others cut across the country, and return quietly to their homes, to enjoy the spoil, or follow their usual occupations. The banditti, on such extraordinary occasions, amount to twenty or thirty in number; and it has happened that they have had about twenty carriages, besides persons dismounted and made to lead their own horses, in the train, which was regularly brought up by a rear-guard, while the advanced scouts pushed on to secure fresh booty. They seldom commit murder; and whenever it is possible, they avoid robbing officers of the army or civilians in the employment of government. Neither do they, when acting in small parties, attack persons of note. Foreigners and strangers are in general their usual victims.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

☞ We acknowledge the receipt of the Rev. Mr. Dean's Discourse, and Mr. Capen's Address, delivered at Dedham, Mass., June 24, 1829. We have not yet had time to peruse them entirely; but from a hasty sketch we have formed the most favourable opinion of them. We shall commence their publication, or furnish some extracts, in our next.

☞ We have received the two first numbers of a new little hebdomadal, entitled THE FRIEND, and published by Jewett and Porter, at St. Johnsbury, Vermont. The object of the paper is to correct misrepresentation and spread correct information, relative to anti-masonry. The contents are candidly and temperately written, and must, we think, have a salutary influence with well disposed men. The price is twenty-five cents for twenty five numbers; and four copies being printed on one sheet, may be received for the same postage as one copy.

☞ We have received from Boston a few numbers of The Mercury, a new miscellaneous paper, conducted, it is said, by Mr. KIRKELL, editor of "Specimens of American Poetry." The original matter is written in a spirited and independent style, and the selections are well made. The paper and the typography are beautiful.

☞ The Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences, edited by Dr. DRAKE, and published at Cincinnati, Ohio, has been converted into a quarterly publication, and will hereafter be published in numbers of 150 pages each, on the first days of January, April, July and October. It is devoted to "original communications, reviews, and a copious summary of discoveries, illustrated with occasional engravings." The price is three dollars paid within the year, or four after its expiration.

MAELZEL'S EXHIBITION. It will be seen, on reference to an advertisement in a subsequent column, that the exhibition of Mr. Maelzel's celebrated mechanical curiosities will commence at Knickerbacker Hall on the evening of Tuesday next. We desire to call the particular attention of the public to this rare display of genius; which, from the many accounts we have read of it, and from the praise universally bestowed upon it, we think offers our citizens a treat of unequalled excellence. The clergy and ladies say it is an "assemblage of wonders," composed of objects wholly unexceptionable, and eminently calculated to instruct, as well as delight the spectator; and from such authority, in such matters, we are not disposed to appeal. The collection consists of a number of beautiful Automaton Rope Dancers, Speaking Figures an amusing Bass Fiddler, and a perfect fac-simile of the Evacuation and Conflagration of Moscow. The Androides are so well formed, and so easy and graceful in their movements, that when viewed at a short distance it is said they are sometimes supposed by strangers to be real children. In the representation of the Evacuation and Conflagration of Moscow the arts of Design, Mechanism and Musick are so exquisitely combined as to produce a perfect imitation of the natural scene. But we cannot dwell on the subject. The following extract from O'Meara, descriptive of the conflagration, and of the disappointment and feelings of Napoleon, in consequence, will, we think, prove interesting to our readers.

"The wretches that had been hired by Rostopchin," said Napoleon, "ran about in every quarter, disseminating fire with their matches, in which they were but too much assisted by the wind. This terrible conflagration ruined every thing. I was prepared, for every thing but this. It was unforeseen, for who would have thought that a nation would have set its capital on fire? The inhabitants themselves, however, did all they could to extinguish it, and several of them perished in their endeavours. They also brought before us numbers of the incendiaries with their matches, as amidst such a popolazzo we never could have discovered them ourselves. I caused about two hundred of these wretches to be shot. Had it not been for this fatal fire, I had every thing my army wanted; excellent winter quarters; stores of all kinds were in plenty; and the next year would have decided it. Alexander would have made peace, or I would have been in Petersburg. I asked if he thought that he could entirely subdue Russia. 'No,' replied Napoleon; but I would have caused Russia to make such a peace as suited the interests of France. I was five days too late in quitting Moscow. Several of the generals," continued he, "were burnt out of their beds. I myself remained in the Kremlin until surrounded with flames. The fire advanced, seized the Chinese and Indian warehouses, and several stores of oil and spirits, which burst forth in flames and overwhelmed every thing. I then retired to a country house of the Emperor Alexander's, distant about a league from Moscow, and you may figure to yourself the intensity of the fire, when I tell you, that you could scarcely bear your hands upon the walls or the windows on the side next to Moscow, in consequence of their heated state. It was the spectacle of a sea and billows of fire, a sky and clouds of flame; mountains of red rolling flames, like immense waves of the sea, alternately bursting forth and elevating themselves to skies of fire, and then sinking into the ocean of flames below."

The second Vermont antimasonick "state convention" as it is nick-named by its parents, will prove to be as great a bore as any of its predecessors. The Vermont papers state that a great portion of the delegates were chosen without their consent, and contrary to their wishes. A number of influential names have been added to the list of delegates for political effect abroad! when it was known to the authors of the measure that the individuals whom they thus insulted were opposed to their designs. A Judge Luce is to be their candidate for governor. He is said, by his friends, to be a disciple of Tom Paine and Voltaire; and opposes masonry, as Paine opposed it, because it aids the cause of religion! What consistency! Solomon is an anti because "religion is in danger."

The judgment of the court in the case of Mrs. Royall, is—"that she be fined ten dollars and costs, give security in the sum of 250 dollars for her good behaviour for one year, and stand committed until paid."

The Ulster anti-masonick editor talks of sending some of his "everlasting" travellers to the legislature next winter. We shall take lodgings for them in the menagerie.

A correspondent to the Boston Free Press says he is a clam digger. He had better stick to his trade.

The Buffalo Republican says "it is believed that the anti-masons will, next December, form a new combination, such as an Anti-political-anti-masonry-when-none-of-your-candidates-can-be-elected-society." If the anti's do not form such a society for themselves, the people undoubtedly will do it for them.

LITERARY SUMMARY. From the last "List of New Publications," received from Mr. Willmer, of Liverpool, we extract the following titles from the list of works in the London press: Adventures of a King's Page, by the author of Almack's Revisited; Barrington's Historick Anecdotes; Boswell's Life of Johnson, edited by the Right Hon. J. W. Crocker, 5 vols. 8vo.; Book of the Boudoir, by Lady Morgan; Devereux, a Novel, by the Author of Pelham; (Taking for Granted, a Novel, by Mrs. Edgeworth's; Forest Scenes in the Wilds of North America; Hood's Comic Melodies, with Musick; A New Forest, a Novel, by the Author of Zillah.

From the Boston Bulletin.

MEXICO. By the next arrivals from the hither coast of South America, we may expect to hear some news of interest relating to the manner in which the Spanish troops from Havana are received by the people of Mexico. We are much mistaken, if the flattering promises held out by the king of Spain, through the proclamations of his officers, will be taken for more than their worth—the perfidy of that monarchy is almost proverbial; and the Mexicans are as fully aware of this fact as are many other nations of the southern continent. It is the common cant of all the invading generals, bent upon the re-conquest of revolting provinces, to preach forgiveness of injuries, oblivion of the past, and protection for the future. But when did Spain, or any other despotic nation, after having quelled what they are usually pleased to term rebellion, pursue a magnanimous course, and act with good faith towards the vanquished? In the case of the Mexicans, it will be perceived, as we think, that they will be extremely jealous of those fair assurances of their invaders, and particularly backward in offering their necks to the ancient yoke of foreign domination. They will remember the declaration in 1813, that "it is derogatory to the majesty and dignity of the Spanish nation to confirm a treaty (or a promise) made with malignant insurgents!"

A private letter from Havana, communicated to the New-York Daily Advertiser a few days since, gives the following interesting view of the relations between Spain and Mexico:—

"It has long been a darling hope of Ferdinand, that the time would yet come, when he should regain his lost colonies of New Spain, although some of his counsellors and the intelligent men of his country have for a time doubted it. When, therefore, one of the most accomplished courtiers of the Spanish realm, had the temerity to propose an expedition so decidedly consonant with the wishes of H. M., you may be sure the thing was immediately authorized, though in opposition not only to the opinions of most of the influential men about him, but particularly obnoxious to those of this island. Our Governor and Intendant both, very wisely disapproved of it. However, General Barradas, the commander of the forces, has gained his object, and with the Royal mandate in his pocket, all our authorities must submit to him. The preceding, then, by inference, proves to me, that no measures have previously been concerted of winning the Mexicans from their allegiance to their Republic, but money, or offers of power; and the hope, therefore, which Barradas may entertain of success, can not be based, but upon the effect his lenient proclamation may have upon their minds, aided by conciliatory force, at a time when he supposes the sons of New Spain sick of the experiment they have had of Republicanism, and disposed to any change which may give, or promise them security of property, and order in Government; the former held by a very slight tenure now, the latter unknown."

Without even being aware of the situation of the affairs in the country now about to become the theatre of war, I should have prognosticated ruin to the enemy about to cause it; but when I learn that the "young Napoleon" of Mexico (Santa Anna, as called by the soldiers) is well prepared to receive them, my convictions become the stronger. This republican General, and bosom friend of the President, it appears, was, 14 or 15 days ago, at the head of 8000 effective men, in the province of Xalapa. Beloved by the soldiers for the care he takes of them, and the regularity of his pay, from money levied on the Conductas, or Muleteers, as they pass from Mexico—say a certain per centage—he is adored among the military, and equally so by the citizens, for the mildness with which he rules it over them, and the few demands he makes upon their money bags. Indeed I am informed by a person recently from thence, that the wish both among foreigners, and the natives near where he is stationed, is, that their favourite military Hero should become Emperor. They both desire it, to procure quietness to the country, but more especially the former, as knowing the abilities of Santa Anna to be good, and his attachment to foreigners very great. He is a native of Mexico, and as you may surmise from his y'clept name, considered very brave.

I have not time now to detail many of the considerations which occur to me, touching Spain and Mexico, but, before I close, must observe, that at a season when the demands upon our Treasury funds, which are supplied only by Custom House revenue, should be the greatest, the appearance of things, on the contrary, wear the most threatening aspect. That is to say, it is reasonable to infer, from the recent occurrences, with our "Mercaderes," or Dry Goods purchasers, that the importation, for some time to come, must be greatly reduced. This body of men, have, en masse, appeared before their creditors, and demanded an extension of credit on their notes, amounting to about $3,500,000, given by them, in payment for goods. The consequence is, a great deal of anxiety pervades all the mercantile body—"juntas," or meetings at respectable counting houses, occur daily, and a general gloom seems for the present, to reign over things, to a degree not to be speedily removed. The insecurity, then, of sales, will, assuredly, reduce the introduction of goods, and our revenue, consequently, taxed with the heavy charges of the Mexicans scheme, be unable to fulfil its engagements."

We find in a late Troy Sentinel the following extraordinary story:

SPECIE. A Mr. Hand died a short time since at a great age, in Stephentown, in this county. He possessed a good farm, had always been known as a careful, saving man, and was supposed to have left at his death a snug little estate. He left a will, however, and upon opening that, it was discovered that his farm was but a small item of his property. In the house in which he had dwelt for a great many years, there was one room which he had never permitted any to enter but himself; it was on the ground floor, and in his will he gave directions to go into that room, open a trap door, and thereunder, in small tubs and kegs, and other vessels, would be found a treasure of specie. The investigation being made, the money was indeed found, to the amount of about $40,000, in dollars, half dollars, quarters, crowns, &c.

There was another clause in the will which stated that in one of the vessels mentioned, was a phial containing a written scroll, giving information where another and still larger deposit of specie had been made; but alas! the treacherous ink had disappeared, deserted its post, or rather abandoned its lines, and the paper told not a word of the precious secret with which it had been charged. What vigils will covetousness keep till this other deposit is found—what digging, and searching there will be till this Kidd's money shall be forth coming.

There is no room to doubt the truth of this story, as we are told by several of our citizens, some of whom are personally cognizant of the fact.

MAELZEL'S EXHIBITION. The citizens of Albany and vicinity and the public generally, are respectfully informed, that the necessary arrangements will be completed on the evening of Tuesday, August 11, and Knickerbacker Hall will be then open for their reception. The Exhibition will be as follows: The performances of the little Bass Fiddler; the celebrated and Original Speaking Figures, which, in the hands of the spectators, and on the rope, will distinctly articulate a few words; the beautiful AUTOMATON ROPE DANCERS—the surprising and graceful feats of these figures have obtained the highest celebrity, and have received the warmest encomiums of the spectators. After which, the Evacuation and Conflagration of Moscow, consisting of two parts, viz. the city of Moscow, represented by Moonlight, as on the evening previous to the Conflagration—the guns are heard in the suburbs, announcing the approach of the invading army—the alarm bells are heard in every quarter—the inhabitants abandon the city, &c. This scene has never yet been exhibited in America, and is now first introduced in Albany. The whole to conclude with the "CONFLAGRATION" of Moscow. Particulars of this sublime spectacle in the bills, &c. Performance on every evening (Sundays excepted) precisely 1-4 past 8. Admittance, 50 cents, children half price. Tickets to be had at Knickerbacker Hall, American Hotel, Eagle Tavern, State Street House, Bome's Recess, Cruttencker's Hotel, Mrs. Rockwell's Mansion House, and at the bookstores of Messrs. W. C. Little, and O. Steele.

A SKETCH.

I saw a youth—on his fair brow no cloud
Of anguish or of discontent appeared,
But all was fresh and glowing life and health
Delightful. Laughing joy appeared to reign
And riot in his bosom: Southern suns
Had o'er his birth presided, and infused
Into his bosom, and through all his frame,
An ardent temperament, and feelings warm.

A letter came—with eager haste he seized
And gazed upon it—'t was in his father's hand—
A black seal closed the fearful sheet, and looked Like the foreboding messenger of death.
The warm life blood forsook the youth's fair cheek,
And o'er his face expressive mantled fast
A deadly paleness. Sick at heart he felt,
And o'er his nerves crept feelings undefined,
But sinister, betokening sure some dire event.
Trembling with wild anxiety, he broke
The fatal seal—when met his seeking eye,
Glancing with glow intense along the lines,
The sad intelligence of his mother's death.
He read not to the end—the letter dropped—
"My mother, Oh! my mother!" he exclaimed,
"Dead! no, no, it cannot, must not be—
It is not so—a week—'t is but a week,
I parted from her well—yes, she was well,
And now a corpse!—good heavens! can it be!
Oh! my poor mother, little did I think
At that kind parting, scarce a week ago,
That I should never more behold her face.
She cast her arms around me, called me her boy,
Her darling boy—prayed God to bless, preserve
And prosper me—and then she said, that we Should shortly meet again—and smiled through tears,
And O! my mother, little did I think
And will my mother never smile again?
Oh! do not leave me—do not yet desert
Your Edward—stay—I cannot, will not live
Without you—'t is too much—mother, come back,
And pity me.

But she is gone," he said,
After a moment's pause, "and never more
Will she return. Where, mother, shall I find Another such as thou hast been to me?
So kind—so tender—she would not even let
The winds of heaven too roughly visit me.
Yes, she was too kind—how oft I've pained
Her gentle bosom by my wantonness;
Yet her reproof was always mild, and soon
She'd pardon me. Oh! curses on my head,
That I should e'er offend her."

Thus went he on—his tones were thrilling wild,
Reaching the inmost sympathies, and the soul
Were hard indeed, that were not touched and grieved
By grief so frenzied. All around were mute,
Save one. A man of God stood near, and strove
Into his bosom, sorrow-tost, to pour
The balm of consolation. All in vain—
His was a grief that mocked at sympathy—
And when the venerable man of patience spoke,
Of trust reposing in the king of heaven,
His words unheeded were; and still he raved,
And cried convulsed, till nature overpowered,
He sunk exhausted in forgetfulness.

DOMESTICK HAPPINESS.

BY FITZ GREEN HALLUCK.

—the only bliss
Of Paradise that has survived the fall.
"Beside the nuptial curtain bright"
The bard of Eden sings,
"Young love his constant lamp will light
And wave his purple wings."
But rain drops from the clouds of care
May bid that lamp be dim,
And the boy Love will part and swear
'Tis then no place for him.

Copyr.

So mused the lovely Mrs. Dash;
'T is wrong to mention names;
When for her surly husband's cash
She urged in vain her claims.
"I want a little money, dear,
For Vandervoort and Flandin,
Their bill, which now has run a year,
To-morrow mean to hand in."
"More?" cried the husband, half asleep,
"You'll drive me to despair;"
The lady was too proud to weep,
And too polite to swear.
She bit her lip for very spite,
He felt a storm was brewing,
And dreamed of nothing else all night
But brokers, banks, and ruin.
He thought her pretty once, but dreams
Have sure a wondrous power,
For to his eye the lady seems
Quite altered since that hour—
And Love, who on their bridal eve,
Had promised long to stay,
Forgot his promise—took French leave—
And bore his lamp away.

WHAT OUR FATHERS BELIEVED.

A WAR SONG OF THE REVOLUTION.

BY JOHN NEAL.

Men of the North! look up!
There's a tumult in your sky;
A troubled glory surging out;
Great shadows hurrying by:
Your strength—where is it now?
Your quivers—are they spent?
Your arrows in the rust of death,
Your fathers' bows unbent?
Men of the North! Awake!
Ye're called to from the deep;
Trumpets in every breeze—
Yet there ye lie asleep:
A stir in every tree;
A shout from every wave;
A challenging on every side;
A moan from every grave:
A battle in the sky;
Ships thundering through the air—
Jehovah on the march—
Men of the North, to prayer;
Now, now—in all your strength;
There's that before your way,
Above, about you, and below,
Like armies in array:
Lift up your eyes and see
No changes overhead;
Now hold your breath! and hear
The mustering of the dead.
See how the midnight air
With bright commotion burns,
Thronging with giant shape,
Banner and spear by turns—
The sea-fog driving in,
Solemnly and swift;
The Moon afraid—stars dropping out—
The very skies adrift:
The Everlasting God
Our Father—Lord of Love—
With cherubim and seraphim
All gathering above—
Their stormy plumage lighted up
As forth to war they go,
The shadow of the Universe.
Upon our haughty foe.

MINSTREL BALLAD.

Sung under the Castle Windows of a Chivalrous Party.

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
On the mountain dawns the day;
All the jolly chase is here,
With hawk and horse, and hunting spear:
Hounds are in their couples yelling,
Hawks are whistling, horns are knelling,
Merrily, merrily, mingle they,
"Waken lords and ladies gay."

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
The mist has left the mountains gray;
Springlets in the daws are streaming,
Diamonds on the brake are gleaming,

And foresters have busy been,
To track the buck in the thicket green;
Now we come to chaunt our lay,
"Waken, lords and ladies gay."

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
To the green-wood haste away;
We can show you where he lies,
Fleet of foot and tall of size;
We can show the marks he made,
When 'gainst the oak his antlers frayed.
You shall see him brought to bay,
"Waken, lords and ladies gay."

Louder, louder chant the lay,
Waken, lords and ladies gay,
Tell them youth, the mirth and glee,
Run a course as well as we,
Time, stern huntsman! who can balk,
Stanch as hound, and fleet as hawk?
Think of this, and rise with day,
Gentle lords and ladies gay.

A REAL LOVE SONG.

BY THE ETRICK SHEPHERD.

Love came to the door o' my heart ae night
And he called wi' a whining din—
"Oh open the door! for it is but thy part
To let an old crony come in."
"Thou sly little elf! I hae opened to thee
Far oftener than I dare say;
And dear hae the openings been to me,
Before I could wile you away."
"Fear not," quo' love, "for my bow 's in the rest,
And my arrows are ilk ane gane;
For you sent me to wound a lovely breast,
Which has proved o' the marble stane.
I am sair forepent, then let me come in
To the nook where I wont to lie;
For sae aft hae I been to this door within,
That I downa think to gang by."
I opened the door, though I weened it a sin
To the sweet little whimpering fay;
But he raised sic a buzz the cove within,
That he filled me with wild dismay;
For first I felt sic a thrilling smart,
And then sic a sudden glow,
That I feared the chords o' my sanguine heart
War a' gaun to flee in a lowe.
"Gae away, gae away, thou wicked wean,"
I cried with the tear in my ee;
"Ay! see ye may!" quo' he, "but I ken Ye'll be laith now to part wi' me."
And what do ye think? by day and by night,
For these ten lang years and twain,
I hae cherished the urchin with fondest delight
And we'll never mair part again.

WAR SONG.

Translated from the Russian of Lomonosov.

On—like a ship amid the sea,
When winds are loud, and waves are high,
And forward—forward, far and free,
Mid yawning deep, and threatening sky,
She dashes from her sides amain
The billows to their depths again.

On—like the eagle in his pride,
Who soars in distance wide and dim;
The rock, the gulf, the mountain's side,
The woods are level paths to him:
Where'er the winds of heaven can blow,
There may his chainless pinion go.

On—like the lion of the waste,
Whose glaring eye sheds fear around,
And wolves in rage and terror haste
Far from his fatal footsteps sound;
While through the rocks and mountains ring
The thunders of the forest king.

On, warriors, on—through smoke and blood,
On—through the battle's furious sea,
That dashes, like a stormy flood,
Its deluge of red waves on thee:
On, on to conquer—or to die—
Hurrah, for death or victory!

MASONICK RECORD.

A DISCOURSE,

Delivered before Constellation Lodge, and the associate lodges, assembled at Dedham, Massachusetts, to celebrate the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1829.

BY REV. BR. PAUL DEAN,

Pastor of the Central Universalist Society, Boston.

Phil. in. 8. "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on those things."

Thus spake the servant of God to the christians of his day; and thus, my christian and masonick brethren here assembled, do I now address you on this solemn and interesting occasion.

And met as we are to commemorate the principles and virtues of departed worth, and to think deeply on the means of rendering our society pure and happy within, respected and beloved abroad, and worthy of the praise of God and of good men; I trust this language of inspiration will be deemed appropriate and acceptable.

Though as christian masons, we value all institutions and associations of men, having for their object the extension of human happiness: yet we cease not to revere christianity as the greatest, highest, and best, of all institutions that ever has existed, or ever can exist on the earth. In our estimation, it contains the sublimest doctrines, the purest precepts, and the most illustrious examples of piety and virtue. It offers the richest consolation to adversity and affliction, and inspires in the bosom of the penitent and the dying, the most sacred hopes of heaven. And we most ardently cherish the conviction that it will finally prevail over all earthly institutions, bringing the laws and constitutions of all civil governments into perfect conformity with its own heavenly spirit, dictating by its divine influence the intercourse of nations, and engrossing the undivided affection and obedience of all people. We therefore consider its commands to be superior to all other obligations, whether civil or social; holding all such to be binding on us no farther than they are conformed to its benevolent spirit and design. Its threatenings are the only subject of our dread, its promises the supreme object of our hope, and its word the acknowledged law of our lives.

But though the gospel be thus exalted in its character, it inspires its followers with a peculiar magnanimity of spirit; and enjoins on them the most perfect candour; teaching them to admire whatever is great in the works of nature, to value whatever is useful in history, and to acknowledge and love whatever is just, pure, and praiseworthy in society and in all human institutions, whether of a civic, literary, or charitable character, and whether ancient or modern.

Now leaving principally the discussion of the character and claims of masonry to the brother who is to follow me, on that subject; I propose to show first, that christianity is a light far above that of reason and philosophy, the only perfect institution among men—and second, that while it liberalizes the human mind, it gives the most refined and exalted sense of character, and of our duty to our fellow creatures.

This I shall attempt to do, by describing its influence on the knowledge, pursuits, and institutions of society.

Revelation dispenses the darkness and uncertainty which philosophy in its best estate has left spread over the origin of human nature, and of the world we inhabit. It shows us the Almighty, most wise and benignant Creator of heaven and earth, the glorious and beneficent Father of spirits dispensing from his throne, light and love to the universe of intelligent beings. To him all are indebted for the powers, comforts and hopes of life, and responsible for the proper improvement of all his gifts. And having presented to our faith the divine architect of the universe, enrobed with light divine, and crowned with glory, it discloses to us the nature, duty and destiny of man. Fearfully, wonderfully formed; he feels that there is a spirit within him vastly superior to the tabernacle it inhabits, and that the spirit of the Almighty hath given to him understanding. His senses unite him to created objects around him; and reason, judgment, sympathy and love, qualify him to act the part of a friend and brother.

He traces in all nations and tribes of men the lineaments of his own countenance, and the properties of his own nature; he sees in them the same desires, hopes and fears, and that they are protected by the same power, and sustained by the same goodness as himself. Their spirit, like his own, feels, reasons, compares; and unsatisfied with this short and transitory life, sends forth its aspirations into a future state for eternal life and everlasting happiness.

Hence he concludes and feels that the whole human race were made to walk together in love, dwell in the mutual exchange of good will, and of kind offices, on earth; and that they are destined, in another and better world, to glorify God and enjoy him forever.

When the enlightened christian goes abroad to contemplate the mighty works of nature, he hears the heavens and their starry hosts declaring the glory of God. In yonder lamp of day, in his noontide splendour, he beholds the resplendent image of his Maker's goodness, dispensing life and light, and joy, to every thing beneath his throne. The lofty mountain that heaves its towering summit to the sky, the vast plain that reaches beyond his sight, and the mighty deep that mingles its waves with the clouds, all impress his soul with an affecting sense of his maker's greatness.

And if, with the opening dawn of day, he visits the earth as the mantle of darkness is uplifted from her bosom, and the tenants of the field and wood awake from their repose, and the newly animated creation regales his senses with the morning hymn of her praise—if then he gazes on the beauty and freshness of the opening flower, and beholds every leaf of the forest, and every spear of grass around him, crowned and imperled with dew, sparkling transparent in the beams of the rising sun—then will he be enraptured with the rich variety of Jehovah's goodness, and whosoever he goes, the hand of a father will lead him, and the numerous memorials of his power, wisdom and mercy surround, instruct and enrich him.

But it is not so with the learned men of the world, or the mere philosopher. He admires the works, but sees not the Creator.

If the intelligent christian opens the page of history he will find there much to delight and instruct him. He will find there many excellent and great men, who have subdued the earth, traversed the ocean, reared cities, instituted governments, cultivated the arts, extended commerce among the nations, and established mighty empires over the face of the earth. But on all these characters, imperfection will be written, and mortality engraved on all their mighty works.

Yet the disciple of Jesus values and esteems them, not only for what in them is amiable and useful, but he values them especially, as they prepare the way for the coming of him who should teach from heaven, subdue the empires of the earth, and establish a kingdom of righteousness, and truth, and peace, not to decay, but to continue while the sun and the moon shall endure.

But though the christian finds pleasure and improvement in seeking the origin of nature, studying himself, the works of God, and the progress and history of human society; yet he is most of all pleased to follow the footsteps of the angel of light, as they lead the mind along the events of sacred history, and among the testimonies of Christ and his apostles.

It is here, by faith, that he begins with man, not as he now is, but as he came from the hand of his maker, pure and happy; and traces his devious way from the paradise of Eden, through the lapse and sufferings of sin, and also through the glories of redemption, to the mansions of everlasting peace. It is here that he finds the origin of the several nations of the earth, the rise and progress of human society and of the languages and civil governments of the world; here too he learns the rude commencement of the arts and sciences, their gradual improvement, and their wide extension; here he becomes acquainted with the most astonishing phenomena of nature, and witnesses the most surprising display of divine power and wisdom, in the providence and government of the universe; here he converses with the prophets and the son of God, and his passions are subdued, his heart sanctified, and his understanding divinely illuminated by that word, which in the beginning, said, "let there be light, and there was light,"—here he journeys with the Israelites, suffers with the saints, and sits in heavenly places with the redeemed. Yes, in the bible the christian finds his treasure, his companions and his home.

In the presence of Jesus the troubled waves of the sea are calm, and sleep as on the bosom of love; pain and disease retire before him like the mists of darkness before the beams of the morning, and the heart, broken with grief, feels the power of unutterable joy and heavenly rapture.

By his word the shattered powers of the distracted mind are restored, death itself disarmed of its fatal power, and heaven on earth is begun in the hearts of happy thousands. And, by the light and help of faith, we are enabled to draw aside the veil of eternity, gaze on the house not made with hands, and survey the bright inheritance of the saints in glory. Such, brethren, are some of the superiour advantages, conferred by christianity on its faithful followers; blessings far above those which boasted reason and philosophy are capable of bestowing on their devoted admirers.

But the gospel is not more distinguished for the greatness of its blessings, than for its superiour tendency to ennoble and liberalize the human mind, as I shall now attempt to show.

It is a base libel on the true religion to say, as some have said, that it encourages a bigoted, narrow, selfish, and illiberal spirit—the very reverse of all this is the truth, as will appear, both from the principles and conduct of christians in all ages.

The exalted views it gives us of Deity, and of his works—of the dignity of human nature, and of that eternity to which we are destined, cannot fail to give us liberal views on all subjects, and noble and generous feelings towards our fellow creatures. But what have christians done to prove that christianity liberalizes the mind? We answer, they have done much. They have, in all ages and countries, been the patrons of good order and of civil government—they have nobly and liberally encouraged the arts and sciences—they have widely extended the blessings of civilization, and the refinements of society—they have softened the rigour of human laws, shortened the arm of tyranny, and greatly diminished the destructive character of war, that awful scourge of nations—they have done much, and worthily for the cause of charity. Asylums, penitentiaries, hospitals, and infirmaries, have arisen in every kingdom and city of Christendom, and for every class of sufferers. But in nothing have christians exhibited a more truly liberal spirit, than in the arrangements of domestic life, and of home. It is here that woman, who in the whole heathen world was degraded to a mere slave of her pretended lord, has been exalted to be the companion, associate, and friend of man; dividing with him the cares and duties of life; and sharing with him the rich variety of its blessings—here too, parents have the honour, the respect, and the obedience due to them; and children find the affectionate care, the protection, and the instruction, required by their tender years, and for their future usefulness and happiness. Here is true liberality without licentiousness, a liberality that seeks the happiness and welfare of all ages, sexes and conditions of mankind.

To this liberality of spirit, in sentiment and in conduct, christianity adds a very high sense of character, and a refined sense of relative and social duty. Good men not only seek to deserve the approbation of their fellow men, but they aspire to that praise which cometh from God only, by uniting in their character and conduct whatsoever things are true, honest, pure, lovely, and of good report; and as they feel and know that they always act before the all-searching eye of God, which cannot be deceived, but looks upon the heart and tries the honesty of its most secret purposes as well as the sincerity of its outward professions; so they must feel a more high and refined sense of the importance of moral character, than those can possess who act only with reference to men, to say nothing of the multitude, who neither fear God nor regard men.

This deep and lively sense of moral virtue, St. Paul would have his brethren carefully preserve and cultivate among themselves, as a most powerful check upon their passions, and an efficient aid of their souls, in the day of trial and temptation.

At the head of the christian duties stands our duty to God, the righteous and rightful sovereign of the universe, and the bountiful and constant benefactor of the human race. To him we owe the supreme love of the human heart, and the unceasing adoration of the soul, a cheerful submission to his providence, and a perfect obedience to his word; with a sincere and devout repentance for all our sins of thought, word, and deed. But on this subject I need not dwell.

The next in importance, is that of submission and respect to the civil authority and laws of the land; for the powers that be, are ordained of God, and rulers are appointed to be a terror to evil doers, and a praise to them that do well.

When our blessed Lord came into the world, he found civil government existing in different forms, from the most despotism, to the most popular and free: but with these he did not interfere, because his kingdom was not to be of this world.

He selected no one form of government, to the exclusion of the rest, well knowing that not the form, but the power and design only, were ordained of God; and therefore, any form, and any administration of it, which would preserve order, suppress vice, and promote virtue and happiness among its subjects, would answer the end of its institution. And therefore christians have ever yielded ready and cheerful obedience to the governments of every form under which they have chanced to live.

But it may be said rulers are liable to err, and become oppressors, as was Pharaoh to the children of God in Egypt—that they may widely mistake the proper objects and exercises of civil power, as they manifestly did, when they hung people in Salem for witchcraft. What then, shall we discard and put down all civil authority and government, because the rulers do, or may mistake their duty, and pervert the objects of their power? surely not.

But here, let me ask, how does religion propose to remedy this evil? surely not by opposing the power, and introducing anarchy and confusion, the very worst of human ills! This is her wiser and more effectual method. She explains the design and object of government, teaches the ruler how to administer it, and the subject how to obey it; and thus brings the government, ruler and subjects to belong to his kingdom, who is Lord of lords, and King of kings; and to whom are to be given the kingdoms of the whole earth, for his everlasting dominion. Hence christians have ever been the patrons of civil government, and the zealous supporters of social order.

The obligations imposed by religion, in relation to the institutions of literature and science, and also in regard to domestic life, are plainly and forcibly demonstrated by the circumstance, that whosoever its influence has prevailed, there literature, the useful arts, and good learning, have prevailed and been diffused, with all their advantages, through every rank of society; and men have been made better fathers, better husbands, and better brothers and sons, and women have become more virtuous, useful, and happy mothers, wives, sisters and daughters.

But last, though not least, we are come to the duty of the friends of religion, towards charitable societies and establishments. Permit me now to inquire, if when Jesus first visited our world of sorrow, affliction and death, he had formed a society, like our persecuted fraternity, whose members were scattered through the cities, villages and countries of every kingdom, and stationed along the shores of the distant seas, for the laudable purpose of relieving the shipwrecked mariner and stranger, of aiding and supporting a poor brother, and of making the heart of the desolate widow and orphan cheerful and glad, by the timely offer of charity and kindness—if on their altars he had beheld the sacred writings, and learnt that in their meetings they never disputed on the subject of sectarian religion, or party politics of the day, but cultivated among themselves friendly and social feelings, and good will to all mankind. What suppose ye would have been his conduct towards them? Allow they were not christians in the strict use of that term; that they had among them members whose errors they endeavoured to correct, and whose crimes and faults they deplored; but that on the whole, they were equally as moral and upright men as other citizens. Would he have despised and hated them? would he have pointed at them the finger of scorn and derision? would he have marked them individually, and as a society, for the objects of proscription and infamy? Say, ye that have felt most of the spirit and power of his grace. For myself I must be persuaded his conduct towards them would have been very different.

Would he not rather, as in the case of the young man in the gospel, have loved, though he could not pronounce them perfect? would he not rather, as in the instance of the Roman centurion, have sent a vision of angels saying, your alms-deeds are held in memorial before God, now therefore send for the messengers of the gospel, and to your virtue and alms, add the knowledge, the hopes, and the joys of salvation?

The justice of christianity solemnly prohibits all general and sweeping censures against any order or association of men; as in all societies there are some good men and others not so good. The sobriety and benevolence of the gospel, both utter their voice against all rash and heated excitements. They are the moral tempests that lay waste the fairest fruits of virtue and religion, and spread moral desolation and innocent sufferings around the dwellings of men, and the temples of God.

The simplicity of truth, cries aloud against those dark and deadly insinuations, secretly and basely thrown out, by the cowardly and dastardly assassin of human character and human peace: who dare not utter openly, what he would fain make men believe. And the venerable gravity of God's word utters its high and solemn protest against that shameless levity of sentiment and feeling, that hesitates not to ridicule whatever in religion or masonry it wishes to oppose and put down, and would not scruple when interest or pleasure was at stake, to satirise the coronation of an emperor, the solemn service of the Lord's Supper, or the sacred rights of the burial of the dead. Of these remarks, you can easily make the application.

Before closing, one word on the present excitement. Though in its character, extent, and violence, it is entirely new and unprecedented in the history of human events, yet I have no fears as to its ultimate result. I repeat it, I have no fears as to its result. But notwithstanding this, I do most devoutly deplore its existence. This I do, because its object is to heap disgrace on an institution which I know to be good. Because it tends to break up the peace of many innocent minds, of many happy families—because it dries up the current of charity and relief, which has so long and happily flowed to the bosom of the widow, the orphan, and the poor. I grieve for those faithful and pious ministers of the cross, who have been driven from their homes, their friends, and their parishes by its relentless fury. But most deeply do I mourn for the illustrious dead, whose memories, and whose fame, are blasted by this night-wind of moral desolation and of death.

My brethren, these are days of trial, but let it be your consolation that if you suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye, for God shall reward your faithfulness. I trust you have a good conscience before God to this day, as the supporters and friends of masonry; and that as men, or masons, and as christians, you are willing to be known and judged of all men, by your fruit. Then put ye on the whole armour of light, stand on the watch-tower, and watch at the post of danger; and ye shall soon see that mighty is truth, and it will prevail. Trusting in the Lord, meditate no revenge upon your persecutors, and seek not their evil, but pray for their future reformation; and as to their past sins, leave them to the wholesome chastenings of an awakened conscience, and to the just retribution of God.

Finally, brethren, let your light shine before men—live as masonry teaches, and as religion requires you, and then shall the world admire your virtues, and praise you as the followers and friends of whatsoever things are lovely, and of good report; and God himself shall prosper, own and bless you forever.

GEOGRAPHY.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

GEOGRAPHY OF GREECE.

By a decree of Count Capo d'Istrias, President of Greece, the Peloponesus has been divided into seven departments, and the islands which are in possession of the Greeks, and under the jurisdiction of the government of the republic, into six, making in all thirteen. The extent of the peninsula is 8353 square miles, which is a little more than that of the state of Massachusetts, and the present population is estimated to be 600,000 souls. The extent of the islands is 1770 square miles, and the population 196,500. This is exclusive of any part of continental Greece, and the island of Negropont. If we add this island, and the part of the continent proposed in the protocol lately published, including Attica, Boeotia, Phoris, Aetolia, and Acarnania, it will make the extent of the new Grecian State about 19,500 square miles, or about equal to the states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, with a population of about a million souls.

We have seen a map on which the boundaries of the thirteen departments as constituted by the President of Greece, are delineated. Those of the peninsula bear names corresponding with those of the same counties in ancient Greece, and the boundaries in general are the same. They are as follows:

1. Argolis. The capital town is Napoli, a city of 15,000 inhabitants. It has also the considerable towns of Corinth, Argos, Damala, and Kironiti, the ancient Epidaurus.

2. Achaia. This department occupies the northern part of the Peninsula, bordering on the Gulf of Corinth or Bay of Lepanto. Its principal towns are Patras, lately taken from the Turks by the French troops, with the assistance of the French and English fleets—it was while under the Turkish dominion a place of considerable trade—Vostitza, Kalevrita, and Kamenitza.

3. Elis. The principal towns of this department are Gastouni, Lana, and Prigo.

4. Upper Messinia. This department includes the towns of Navarino, Modon, Coron, and Arcadia.

5. Lower Messinia. This department includes the towns of Kalamata, Leondari, Karitene, and Andorossa.

6. Laconia. The principal towns in this department are Mistra, near the site of the Ancient Sparta, Monembasia, Kolokythia, and Kolochina.

7. Arcadia. The principal towns of this department are Tripolitza,—which under the Turks was the chief town of the whole peninsula—Karitena, Ajapetri, or St. Peter, and Fanari.

8. The North Shorades. This department consists of the islands of Skiathos, Serpelos, Skiros, Ipsara, and the smaller islands. The extent of the whole is less than 100 square miles, and the population is 6,600.

9. The East Shorades. The population of this department is 54,000. The principal islands is Samos, which has an extent of 174 square miles, and a population of 50,000 souls. The other principal islands are Patmos, which has 1,500 inhabitants; Ikaria, which has 1,000, Kalymna, which has 300, and Zero, which has 200.

10. The West Shorades. This department consists of the islands of Hydra, which has 20,000 inhabitants, Spezzia, which has 8,000, Poros 3,000, Egina 4,000, and Salamis, which has 5,000. The whole population of the department is 40,000.

11. The North Cyclades. This department has a population of 46,400 souls. The principal islands are Andros, Tine, Mycone, Syra, Thermia, and Zea.

12. The Central Cyclades. The principal islands are Nexos, which has a population of 10,000 souls, Paros 2,000, Nios 3,700, Milo 4,800, Sephnos 5,000. The whole department has 25,200 inhabitants.

13. The Southern Cyclades. The principal islands are Amorgo, Santerin, and Karpatos. The whole number of inhabitants is 19,900.

CHARACTER.

From the Washington City Chronicle.

NAPoleonIANA.

Napoleon had an extreme aversion to every thing that was not extremely clean. Persons who are not themselves over nice would regard his taste in this respect as somewhat fastidious. The very idea that there was "any unclean thing" in his plate, or on his table, would inspire him with inseparable disgust. During his brilliant progress through part of his dominions, with Maria Louisa, after a review of a part of his troops, he ordered a plate of the soup prepared for his soldiers to be brought him. He filled a spoon with some of it, when, on lifting it to his mouth, he beheld a long hair! Unperceived he suddenly removed it, and suppressing the feeling of nausea which was coming over him, he boldly swallowed it, not wishing to hurt the feelings of his brave soldiers whose attachment was raised to adoration by such traits of familiar condescension.

The conduct of the emperor towards his own family sets his character in a very favourable light. His generosity to his brothers is well known, and his tender attachment to his wife and child would have done honour to the feelings of the most susceptible heart. He always treated his mother with exemplary respect and filial love. He gave her a splendid train of domesticks, and in order to bestow on her a sort of political consequence, he named her Protectress of all the charitable institutions. Of his sisters he preferred Pauline, who was one of the most beautiful women of the age, the model and theme of poets and painters. The reader may have heard some of the unfounded calumnies which were circulated about the voluptuous character of this princess.

Napoleon drew a circle around him wherever he moved, which none ever entered without being fixed by its fascination. Capt. Maitland, in his unpretending but delightful "Narrative of the surrender of Napoleon," gives a very amusing instance of this peculiar and irresistible enchantment:—"Lord Keith appears to have formed a very high opinion of the fascination of his conversation, and expressed it very emphatically to me, after he had seen him: speaking of his wish for an interview with the Prince Regent, 'd—n the fellow,' he said, 'if he had obtained an interview with his Royal Highness, in half an hour they would have been the best friends in England!'"

Montesquie, speaking of the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, has a remarkable passage which can be applied, with singular propriety, to the increase and destruction of the colossal empire of Napoleon: "Rome had acquired a vast extent, because the wars which she waged took place successively—each nation, by remarkable good luck, only attacking her when some other had been ruined. Rome was destroyed at last because every nation attacked her at once, and penetrated her territory from all sides." Napoleon successively annihilated the power of Prussia, procured the neutrality of the Czar by winning his attachment and admiration; Italy, Spain, and the German Confederacy, were prostrate before him; and Austria was exposed almost singly to his blows. But when these nations, subsidized by the corrupting gold of England, and profiting by the disasters in Russia, united their strength, a coalition was formed which no human power could resist. If our admiration for the Emperor, when he is rising to the meridian of his glory, is somewhat qualified by aversion for his ambition, we can feel nothing but unmixed enthusiasm for the courage and genius which he displayed when overwhelmed by his implacable foes. History will record the campaign round Paris as one of the most bold and skillful feats that ever illumined its pages. Madame de Stael compares Napoleon to Cæsar sinking under the daggers of the assassins; and, like him, he fell with a dignity which sheds an unfading lustre over his departed glory. Lord Byron has celebrated the invincible fortitude which he displayed during his reverses, in some of the most beautiful lines that ever flowed from his gifted pen.

Idol of the soldier's soul!
First in fight, but mightiest now;
Many could a world controul;
Thee alone no doom can bow!

Nothing can be conceived more affecting than the heroic friendship of the faithful followers, who shared the Emperor's imprisonment at St. Helena. Public opinion has already done justice to the noble and devoted attachment of these illustrious men, who preferred the dungeon of their fallen master to all the splendours which might have illumined their apostasy, at the court of the Bourbons. The most disgusting part of Sir Walter Scott's book is his laboured vindication of Napoleon's inhuman jailor, who wished to wreak his cowardly vengeance on the helpless corpse of his victim. It was cased down in a grave ten feet deep, and overlaid with stone and mortar, all cramped with iron; and every means was resorted to to render the funeral ceremony as un-imperial as possible. It looked as if the vigilance of his inveterate foes survived their prisoner—as if they thought that his very grave should be a dungeon, and that his mighty spirit which the world could not contain, might "burst its searments," and escape beyond its last dark tenement!

THE GATHERER.

PERSEVERANCE.

Perseverance, says the editor of a Scotch Journal, often enables even the dunce to outstrip the man of genius, and makes fortune the friend of stupidity. His maxim is not very new, but he illustrates it by an anecdote which is so to us. We have sometimes heard with wonder of the exploits of thoroughgoing salesmen—but never of any quite equal to this: A person in the west of Scotland, who had engaged in the manufacture of a certain description of goods, then recently introduced into that part of the country, found it necessary, or conjectured it might be profitable, to establish a permanent connexion with some respectable mercantile house in London. With this design he packed up a quantity of goods, equipped himself for his journey, and departed. He travelled on foot to the metropolis. Upon his arrival he made diligent inquiry as to those who were likely to prove his best customers; and accordingly proceeded to call upon one of the most opulent drapers, with whom he resolved to establish a regular correspondence. When Saunders entered the draper's shop, he found it crowded with purchasers, and the clerks all bustling busily at the back of the counter, handing out their several wares to their respective customers. Saunders waited what he thought a reasonable length of time, then laid down his pack, his bonnet, and staff, upon the counter, and inquired, in his broad Scotch, for "the head o' the house." One of the clerks asked what he wanted. The answer was, as usual, a question—"What ye ought i' my line, sir?" "No," was the prompt reply of the person interrogated, who accompanied his monosyllabic negation with a look of contempt for the mean appearance of the itinerant Scotch merchant. "Will you not take a look o' the gudes, sir?" was Saunders' next query. "No, not at all, I have not time," replied the clerk; "take them away, take them away." "Ye'll aiblins find them worth your while, and I doubt na but ye'll buy," said Saunders, as he coolly proceeded to untie and unstrip his burden. "Go away, go away," were reiterated half a dozen times, with great impatience; but the old man still persisted. "Get along, ye old fool," cried the clerk, completely out of temper, as he pushed the already exposed contents of the pack off the counter—"get along." Saunders looked up in the individual's face, with a wide mouth and enlarged pair of eyes, then looked down to his estate that lay scattered among his feet, looked up again, and exclaimed, "wull ye really not buy ought; but ye dinna ken, ye ha'ena seen the goods yet," and so saying, he slowly gathered them up and replaced them on the counter. "Get out of the shop, sir," was the peremptory and angry command that followed his last appeal. Saunders, with gravity and self-possession, said, "are you in earnest frien'?" "Yes, certainly," was the reply, and that reply was succeeded by an unequivocal proof of sincerity on the part of the person who made it, when he picked up Saunders' bonnet, and whirled it out into the street. The cool Scotchman stalked deliberately and gravely in quest of his stewarton "headgear." After giving it two or three hearty slaps upon the wall without the door, he re-entered very composedly, wringing the moisture out of it, looked over to the person who had served him so, and said, with a genuine Scotch smile, "you was but an ill faured turn, man: ye'll surely take a look o' the gudes noo." The master draper himself, who was standing all the while in the shop, admiring the patience and perseverance of the old man, and feeling a little compunction for the unceremonious manner he had been treated, examined the contents of the pack, found them to be articles he stood in need of, purchased them, and ordered an additional regular supply, and thus laid the foundation of an opulent mercantile house, that has now flourished for some generations.

MANKIND IN THE 15TH CENTURY.

*Mankind at the beginning of the 15th Century, are thus described in the Liverpool Observer:—

They had neither looked into heaven nor earth, neither into the sea nor land, as has been done since. They had philosophy without experiment, mathematicks without instrument, geometry without scale, astronomy without demonstration.

They made war without powder, shot, cannon or mortars; nay, the mob made their bonfires without squibs or crackers. They went to sea without compass, and sailed without the needle. They viewed the stars without telescopes, and measured altitudes without barometers. Learning had no printing-press, writing no paper, and paper no ink. The lover was forced to send his mistress a deal board, for a love-letter, and a billet-doux might be of the size of an ordinary trencher. They were clothed without manufactures, and the richest robes were the skins of the most formidable monsters. They carried on trade without books, and correspondence without posts; their merchants kept no accounts, their shop-keepers no cash-book; they had surgery without anatomy, and physicians without materia medica; they gave emetics without ipecacuana, and cured agues without bark.

ENTHUSIASM.

William Vandervelde, the old and famous painter of sea-pieces, was so fond of his art, that, in order justly to observe the movements and various positions of ships engaging in a sea-fight, that he might design them from nature, and unite truth with grandeur and elegance in his compositions, he did not hesitate to attend those engagements in a small light vessel, and sail as near to his enemies as his friends, attentive only to his drawing and without the least apparent anxiety for the danger in which he was every moment exposed. Of that bold and dauntless disposition, he gave two very convincing proofs, before his arrival in England; the one was in that severe battle between the Duke of York and Admiral Opdam, in which the Dutch Admiral and 500 men were blown up-the other was in that memorable engagement, which continued three days between Admiral Nonck and Admirable de Ruyter. During the continuance of these different engagements, Vandervelde plied between the fleets, so as to represent minutely every movement of the ships and the most material circumstances of the action, with incredible exactness and truth.

INDIAN ANSWER TO A CHALLENGE.

I have two objections to this duel affair. The one is lest I should hurt you, and the other is, lest you should hurt me. I do not see any good it would do me to put a bullet through any part (the least dangerous part) of your body. I could make no use of you when dead, for any culinary purpose, as I would a rabbit or a turkey. I am no cannibal, to feed on the flesh of men; why, then shoot down a human creature of whom I could make no use? A buffalo would be better meat, for though your flesh might be delicate and tender, yet it wants that firmness and consistency which takes and retains salt. At any rate it would not be fit for long voyages. You might make a good English stew or an American barbecue, it is true, being of the nature of a racoon or an opossum; but people are not in the habit of barbecuing any thing human in these enlightened times. As to your hide, it is not worth taking off, being little better than a year colt. As to myself, I don't like to stand in the way of any thing harmful. I am under great apprehension you might hit me! that being the case, I think it most adviseable to stay at a distance. If you want to try your pistols take some object, a tree or a barn door, about my dimensions; and if you hit that, send me word, and I shall acknowledge that had I been in the same place you might have also hit me.

VEGETABLE DIET.

The Indians of South America are very strong limbed, and capable of enduring great fatigue. Their every day pedestrian feats are truly astonishing. Guides perform a long journey at the rate of 20 or 25 leagues a day. Their usual pace is a jog trot. They take short steps, and carry their feet close to the ground. They go up and down mountain-sides quicker than a mule; and horsemen whom they accompany as guides have frequently occasion to call after them, to request them to slacken their pace. A battallion, eight hundred strong, has been known to march 13 or 14 leagues in one day without leaving more than ten or a dozen stragglers on the road. The Indian subsists on a very small quantity of the simplest food. A leathern pouch containing cocoa, suspended from his neck, is worn next to the breast. A hand-full or two of roasted maize is tied up in one corner of his pouch, and, in general, these are the only provisions for a very long day's journey.

POISON BY IVY.

The poison of Ivy is said to be of an acid nature and alkalies are recommended as antidotes against it. Lime water, lye obtained from wood ashes, or weak solutions of potash or pearlash will therefore be good applications for poison by ivy. It has also been recommended to hold the part affected as near the fire as can be well endured for twenty or thirty minutes. This remedy however, should be applied during the first twenty-four hours after the poison has begun to operate. Soft soap and cold water is likewise said to be a good application.

TALLEYRAND.

A friend of M. de Talleyrand told him one day that he had had a smart altercation with the Countess de Genlis, who said some very severe things to him. "I gave her several sharp replies."—"That was wrong; there are two sorts of people from whom one may receive a soufflet without resenting it—women and bishops."

Some one observed to M. Talleyrand, that whatever might be said of the Chamber of Deputies, the members of the upper chamber at least possessed consciences. "Oh yes," replied M. de Talleyrand, "there are consciences enough among them."

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

"STAND FROM UNDER!"

The following story was told for an actual fact, by a sailor who solemnly affirmed he knew it to be so; whatever else he was, he certainly must have been a genius.

We were on board a slave ship, bound to the coast of Africa. I had my misgivings about the business; and I believe others had them too. We had passed the Straits of Gibraltar, and were lying off Barbary, one clear, bright evening, when it came my turn to take the helm. The ship was becalmed, and every thing around was as silent as the day after the deluge. The wide monotony of water, varied only by the glancings of the moon on the crest of the waves, made me think the old fables of Neptune were true; and that Amphitrite and her Naiads were sporting on the surface of the ocean, with diamonds in their hair. These fancies were followed by thoughts of my wife, my children, and my home; and all were oddly enough jumbled together in a delicious state of approaching slumber. Suddenly I heard, high above my head, a loud, deep, terrible voice call out, "Stand from Under!" I started to my feet—It was the customary signal when any thing was to be thrown from the shrouds, and mechanically I sung out the usual answer, "Let go." But nothing came—I looked up in the shrouds—there was nothing there—I searched the deck,—and found that I was alone! I tried to think it was a dream—but that sound, so deep, so stern, so dreadful, rung in my ears, like the bursting of a cannon!

In the morning, I told the crew what I had heard. They laughed at me; and were all day long, full of their jokes about "Dreaming Tom." One fellow among them was most unmerciful in his raillery. He was a swarthy, malignant-looking Spaniard; who carried murder in his eye, and curses on his tongue; a daring lordly man, who boasted of crime, as if it gave him pre-eminence among his fellows. He laughed longest and loudest at my story. "A most uncivil ghost, Tom," he said; "when such chaps come to see me, I'll make 'em show themselves. I'll not be satisfied without seeing and feeling, as well as hearing."

The sailors all joined with him; and I, ashamed of my alarm, was glad to be silent. The next night, Dick Burton took the helm. Dick had nerves like an ox and sinews like a whale; it was little he feared on earth, or beneath it. The clock struck one—Dick was leaning his head on the helm, as he said, thinking of me or my story,—when that awful voice again called from the shrouds, "Stand from under!" Dick darted forward like an Indian arrow, which they say goes through and through a buffalo, and wings on its way, as if it had not left death in the rear. It was an instant, or more, before he found presence of mind to call out, "Let go!" Again nothing was seen, nothing heard. Ten nights in succession, at one o'clock, the same unearthly sound rung through the air, making our stoutest sailors quail as if a bullet-shot had gone through their brains. At last, the crew grew pale when it was spoken of; and the worst of us never went to sleep without saying our prayers. For myself, I would have been chained to the oar all my life to have got out of that vessel. But there we were in the vast solitude of ocean; and this invisible being was with us! No one put a bold face upon the matter, but Antonio, the Spaniard. He laughed at our fears, and defied Satan himself to terrify him. However, when it came his turn at the helm, he refused to go. Several times, under pretence of illness, he was excused from a duty which all on board dreaded. But at last the captain ordered Antonio to receive a round dozen of lashes every night until he should consent to perform his share of the unwelcome office. For awhile this was borne patiently; but at length, he called out, "I may as well die one way as another—give me over to the ghost!"

The night Antonio kept watch on deck,—few of the crew slept; for expectation and alarm had stretched our nerves upon the rack. At one o'clock, the voice called, "Stand from under!" "Let go!" screamed the Spaniard. This was answered by a shriek of laughter, and such laughter, it seemed as if the fiends answered each other from pole to pole, and the bass was howled in hell! Then came a sudden crash upon the deck, as if our masts and spars had fallen. We all rushed to the spot—and there was a cold, stiff, gigantic corpse. The Spaniard said it was thrown from the shrouds; and when he looked on it, he ground his teeth like a madman. "I know him," exclaimed he, "I stabbed him within an hour's sail of Cuba, and drank his blood for breakfast!"

We all stood aghast at the monster. In fearful whispers we asked what should be done with the body. Finally, we agreed that the terrible sight must be removed from us, and hidden in the depths of the sea. Four of us attempted to raise it; but human strength was of no avail—we might as well have tugged at Atlas. There it lay, stiff, rigid, heavy, and as immovable as if it formed a part of the vessel.—The Spaniard was furious: "let me lift him," said he; "I lifted him once and can do it again. I'll teach him what it is to come and trouble me." He took the body round the waist, and attempted to move it. Slowly and heavily the corpse raised itself up; its rayless eyes opened; its rigid arms stretched out, and clasped its victim in a close death-grapple—and rolling over to the side of the ship, they tottered an instant over the waters—then with a loud plunge sunk together. Again that laugh—that wild, shrieking laugh,—was heard on the winds. The sailors bowed their heads, and put up their hands to shut out the appalling sound.

I took the helm more than once after; but we never again heard in the shrouds that thundering sound, "Stand from Under!"

CONVERT OF ST. BERNARD,

ON THE ROAD OVER THE ALPS.

It was during the last winter that two Italians, whose home was in the valley of Aost beneath, were on their passage over the mountain. It was already drawing towards the evening when they arrived, and after resting and taking some refreshment, they resolved to proceed. It was represented that the appearance of the sky predicted heavy falls of snow during the night; that the wind had now risen, and had set in violently in the very face of the path they were to take. It was in vain to endeavour to restrain their departure; they had been absent many years from their families, they said, having travelled as merchants about France and Germany, and were now quite impatient to return to their native valley. The last benefit the kind monks could bestow, was to give them two of the experienced guides of the convent, to accompany them through the most perilous part of the way. Thus assisted they soon afterwards set out. It became dark not long after they quitted the convent, but as it is a continued and gradual descent of six hours to the valley of Aost, they had hoped to arrive at their own homes in the course of the night; for the distance seemed very small compared with the long journeys they had already travelled. The snow storm began about an hour after their departure, and the good priests felt the worst apprehensions for the safety of the unfortunate Italians, yet they had great confidence in the experience of the two guides from the convent. They had advanced, it afterwards appeared, some distance on the way to their native valley, being resolved, if possible, to arrive there at the risk of their lives, when their course was arrested in a moment by the fall of an avalanche, which no skill or foresight could guard against, and the whole party was buried many fathoms deep in the snow. The description of the peasant in "The Seasons," perishing, at the time the warm thoughts of his home and family, not far distant, came on his mind, might be said to be faithfully paralleled here. A few leagues' further progress, and the cottages of these hapless adventurers would have received them, and the joyful sounds of welcome been heard, after so long an absence, in a warmer climate too, and under a more genial sky; for there cannot be a more striking change of atmosphere than is found in a few hours from the heights of St. Bernard to the warm vallies of Piedmont below.

When the morning came, however, and no tidings were received of the fate of the travellers, and the guides never returned, the fathers gave them up for lost. The spot where they perished was not known till the melting of the snow, as the season advanced, discovered the bodies at the foot of a small eminence in the various positions in which they had perished. They were not in a state of decay, having been preserved from corruption by the snows amidst which they had lain; and they were brought to the cemetery, or rather the Morgue, as it is called, of the monastery. This is a very extraordinary place, and presents a rather startling spectacle to a visitor who is unaware, perhaps, of the object he is about to see. It is a gloomy and long apartment, into which you gaze through a small window, or if curiosity goes so far, you may enter, and move amidst the dead, who are placed in various positions. Some stand upright against the wall, others in a reclining position; some are recumbent on the floor: the bodies are all, more or less, in a good state of preservation, from their being hardened by the excessive cold to which they have been exposed. This is the case with those who are discovered amidst the depths of the snow soon after death, as well as with the remains of others, who have lain frozen and congealed for days, and even for weeks, beneath avalanches and snow-wreaths, whence it is impossible for some time to extricate them. In this singular receptacle are the bodies of travellers of both sexes, and of various nations, some of a period as remote as a hundred years ago; and the features often present the different emotions under which they died, of agony, despair, and heart-rending sorrow. The jaw having fallen in most instances, and the teeth being frightfully visible, as well as the mouth drawn up by the nature of their death, give to many of these groups an appalling aspect. The skin becomes perfectly brown and hard, though when these victims of winter are drawn forth from the snows, the colour is as fresh on the cheek as in life, and continues so for some days. Here, amidst the other tenants of the tomb, are a few of the brave and skillful guides, who have perished in their efforts to extricate the helpless traveller: there is no daring and self-devotion to which these men are not capable. No tempest, or falling avalanche, or snow-storm, deters them from advancing on the track of their faithful and sagacious dogs. Often they are summoned forth amidst the darkness of the night; and equipped with long poles and lanterns, they traverse the fearful wilds around the convent, when every beaten path is buried from the view. They are hardy peasants from the hills and valleys, the nearest on the Italian frontier, who leave their cottage and families during the inclement season, to give their services to the monastery.

MISCELLANY.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

PROVERBS.

"Some men are born with a silver, and others with a wooden spoon in their mouths;" and "He who was born under a three-half-penny planet will never be worth twopence," are two melancholy Proverbs, expressly intended for the use of the losers in the game of life, the dejected, wearied competitors in the race we are all running, the awkward and unsuccessful dancers to whom Fortune's pipe never taught a single chassee. The language in which they are couched is mean and plebeian, but let it be recollected that it is the language of adversity, the language of the poor and dispirited; such maxims do not pass the lips of the prosperous and happy, they acquire no polish from the rich and elegant, who are very apt to forget that there are such things as wooden spoons or copper money in existence, and are sure to attribute their right to the use of fiddle-headed king's pattern spoons and gold and silver coin to their own indefeasible privileges and indisputable merits. For it is a remarkable fact that those who dance oftenest in Fortune's cotillion, and are most indebted to her pipe, frequently assert that they supply their own music, and that their fine steps are entirely owing to the admirable way in which they themselves are performing on a jews-harp or penny trumpet. She, partial goddess, takes no umbrage at their ingratitude, plays on to her thoughtless favourites, nor turns one glance to the crowds of worshippers who are imploring a single tune from her lips. Yet, notwithstanding the arrogance of the prosperous, those who look on and observe the banquet, can readily distinguish the "wooden spoon" adhering with spiteful pertinacity to its original owners. They cannot part with their birthright, friends endeavour in vain to exchange it for a utensil of more valuable materials, and they themselves exert all the powers of their body, the energies of their mind, to aid the benevolent design. But all in vain; they used it for their soup, and they will use it for their dessert.

These ill-starred creatures have no reason to regret the suppression of lotteries, since not even the nominal prize of twenty pounds ever came to their share; and their dislike of the legacy tax is exasperated by no selfish feelings, as they were never called upon to contribute towards it in the slightest degree. Their rich, childless male relations always astonish the world by becoming husbands and fathers in their dotage; while their old female ones either purchase Poyais bonds and are ruined, or marry a Methodist preacher; and if a friend has promised to remember them in his will, he is sure to die suddenly before he has made one. They are always a little too late in asking for a favour, and a little too soon in abandoning a speculation; and they generally sell their shares in a mining company, at a heavy loss, just before the discovery of a bonanza. If money is ever within their grasp, a law-suit speedily loosens their hold, and it falls into the capacious hands of some SILVER-SPOONED sons of Themis; their landed property is always in the West Indies, and their ready cash in a bank that fails. In their youth heiresses have an antipathy to them; and when they marry, their wives are very liable to have twins. If they are botanists or enomologists, they never find a rare plant or uncommon insect; dandelions and groundsel seem to spring beneath their feet, cockchafers and cabbage butterflies to pursue them; it is out of the question that their eyes can ever behold a lady's slipper or a purple emperor, and if they should chance to possess the chrysalis of a death's-head moth, a servant or a child will throw it away by mistake. As sportsmen or fishermen they are equally unfortunate; their gun always misses fire at a cock-pheasant; and, notwithstanding a diligent observance of the rules of "Salmonia," their hook fails, or line breaks, whenever a trout of any size has taken the bait.

As the "wooden spoon" is not confined to the male sex, its influence often dooms the fairer part of the creation to a series of troubles and vexations. Its victims are very unfortunate in their domestic affairs; if they get a good servant, she is sure to marry away; if they wash at home, it always rains at the time; if they have a dinner party, the weather is hot and thundery, their custards are sour, their partridges stink, a little soot falls into the soup, and fish is extravagantly dear. The china of these unhappy women appears more brittle than their neighbours; their gowns seem to possess a magnetic quality for brambles; if a glass of port wine is thrown over at table, you need not ask whose dress has been spoiled; and if they take a walk, unprovided with an umbrella, no barometer is required to tell you it will rain. When invited to a particular pleasant party, they catch cold and cannot go; when they visit the Opera to hear Pasta or Sontag, she is sure to be too indisposed to sing. In early life, they are subject to spraining their ankle just before a ball, and to splitting a shoe when they are about to dance with the man they prefer. At dinners they are generally placed between aged clergymen and persevering gourmands, bores take a fancy to them, incorrigible old bachelors bestow their tediousness upon them, and they are apt to fall in love with half-pay ensigns and country curates. Their hair goes grey early, they lose their teeth soon, their husband is particular about his dinners, and their children have the whooping-cough twice.

Behold, on the contrary, the happy man who with a "silver spoon" in his mouth, dances through life to the pleasant musick of Dame Fortune! His uncles are all childless, nobody will marry his aunts; he sends a basket of game to a capricious old miser, and is rewarded by a legacy of 10,000*l.*; he preaches a sermon before a lady of quality, and gets a rich rectory; he buys worthless land, and the next year there is a rage for building upon it; he writes to his agent to purchase mining-shares, and the letter miscarries. If he is a physician, he is called in just as his patient's disorder takes a favourable turn; if he is a lawyer, his clients happen to be in the right; if he is a naturalist, nondescripts reward his most careless search; if he sports with a friend, the birds always rise on his side. History and biography occasionally furnish us with examples of this peculiarly favoured race. Whittington was evidently one of them, whose very cat proved a source of riches; so was the gentleman, who, worn out by a painful disorder, attempted to commit suicide, opened an inward imposthume and was cured—the Persian condemned to lose his tongue, on whom the operation was so performed that it merely removed an impediment in his speech—the painter who produced an effect he had long aimed at in vain by throwing his brush at his picture in a fit of impatience and despair—and the general who once upon a time besieged the town of Bushire, and had the gates blown open for him and the wall overthrown by the first discharge of a sixty-eight pounder, which the inhabitants fired to prevent his approach. Who can doubt that if these several individuals had been born with "wooden spoons" in their mouths, their fate would have been very different? Whittington's cat would have turned out no mouser, the sword gone through the sick gentleman's heart, the tongue been extracted to the very root, the painting irrecoverably spoiled, and the general repulsed with the loss of a limb.

RELIGIOUS NURSES IN FRANCE.

The Sœurs de la Charité of France are an order of religious nurses. They originated in a charity sermon, perhaps the most useful and extensive in its influence that ever was preached. Vincent de Paul, a celebrated missionary, preaching at Chatillon, in 1617, recommended a poor sick family of the neighbourhood to the care of his congregation. At the conclusion of the sermon a number of persons visited the sick family with bread, wine, meat, and other comforts. This led to the formation of a committee of charitable women, under the direction of Vincent de Paul, who went about relieving the sick poor of the neighbourhood, and met every month to give an account of their proceedings to their superiour. Such was the origin of the celebrated order of the Sœurs de la Charité. Wherever this missionary went he attempted to form similar establishments. From the country they spread to cities, and first to Paris, where, in 1629, they were established in the parish of St. Saviour.

About 1625, a female devotee, named Le Gras, joined the order of Les Sœurs de la Charité. She was married young to M. le Gras, one of whose family had founded a hospital at Puy, but becoming a widow in 1625, in the 34th year of her age, she made a vow of celibacy, and dedicated the rest of her life to the service of the poor. In her, Vincent de Paul found a great accession. Under his direction she took many journies, visiting and inspecting the establishments which he had founded. She was commonly accompanied by a few pious ladies. Many women of quality enrolled themselves in the order, but the superiours were assisted by inferior servants. The Hotel Dieu was the first hospital in Paris where they exercised their vocations. This they visited every day, supplying the patients with comforts above what the hospital afforded, and administering, besides, religious consolations. By degrees they spread into all the provinces of France, and at length the Queen of Poland requested Mademoiselle Le Gras, for though a widow, that was her title, to send her a supply of Sœurs de la Charité, who were thus established in Varsovia, in 1652. At length, after a long life spent in the service of charity and religion, Mademoiselle le Gras died on the 25th of March, 1660, nearly seventy years of age, and for a day and a half her body lay exposed to the gaze of the pious.

The order now consists of women of all ranks, many of them of the highest. After a year's novitiate in the convent, they take a vow, which binds them to the order for the rest of their lives. They have two objects—to attend the sick, and to educate the poor. They are spread all over France, are the superiour nurses at the hospitals, and are to be found in every town, and often even in villages. Go into the Paris hospitals at almost any hour of the day, and you will see one of these respectable looking women, in her black gown and white hood passing slowly from bed to bed, and stopping to enquire of some poor wretch what little comfort he is fancying will alleviate his sufferings. If a parochial cure wants assistance in the care of his flock he applies to the order of Les Sœurs de la Charité. Two of them (for they generally go in couples) set out on their charitable mission. Wherever they travel their dress protects them. Even more enlightened persons than the common peasantry hail it as a happy omen when on a journey a Sœur de la Charité happens to travel with them, and even instances are recorded in which their presence has saved travellers from the attacks of robbers. During the revolution they were rarely molested. They were the only religious order permitted openly to wear their dress and pursue their vocation. Government gives a hundred francs a year to each sister, besides her travelling expenses; and if the parish where they go cannot maintain them, they are supported out of the funds of the order. In old age they retire to their convent and spend the rest of their lives in educating the novices. Thus, like the vestal virgins of old, the first part of their life is spent in learning their duties, the second in practising them, and the last in teaching them.

ON GOOD AND EVIL DAYS.

Notwithstanding the ridicule which in later ages has been deservedly thrown on the idea of good and evil days, it is certain, that from time immemorial, the most celebrated nations of antiquity, the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans, adopted, and placed implicit faith in this superstitious notion, which is still prevalent in all parts of the east. According to Plutarch, the kings of Egypt never transacted business on the third day of the week, and abstained even from food till the evening; because, on that day, Typhon, who was considered by them the cause of every evil, was born. The seventh day of the month was also deemed unfortunate, as on that day Osiris died. The Greeks too had their unlucky days, which they denominated apophrases.^{*} The Thursday was generally considered by the Athenians of so unlucky an import, that the assemblies of the people, which happened to fall on that day were always deferred. Hesiod enumerated the days when it might be proper to commence certain undertakings, and those when it was necessary to abstain from every employment; among the latter he mentions the fifth of every month, when the Infernal Furies were supposed to bestride the earth. Virgil has the same idea:—

Quintam fuge—pallidus Orcus
Eumenidesque satæ: tum partum terra nefando,
Cœuque, lapetumque creat, servumque Typhæa,
Et conjuratos colum rescindere fratres. 1 Geor. 279.

The Romans also demonstrated in their calendar the implicit faith they placed in this distinction of days. The fortunate days were marked in white, and the unfortunate in black; of these were the days immediately after the Calendæ, the Nones, and the Ides; the reason was this: in the 363rd year from the building of Rome, the military tribunes, perceiving the republick unsuccessful in war, directed that its cause should be inquired into. The senate having applied to L. Aquinius, he answered, "That when the Romans had fought against the Gauls, near the River Allia, and had experienced so dreadful a defeat, sacrifices had been offered to the gods the day after the ides of July, and that the Fabii having fought on the same day at Cremera, were all destroyed." On receiving this answer, the senate, by the advice of the pontiffs, ordered, that for the future no military enterprise should be formed on the days of the calends, the nones, or the ides. Vitellius having taken possession of the sovereign authority on the 15th of August, and on the same day promulgated some new laws, they were ill received by the people, because on that day had happened the disastrous battles of Allia and Cremera. There were other days esteemed unhappy by the Romans, such as the day of sacrifices to the dead; of the Lemuria; and of the Saturnalia, the 4th before the nones of October; the 6th of the ides of November; the nones of July called Capritonæ; the 4th before the nones of August, on account of the defeat at Cannæ; and the ides of March, esteemed unlucky by the creatures of Cæsar.

In addition to these, were days which every individual considered fortunate or unfortunate for himself. Augustus never undertook any thing of importance on the day of the nones. Many historical observations have contributed to favour these superstitious notions. Josephus remarks, that the temple of Solomon was burnt by the Babylonians on the 8th of September, and was a second time destroyed on the same day by Titus. Emilius Protus also observes that Timoleon, the Corinthian, gained most of his victories on the anniversary of his birth. To these facts, drawn from ancient history, many from more modern times may be added. It is said that most of the successes of Charles V. occurred on the festival of St. Matthew. Henry III. was elected king of Poland, and became King of France on Whitsunday, which was also his birth day. Pope Sextus V. preferred Wednesday to every other in the week, because it was the day of his birth, of his promotion to the cardinalate, of his election to the papal throne, and of his coronation. Louis XIII. asserted that Friday was always a favourable day to him. Henry VII., of England, was partial to Saturday, on which most of the happy events of his life had taken place. Oliver Cromwell always considered the 3d of September, 1650, when he defeated the Scotch at Dunbar; on that day, in the following year, he gained the battle of Worcester, but on the 3d of September, 1658, he expired. Though this distinction of good and evil days, be in reality as absurd as it appears to be, I much doubt if it be entirely eradicated. When it is considered how many things concur to keep up an error of this kind, and that among the great as well as with the vulgar, opinions as puerile are not only received, but even made a rule of action, it may be inferred, that in every age and in every country, however civilized, superstition always maintains its influence, though it may occasionally vary in its object or name. The human mind, alternately wise and weak, indiscriminately adopts error and truth.

THE ALLIGATOR.

Near the mouth of the Assahan river, in Sumatra, where there is a fishing house, there is an alligator of a most prodigious size; his back when a little out of the water, resembling a large rock. He remains constantly there, and is fed upon the head and entrails of the large pair, or skate fish, which are caught there. I saw him when the Malays called him to his meal. He appeared full twenty feet long. Being in rather a small boat at the time, I wished to make all haste away; but the Malays assured me he was quite harmless, so much so that his feeders pat his head with their hands; a dangerous amusement, certainly, but showing the wonderful tameness and sagacity of the creature, naturally so ferocious. He will not allow any other alligator to approach the place; and on this account the Malays almost worship him.

The great Duke of Marlborough, who was, perhaps, the most accomplished gentleman of his age, would never suffer any approaches to obscenity in his presence; and it was said, by Lord Cobham, that he did not reprove it as an immorality in the speaker, but resented it as an indignity to himself; and it is evident, that to speak evil of the absent, to utter lewdness, blasphemy, or treason, must degrade not only him who speaks, but those who hear; for surely that dignity of character, which a man ought always to sustain, is in danger, when he is made the confidant of treachery, detraction, impiety, or lust; for he who in conversation displays his own vices, imputes them; as he who boasts of a robbery to another, presupposes that he is a thief.

FOREIGN NEWS. English papers to the first of July have been received during the past week. The English Parliament was prorogued on the 23d of June. Mr. Peel has been elevated to the peerage. There is little news of interest except such as relates to the Russians and the Turks. According to the Russian Bulletins, a great victory was gained over the Turks, on the 11th of June, under the walls of Shumla. The Russian accounts of the affair are undoubtedly exaggerated, and the result will probably prove less disastrous to the Turks than the victors seem to imagine. The following remarks upon the subject are from the London Morning Journal a leading and influential opposition print.

The Vizier had, it is stated, left the entrenched camp before Shumla, for the purpose of investing Pravadi, on or about the 14th May. Intelligence of this movement was communicated to General Diebitsch, the Russian commander-in-chief before Silistria, on the 4th of June, and on the 5th he left that place to be watched by his second in command, and proceeded by an unfrequented route, which he appears to have had great difficulty in opening, to intercept the Vizier's supplies from Shumla, and thus compel him to fight. The ground between Pravadi and Shumla, and along the whole of the base of the Bulgarian side of the Balkan, is one mass of natural wood, stretching more or less into the plain, and abounding in passes, in which, during the last campaign, the Russians, in advancing from Jenebazar and Pravadi against Shumla; and in maintaining their communications between that city and Varna, frequently suffered by the incursions of the mountaineers. In one of these passes in the rear of the Vizier's position General Diebitsch took up a strong position on the night of the 10th. He had been previously joined by ten thousand men under Roth. The Vizier appears to have been completely unaware of the amount of the forces opposed to him, and though their approach determined him to raise the siege of Pravadi, he commenced his retreat on Shumla, in the opinion that it would not be seriously disputed. During the first part of the day the action seems to have been pretty fairly contested; but, in the latter part, General Diebitsch having pushed forward some fresh troops, victory, according to their own account, declared itself for the Russians, and the Vizier was compelled to retreat in disorder. His loss is described to amount to nearly 4,000 killed and wounded; fifty-six cannon and two standards had fallen into General Diebitsch's hands. The Russian loss is not given, but it is stated to be severe. Such is the Russian account; and without questioning the fact of the Turks having suffered a defeat in consequence of a departure from the plan of avoiding a general action, which they practiced so successfully last campaign, it does not appear to us that any great evil is like to arise out of the mistake, while, we trust, it will teach a lesson to the Turkish commanders that they will not soon forget. Diebitsch speaks of pursuing the Vizier with all his forces, yet admits that it is impossible for the artillery to proceed until the road is cleared. To pursue a broken army in a pathless wood with artillery, or any thing else, is a very quixotic attempt. We have no doubt that the troops of the Vizier must have abandoned their heavy baggage, and this is, doubtless, a great loss; but, having done so, we have as little doubt that they will contrive, by the assistance of the mountain tribes, to reach their old quarters at Shumla long before Diebitsch can retrograde to Silistria.

Extract of a letter from a friend in Cincinnati, of a recent date, to the editor of the Masonick Record.

"The masonick institution is one for which I have a high regard; and I fully believe the principles of brotherly love,—purity of life,—of honesty and uprightness in conduct and deportment,—of meekness and humility,—of morality and religion, which are taught and enforced by it, have done much in ameliorating the condition of man, in every situation and in all parts of the world. Great care and circumspection should be observed by those who are engaged in the active duties of our lodges—indeed by all who do in any way, belong to them. This is a duty which should be binding upon them at all times, but becomes more indispensable at this time, as having the best tendency to counteract the unholy attempts lately made to destroy its influence. In relation to this, a great and good man has said—'I lament the malignant spirit which has assailed the institution of masonry, but trust its principles will not be shaken. The attack upon them will only prove their strength and their power to abide the test of time. It is true that some of its members may be unworthy and bad men, but this is a misfortune common to every institution, and ought not to be chargeable to the principles of the order.'

☞ An anti-masonick editor asks us if we "would have imputed evil motives to Mr. Van Rensselaer if he had renounced" masonry. Really this is a poser, and no doubt was the cause of much labour to the anti-masonick and anti-common-sense-ible brain that produced it. We shall hand it over to the first wooden nutmeg maker we meet with. In the mean time we will answer it by asking a brace of equally "wise" questions: If the moon should visit the earth would its object be to vote the anti-masonick ticket, or kick up a dust among those who have called it a green cheese? And if the Emperor Nicholas should turn Mussulman, and the Grand Sultan should turn Christian, what would be the speculations of the aforesaid editor, as to their motives?

The United States Gazette, says, "we believe every general officer in the revolutionary army, General Arnold excepted, was a member of the masonick fraternity, and he was the only one found base enough to be a traitor."

☞ Every candidate, save one, nominated by the late anti-masonick "state convention," in Vermont, is opposed to the present national administration. "Straws," &c. It should be recollected however, that the great body of the party which the anti-masons profess to support, despise them; and that Mr. Clay, and several other distinguished members of that party, are adhering and active masons.

☞ The U. S. ship CONSTELLATION, having on board Mr. McLANE, Minister to England, and Mr. RIVERS, Minister to France, and Commodore Biddle and several other passengers, put to sea on Wednesday last. Appropriate salutes were fired when each of the ministers went on board.

The funeral of Sir HUMPHREY DAVY, who died, at Geneva, Switzerland, on the 29th May, took place at that city on the 1st of June. His remains were attended to the grave by the government of the canton, the Academy of Geneva, the Consistory of the Genevan Church, the societies of Arts, and Natural Philosophy and History, and by nearly all the English resident there. Sir Humphrey died in the 51st year of his age, of an attack of a paralytick nature.

☞ Mr. J. G. WHITTIER has left the editorial chair of the American Manufacturer. We are sorry for it. His successor, however, appears to be a man of substance, and we shall continue to regard the Manufacturer as an able journal.

Last week, on Thursday, the annual commencement at the Albany Academy took place. The Trustees and Students, the Hon. the Corporation, the Rev. Clergy, and many of our most respectable citizens, assembled at 10 o'clock A. M. at the City Hotel, in North Market street, and from thence were escorted to the large room in the Academy, by the Lafayette Guards, of the city of New-York, who were on a visit to this city and volunteered their services on the occasion. The gentlemanly deportment and military precision of this company spoke much in their praise, and their appearance in the procession was well calculated to heighten the general interest felt on that day. The exercises at the Academy were opened by prayer, by the Rev. Mr. Ferris, one of the trustees. Then recitations in prose and verse were delivered by several students, with much animation, and if I may draw a conclusion from the applauses elicited, and from the satisfaction apparent in every countenance, I would say, that the young gentlemen acquitted themselves with much credit to themselves, and heart-felt gratification to their parents and friends.

The distribution of premiums to the meritorious students was unusually interesting. The five, which kindled in their ardent bosoms, lit up their young countenances, as the principal handed to each the well contested reward of his talent and industry. The numerous attendance of ladies and gentlemen at the examination cannot fail to have the most salutary effect on the young aspirants for distinction; it will excite their pride and ambition, and animate them to further exertions.

POLICY AND INTENTIONS OF RUSSIA. This colossal power, which developed itself to Europe mainly in the 18th century, and which is hereafter to fill so large a space in the eye of the world, is gigantic and almost appalling in all its proportions. With its head, it touches the Arctic circle; its right arm is held in a threatening position over the frozen ridges of Sweden and Norway, its left stretches out to the confines of the Chinese empire to the east, and its feet seek a resting place on the shores of the Mediterranean. The component parts of this mass take in an infinite diversity of country, kindred and tongue, which are all blending with the utmost felicity, and the vast aggregation placed under the direction of one individual; thus combining all the requisites for great achievements of unity of councils, and undivided energy of action. The primary object of all governments so situated, has been, as all history demonstrates, to acquire consolidation and stability; and the second, to extend themselves and their territories at the expense of neighbouring sovereignties. From the creation of the world, up to the present time, there is no known exception to this rule but China. The Russian system began under Peter the Great, and with the most perfect comprehension of, and acquiescence in, the original design, was carried on under Catharine II. The imbecility of Paul, occasioned an interregnum in the course of the impetuous torrent, and the bold genius of Bonaparte, anticipating the designs of Russia, attacked the bear in its own fastnesses—thus repressing the audacity of its encroachments by greater audacity. Alexander, either softened by early education, or a personal inspection of the dangers and miseries of war, or christianized by the bible society, took a departure from the Russian System, and as we are of opinion, dearly did he answer it. Nicholas, whether he will or no, whether his own inclinations or opinions, or whether clemency or urbanity may adorn his character, which, by the by, we have yet to learn, if he desire to live, must, we think, follow on in the path marked out for him by Peter and by Catharine. And the question appears to us to be, not whether the Russian System is carried into full and complete execution in 1828-9-30-31 or 40, but be executed it must, go on to its completion it will. And if Nicholas demur and follow the footsteps of Alexander, somebody else, we think, will take the place of Nicholas.

From the Madison co. Observer and Recorder.

"A Daniel, a Daniel come to judgment." Shylock.

Mr. Editor—As a specimen of anti-masonick purity and freedom from collusion, the following plain, unvarnished truth is related. A short time since, in a town in this county, a certain reverend gentleman commenced an action for trespass against a mere boy, before a true blue anti-masonick justice. The various counts of the declaration in the cause, contained charges against the boy for having fired at his fence, pulled down the fence, injured his apple trees, his grass, herbage, and corn. On the trial, the only witness whose evidence sustained any part of the declaration, was a son of the plaintiff, and he only swore that he saw the boy at two different times on the land of the doughty plaintiff, but expressly disclaimed that he knew of the defendant having committed any damage in any way whatever. Yet with this, and only this, evidence before him, the said anti-masonick justice gave judgment for the plaintiff of two dollars and costs. Mirabile dictu.

An intelligent community can make their own comments and draw their own conclusions. The reverend plaintiff has full cause to exclaim with Shylock "a Daniel, a Daniel come to judgment."

"Where is the excitement?" said a gentleman from a Western Territory. It was supposed, that at Buffalo, where several aspiring and talented anti-masonick statesmen reside, the excitement must have been discoverable by the atmosphere; by the topick of bar-rooms; by the conversation of the publick coaches; in steam boats; among mechanics, at their labour: in none of these places, could the excitement be found. Go to New York, where a brass foundry by the name of Hanks, and one Allyn, of Chipperfield affidavit memory, have been exhibiting the degrees of Masonry, similarly to the sober, the moral and the persecuted Hamilton, who edified thousands at this place, in a similar manner, without money and without price; he only needed a good supply of twitche-eye. Go to New York,—Boston,—to Detroit,—to Pittsburgh,—and enquire where is anti-masonry? Echo answers, "where?"

[Buffalo Republican.]

About two months since, Mr. Lorin Hodge, formerly of this place, published in an Ohio paper, his renunciation of Masonry. This was also copied into the Buffalo Patriot. From information in our possession, we are induced to believe, that Mr. Hodge was never made a mason! So the renunciation was entirely gratuitous. Has the Patriot any information on the subject?

Advantage of Promptness. A merchant, whose policy expired at 12 o'clock, called at the insurance office at half past 11, and obtained a renewal of it. At 3 o'clock on the same day, his store and goods were reduced to ashes!—This circumstance occurred at the late destructive fire in Augusta, Georgia. What would have become of that man's fortune if he had thought it would "do as well after dinner."

"The Weasel asleep." A draft was not long since drawn by a firm in Boston upon a bank in New-York, for $1500, as expressed by figures in the margin; it was, however, inadvertently written fifteen dollars in the body of the bill. But with this error it was discounted at a bank in Boston, forwarded to New-York, there drafted and returned to the bank, and paid at maturity, in the full amount of fifteen hundred dollars, without the discovery of the mistake by any one, except the persons on whom the bill was drawn—who noticed it at the time of acceptance. There is to be a Museum of Natural Curiosities established at China. Rev. Dr. Morrison has circulated the proposals among the Hong merchants. It is thought that an institution of this kind will very much promote the natural sciences in that hitherto secluded country. An American gentleman, resident there, has already presented a large collection of curiosities to the Museum.

Mercantile letters from Constantinople say that the French General Hullot, who lately arrived there with the intention of entering the Turkish service, has been appointed by the Sultan, Chief of the General Staff. The Turks consider this acquisition as highly valuable, as the General is represented to them as a very distinguished officer, and has promised by his connexions in France to engage many other officers to serve in the Porte. The Sultan has had the new regular troops exercised in the presence of the General, who expressed much surprise at their appearance and discipline. In general, all accounts agree in stating that the regular Turkish infantry has much improved during the winter.

An English traveller in the United States, whose notes are published in the Montreal Gazette, says:—"Whatever may be said of the American population, I can not call it a drunken one, they eat astonishingly, and are drinking all day but not to drunkenness, and I have seen more beastly drunkenness in one day in passing twice along Holborn, than I saw among Americans in several months."

According to the active capital notions of the day, Mr. Hand, who recently died in Stephentown near Troy, made but a poor use of his cash. At 7 per cent, per annum, money doubles in 14 years. It is probable that, averaging the time of the deposits, the whole hoard lay idle at least 28 years. Now $40,000, at 7 per cent, would become in 14 years, $80,000, and in 28 years, 160,000. So that Mr. Hand's legatees have lost $120,000 by the testator's hoarding his money, to say nothing of the still greater sum that can not be found.

VARIETIES.

Alphabets. The English alphabet contains twenty-four letters; to which if we add j and v, consonants, there will be twenty-six; The French contains twenty-three; the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriack, and Samaritan, twenty-two each; the Arabick twenty-eight; the Persian thirty-one; the Turkish thirty-three; the Georgian thirty-six; the Cophtick thirty-two; the Muscovite forty-three; the Greek twenty-four; the Latin twenty-two; the Slavonick twenty-seven; the Dutch twenty-six; the Spanish twenty-seven; the Italian twenty; the Ethiopick and Tartarian each two hundred and two; the Indians of Bengal twenty-one; the Burmese nineteen; the Chinese have, properly speaking, no alphabet, except we call their whole language by that name; their letters are words, or rather hieroglyphicks, amounting to about eighty thousand.

Re-animation of Frozen Fishes. In winter, the Canadian fishermen erect huts on the ice of the lakes and rivers, and, cutting a hole in the ice, enclose it with a screen of straw, &c. to shelter themselves from the cold wind. Sitting inside the screen, they sink their hooks through the hole made in the ice. Amongst the other fish so caught, are perch in abundance. After hauling them up, if thrown aside on the ice, they speedily become frozen quite hard. They then take them home and place them in water, near a fire; in a short time they begin to exhibit symptoms of re-animation,—the fins quiver, the gills open, the fish gradually turns itself on its belly, moves at first slowly about the basin, and at last completely revives and swims briskly about.

Chloride of Lime. A gentleman who has been induced to make an experiment with chloride of lime, in consequence of seeing a recommendation of it in Mr. Silliman's Journal of Science and the Arts, for the abatement of nuisance, has requested us to direct the attention of our readers to it. It corrects the most impure air in a few minutes, and absorbs all putrid exhalations so effectually, that the utmost purity is restored to the atmosphere. A pound of the chloride of lime, which costs only one shilling, he found sufficient in his experiment; and the effect of it will last two or three weeks. In the hot season it is highly important.

LINES

WRITTEN IN A GENTLEMAN'S ALBUM.

Like one, who in some coronet,
Where fairest pearls are found;
Would seek some paler gem to set,
Than those that shine around;

So I, where beauty's pen hath placed
The words to Friendship dear,
Where beauty's fairy hand hath traced
Its wish for thee, sincere.

I can but do, as they have done,
Although with feeble force,
And wish thee, pleasure's shadeless sun
To shine upon thy course.

The smiles of youth, without its tears,
Its brightest smiles be thine,
And manhood's hopes, without its fears
Their wreath for thee entwine.

AN EVENING HYMN.

Almighty God! behold once more
Before thy throne we bow;
Thy gracious goodness to adore
And seek our Saviour—Thou.

The closing day still finds us here
In life and health's embrace,—
So may it find us in thy fear,
And earnest for thy grace.

Supported by thy powerful arm,
We brave all hell and fear no harm;
That powerful aid shouldst thou deny,
In vain we raise our suppliant cry.

Then kindly deign to lend us aid,
That all-efficient aid,
And grant us strength to do thy will
On scriptural page displayed.

Be near us now, and teach our hearts
To read and understand
The holy truths thy word imparts,
And each all wise command.

Dismiss us then to calm repose;—
And through the livelong night
May thine, the eye that doth not close,
Still o'er us watch till morning light.

FRANCIS.

LOVE.

BY FITZ GREEN HALLECK.

The Imperial votress passed on
In maiden meditation, fancy free.
Midsummer Night's Dream.
Shall I never see a bachelor of three-score again?
Benedict, in Much Ado about Nothing.

When the tree of Love is budding first,
Ere yet its leaves are green,
Ere yet, by shower and sunbeam nurst
Its infant life has been;
The wild bee's slightest touch might wring
The buds from off the tree,
As the gentle dip of the swallow's wing
Breaks the bubbles on the sea.

But when its open leaves have found
A home in the free air,
Pluck them, and there remains a wound
That ever rankles there.
The blight of hope and happiness
Is felt when fond ones part,
And the bitter tear that follows is
The life-blood of the heart.

When the flame of love is kindled first,
'Tis the fire-fly's light at even,
'Tis dim as the wandering stars that burst
In the blue of the summer heaven.
A breath can bid it burn no more,
Or if, at times, its beams

Come on the memory, they pass o'er
Like shadows in our dreams.

But when that flame has blazed into
A being and a power,
And smiled in scorn upon the dew
That fell in its first warm hour,
'Tis the flame that curls round the martyr's head,
Whose task is to destroy;
'Tis the lamp on the altars of the dead,
Whose light is not of joy!

Then crush, even in their hour of birth,
The infant buds of Love,
And tread his growing fire to earth,
Ere 'tis dark in clouds above;
Cherish no more a cypress tree
To shade thy future years,
Nor nurse a heart-flame that may be Quenched only with thy tears.

THE RUINED HOUSE.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

No dower of storied song is thine,
O desolate abode!
Forth from thy gates no glittering line
Of lance and spear hath flowed:
Banners of Knighthood have not flung
Proud drapery o'er thy walls,
Nor bugle notes to battle rung
Through thy resounding halls.

Nor have the rich bowers of Pleasance here
By courtly hands been dressed
For princes, from the chase of deer,
Under green leaves to rest:
Only some rose, yet lingering bright
Beside thy casements lone,
Tells where the Spirit of Delight
Hath dwelt, and now is gone.

Yet minstrel tale of harp and sword,
And sovereign beauty's lot,
House of Quenched light and silent board!
For me thou heedest not.
It is enough to know that here,
Where thoughtfully I stand,
Sorrow and Love, and Hope and Fear,
Have linked one kindred band.

Thou bindest me with mighty spells:
—A solemnizing breath,
A presence all around thee dwells!
Of human life and death.
I need but pluck yon garden flower
From where the wild weeds rise,
To wake with strange and sudden power,
A thousand sympathies!

Thou hast heard many sounds, thou hearth,
Deserted now by all!
Voices at eve have met in mirth,
Which eve may ne'er recal.
Youth's buoyant step, and Woman's tone,
And Childhood's language glee,
And song and prayer have well been known,
Hearth of the Dead, to thee!

Thou hast heard blessings fondly poured
Upon the infant head,
As if in every fervent word
The living soul were shed:
Thou hast seen partings—such as bear
The bloom from life away—
Alas! for love is changeful air,
Where nought beloved can stay!

Here, by the restless bed of Pain,
The vigil hath been kept,
Till sunrise, bright with Hope in vain,
Burst forth on eyes that wept:
Here hath been felt the hush, the gloom,
The breathless influence shed
Through the dim dwelling, from the room
Wherein reposed the dead.

The seat left void, the missing face,
Have here been marked and mourned;
And Time hath filled the vacant place,
And Gladness hath returned:
Till from the narrowing household chain
The links dropped, one by one;
And homeward hither o'er the main
Came the Spring birds alone.

Is there not cause then—cause for thought,
Fixed eye, and lingering tread,
Where, with their thousand mysteries fraught,
E'en lowliest hearts have bled?
Where, in its ever haunting thirst
For draughts of purer day,
Man's soul, with fitful strength, hath burst
The clouds that wrapt its way?

Holy to human nature seems
The long forsaken spot!
To deep affections, tender dreams,
Hopes of a brighter lot!
Therefore, in silent reverence here,
Hearth of the Dead! I stand,
Where Joy and Sorrow, Smile and Tear,
Have linked one kindred band.

CLOUDS.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

"Child of the flashing sun—
Who movest heavily on the sapphire sky,
Who crownest, as with foam the sea on high;
As the smoke of an ocean gun,
Who rollest!—Where is now the wavy blush
That dwelt upon thee?—even the fervent gush
Of gold, when the day was done!"

"Son of the earth, far down—
The gold thou askest—hath it not been thrown O'er mortal hearts?—hath not man's spirit shone
Even beneath sorrow's frown?
O'er the pale poet's harp-strings to his cheek
Hath it not poured,—a proud strength to the weak,
And faint on the regal crown?"

"Children of sun and rain,—
Thoughts of the heaven are ye, from its vast soul,
Dark—dim—light—flashing? Do not fancies roll
Even from Almighty brain,
To paint those glorious foldings? flowing then
Off from their bosoms to dreams of men,
To linger and gently wane?"

"Anxious, on distant earth,
Fancies which gild us, are reposing smiles
Wandering from distant worlds,—as on sea isles
Will rest the bird, whose birth
Was in far vales. Spirits are they, who pass
From heaven to earth, blessing man, beast, flower, grass.
And back to the sky in mirth."

"Clouds, where all glories blend—
Marshaled by day to shield the sleeping stars—
The timid Venus and the lusty Mars,
And, as an earnest friend,
To sail beside the meek consumptive moon,—
Why for the storm become ye sad so soon?
So soon your joyance end?"

"Mortals, beneath our shade!
Know ye not frowns go over all the vast,
But to leave brighter smiles when they are past:
That sorrow and death were made,
But to roll back before the eternal morn,
Dim in whose splendour, even the sun stands, shorn,
And the moon and star-beams fade?"

TO PRINTERS OF THE UNITED STATES.—FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY.—The reduced cost of the materials used in the composition of Printing Types, and the improvements and increased facilities of casting them, have induced the subscribers to adopt the following list of prices.

The style of their large and small letter is modern, and of the most elegant kind. The metal will be found very hard and durable, having a new ingredient in its composition. For accuracy and finish, the type cast at their foundry is warranted equal to any whatever. They have on hand a complete assortment of Book and Job Letters, so that they are prepared to execute orders for entire offices of Job, Newspaper, or Book Printing, on a short notice. They are thankful for the patronage they have received, and will be happy to receive the orders of printers, which will receive prompt attention.

Merchants and others who have orders from abroad, will be supplied not only with type, but with Presses, Cases, Composing Sticks, and every thing necessary for a printing establishment, and put up with care and perfect accuracy.

Their new specimen book will be published soon, and ready to be sent to printers, in which will be exhibited a greater variety than has been shown by any Foundry in the United States.

MASONICK RECORD.

NOTES ON ANTI-MASONRY.

From "Omnifarious Laws Exemplified—or, how to Curse and Swear, Lie, Cheat and Kill, according to Law!"

BY LORENZO DOW.

How few attend to the golden rule, to do to others as they would that others should do to them.

The old priest with his long face, could not see the reprobate wounded invalid; but went by—then his Levite deacon copied him, and passed by also.

But the masonick Samaritan, fulfilling the second commandment, to do to the stranger a neighbour's part—"do as you would be done by."

Then beware of judging!

Contrary to the command of God, which was to make no league with the Canaanites, but to destroy them all, the Sanhedrim, or Grand Council of seventy Elders, with Joshua at their head, swore to spare the Gibeonites—thus the Elders, as the head of the nation, plighted national faith, repugnant to the interdiction. Some hundreds of years after, Saul, as head of the nation, committed a national breach of fidelity, by slaying the Gibeonites. This act of infidelity constituted a national crime, and called for a national punishment!

In the reign of David there was a three years' famine. David enquired the cause, and obtained the answer—It is for Saul and his bloody house; because he slew the Gibeonites. Who replied silver and gold we will have none; but give us seven of the sons of Saul, and we will hang them up before the Lord in Gibeah—and God was entreated for the land.

From the foregoing we may infer the solemnity, nature and obligation of an oath; and also the meaning of the Psalmist, where he saith, (speaking of the character of a righteous man,) he that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.

The persons who publicly avow that they are perjured men; or else are impostors, can have no claim to public confidence; but must appear in their true character as LIARS—taking their word for it: which is doing them but true justice; of course, having destroyed the force of moral obligation from their minds, what trust or confidence can be placed in them? Methinks they must feel like Cain!

The Rechabites were a people of fidelity; being instructed by their forefathers to live in tents and drink no wine, they were tried and tempted by the prophet Jeremiah to drink, in vain.

Hence the promise of God for their fidelity, and obeying parental instruction for 250 years; which promise extended to generations then unborn. Jer. 35.

Judas turned traitor; was taken by the hand by those in authority, for a fool. Judas thought of honour, and flattery, and money; but when he found they had no further use for him he found himself forsaken, and was sensible of his folly—returned the money, confessed his guilt—they tauntingly replied, "what is that to us? see thou to that;" feeling his situation, in a fit of frenzy he went and hanged himself; as a warning to all traitors.

The man whose yea is yea, and whose nay is nay, inwardly feels and speaks in his heart—"Thou God seest me."

But most people have not that close, constant, inward feeling before God, as his spiritual worshippers walking before him. Hence, in this dark, stupid, thoughtless age of the world, governments and customs have thought and found it necessary to use oaths, affirmations, &c., to bring people to their feelings, in point of testimony and obligation, socially.

And what feeling is exercised on this occasion, and that which proceeds from yea and nay—they both are bottomed on the same principle of fidelity, founded on moral obligation, in their several degrees; as forms and modes alter not the nature of principles. For the principle of truth is a unit; and is as inflexible as the eternal, causeless CAUSE.

People may change, and things may change; and in the turn of times there are great changes. But principles, and truth, and the DUTY, change not.

The feelings and character of Cain, Abimelech, Judas and Benedict Arnold, should be kept in view by all professed traitors.

For if some people bribe and stimulate others to acts of treachery—yet all mankind in creation despise THE TRAITORS.

The anti-masons admit that there are masons among the Christians, Turks, and Hindoos; and they might have added, the Jews also.

The Christian masons they say, take the Holy Bible; the Turks take the "KORAN;" and the Hindoos take the "SHASTER," a book which contains the religion of Hindoostan. And they might have added, that the Jews from America to India, take "THE LAW OF MOSES and the Prophets."

Since the Reformation, if not before, those four societies pledge their faith, on the Books of their Faith, in national contracts, &c. Some feel bound by the cross, and a favourite saint, &c.

Now admitting, for argument's sake, that masons do as the anti say, concerning the different books of creeds on which fidelity is plighted. What does it argue? Why, thus much, that masonry is very ancient and extensive.

For their Creed Books, on which their religion is founded differ from each other. And the spirit which each is influenced by, from what is called religion, is indeed very BITTER against each other.

But masonry must have been anterior to those creeds which produce those things, (which excite such bitterness towards each other,) as they came subsequently upon the stage, otherwise, masonry could not have been so interwoven among them, throughout the world.

And thus, transmitted down through the different ages, in succeeding generations, in the different parts of the world.

For it is evident that the Turk would not have received it from the "Christian dog." Nor would the Jew have received it from the same source. Nor the Hindoos have taken it from the Christians, and incorporated it in their system of religion, within this few hundred years.

In the Alminian Magazine, John Wesley relates an account, circumstantially, which he says must remain among the mysteries inexplicable, till that day when all secrets shall be disclosed.

A gentleman went out one evening, and was missing. A servant in his employ, swore in court, that his mother, brothers, &c. had murdered the man—concealed him in a certain place, until they had an opportunity to fix the corpse in a proper attitude, to be carried off by the spring tide, and sink.

Such were the circumstances attending his disclosure and confession, that they were all executed, protesting their innocence till the last—except himself, who was hung in chains.

About eight years after, the gentleman came home to his family—saying, that he had been pressed by a pressgang, and sent on board a ship of war—not having an opportunity to escape sooner, nor to receive a discharge.

The case of "Boons," in Vermont, for murder—one sent to the state's prison, for life—the other under sentence of death—when the man supposed to be murdered, came back, after an absence of seven years.

How many have been executed for supposed murder, the law reports testify—and afterwards their innocence hath appeared.

So the affair of captain William Morgan—perhaps some few, who are called masons, have killed him! perhaps not. Who knows?

Those who know the tragedies of his life, with the concomitants connected, would have ground to form a judgment from the past, what he with others, would be capable of doing in the future, without giving a censorious judgment!

He was a poor man, having known masonick generosity; but now, to make merchandize of the order, associated with some others, to publish to the world, something to make the world wonder.

And the better to carry on the joke, made arrangements to go off on the credit of the masons, by duping some honest hearts for tools—like the monkey, to use the cat's paw to pull the nuts out of the fire. And thus whet up the public mind to buy the books, and make the better sale.

The duped, honest tools, confessed what they knew, and were punished accordingly—but these others, the antis say, run off, as if guilty; but, perhaps, to make the greater smoke—and hence we may infer, to share the greater profits in the farce.

The masons are accused of being associated together for base and evil purposes, by obligations of secrecy for "treason and murder."

The same accusation was produced by the Bishop of Winchester, and passed into a law, 1425, in the 3d year of Henry VI., in his minority, but without effect, for the king himself afterwards was made a mason, in riper years.

Also Robinson, of Scotland, denounced them as traitors and rebels, intending to put down all religion and government; and Abbe Barruel, in four quarto volumes, has published something, for the same purpose, and without making a proper distinction betwixt masonick and political societies. But the British government, and common sense, have not given credit to it.

The antis are partly guilty of what they accuse the masons, viz: "of being a POLITICAL SOCIETY."

The subjects of political and religious creeds are never suffered to be mentioned in a lodge; because the basis of the institution constitutionally is, to think and let think.

Hence all candidates are given to understand, previous to their admittance, that the subject does not interfere with their religion or politics. In all the meetings that I have attended, this principle of the fraternity has been kept inviolable. Therefore it is not used for political or electioneering purposes, as some do falsely charge them.

And the bold assertion, that "masons are bound to vote for each other"—or "for a brother mason, in preference to all others," &c. is false. Also to keep the secrets of a brother mason, of "treason and murder," is false, as far as my knowledge extends—from the "Masters' Lodge," of three degrees; "the Chapter," of five degrees; "Council," of three degrees; "Encampment," of four degrees; up into the "Consistory," of thirty-three degrees, &c., and about twenty "side degrees," also.

Beverly Allen, a Methodist preacher, shot the sheriff at Augusta, in Georgia; the Presbyterian minister killed his elder, and was hung in Pennsylvania; the Baptist preacher killed his wife in the state of New-York, and got hung; the Independents, or Congregationalists hung the Quakers, at Boston, and put to death twenty persons for witchcraft, at Salem, who, no doubt, were more innocent than themselves.

Shall any one have the hardihood to condemn the whole of a society, because some of its members have acted incorrectly? Where would be the wisdom or justice in so doing?

And to blame all the masons, for the seeming misconduct of a few, would be equal injustice to the fraternity. For their constitution contains no such principles as are alleged against them, and laid to their charge—and which has been discovered, by the craft, in their official capacity to a candid world.

The distinction between political societies, and the masonick, is not made sufficiently by those who attempt to judge upon the subject.

The "Washington Society," connected with "Henryism," and the "Hartford Convention," were purely political.

So the "United Irishmen," and the "Orange Men," in 1798, were political; one being for liberty and the other for the king. But when a freemason, on the point of being cut down by the sword, a friend hath stepped forward and saved his life—shows the principle to be bottomed on humanity.

Congress sit with "closed doors," and request the president to communicate documents not consistent to be made public.

The Quakers keep closed doors against all not of their society, in meetings of business—both monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings.

The different denominations do their business among themselves, in matters that concern themselves only. If so, why condemn the masons? The true meaning of a secret society is, when the existence of the society is kept secret, as well as their deeds—not when the existence is avowed, and only the forms of proceeding are not divulged.

If the forms of masonry are secret, the society is not; but is accessible to all who have the qualifications of honesty and intelligence, who wish to gain them.

Conclusion next week.

MASONICK CEREMONIES.

The following account of the celebration of the day which marked the completion of a full century since a name and a place were allotted to the city of Baltimore, and also of the laying of the First Stone of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail Road, is from the Baltimore American of the 20th inst.

THE CENTENARY CELEBRATION.

Agreeably to arrangements, the citizens assembled in Monument Square on Saturday morning for the purpose of celebrating the day which marked the completion of a full century since a name and a place were allotted to the City of Baltimore. The elevation in front of the eastern end of the Court House was occupied with rows of seats, for the accommodation of those who were specially invited to be present on the occasion, including His Excellency Governor MARTIN and Aids, Messrs. CARROLL and LOCKERMAN, the President and Directors of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail-Road Company, the Reverend Clergy, the Judges of the Courts, the members of the Corporation, the Juvenile Associations, and others. In the centre of the elevation was erected the rostrum for the Orator of the day. It was surmounted by a portrait of the venerable Charles Carroll of Carrollton, encircled with the following inscription:—

"The only Surviving Signer, July 4, 1776."

CARROLL.

Over the portrait was inscribed in large characters the motto—

AGRICULTURE—COMMERCE—MANUFACTURES.

At each end of the elevation was placed a staff bearing the Star-spangled Banner.

The exercises of the day were opened by music from a full band stationed in the rear, playing "Lafayette's welcome." After which the Reverend Mr. SUTHERN advanced to the front of the rostrum, and uttered a Prayer in which piety of sentiment and appropriate allusion to the peculiar occasion were happily blended. At the termination of this service, the band played "Hail Columbia." The Orator of the day, WM. GEORGE READ, esq. then arose, and commenced the delivery of an Address which was listened to throughout with great attention, and at intervals marked with the general plaudits of the auditors.

At the conclusion of the Address, the band performed Washington's March and Yankee Doodle, when the exercises in the Square were terminated.

RAIL-ROAD PROCESSION.

About half past nine o'clock the Procession preparatory to the laying of the First Stone of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail road was formed at the Masonick Hall in St. Paul's street. The line of march was taken up in the following order. A corps of Pioneers took the front, bearing on their shoulders their Axes, Picks and Spades. Succeeding these was a wagon bearing the First Stone, and the apparatus necessary for its removal and deposit at its destined spot. On one side of the Stone was inscribed the date, "August 8, 1829," and on the other the initials of the Company, "B. S. R. R." The top of the Stone bore a like inscription.

The Principal Engineer, W. F. SMALL, esq. followed, supported by the assistant engineers bearing the various instruments of the profession. The Association of Stone Masons and Bricklayers followed next, wearing appropriate badges and aprons. The handsome banner of the Association was borne in its front.

The Masonick Fraternity came next, arranged in the following order, and attended by marshals on foot and on horseback:—

Winder Lodge in front
Tyler, with a drawn sword, light blue sash.
Two Stewards, white rods and white sashes.
Entered Apprentices, two and two.

Follow Crafts, two and two.
Master Masons, two and two.

Treasurer and Secretary, jewels of office, white rolls.
Junior and Senior Wardens, jewels, columns, light blue sashes.
Junior Deacon, MASTER, Senior Deacon,
Jewel, blue rod, Jewel and Mallet, Jewel, blue rod,
Light blue sash, Purple Sash, Light blue sash.

The several Lodges followed in the same order, taking rank according to seniority. The Encampment of Knights Templar came next, having in their centre the distinguished banner of the Order. The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of Maryland succeeded, the Chapter being formed in the following manner:

Grand Janitor, crimson sash, drawn sword.
Two Grand Stewards, crimson sash, red rods.
Grand Captain of Host, crimson sash, drawn sword
Three Grand Captains of Veils, crimson sashes, carrying their respective Banners.
Grand Principal Sojourner and Grand Royal Arch Captain, carrying white wands.
Scribes and Kings of Subordinate Chapters, crimson sashes.
Grand Chaplain, white sash.
Grand Treasurer and Grand Secretary, crimson sashes.
Past Grand Scribes and Grand Kings, two and two, crimson sashes.
Grand Officers, from Sister Grand Chapters, two and two, crimson sashes.
Grand Scribe and Grand King, with sceptres, crimson sashes.
Past and Present Deputy Grand High Priests, with fasces, crimson sashes.
Past Grand High Priests, crimson sashes, carrying Aaron's rod.

Grand Pursuivant, High Priest, Grand Pursuivant, crimson sash, with the breast, crimson sash,
drawn sword, plate, drawn sword,
Two Grand Stewards, crimson sashes, red rods.

A Band of Music was stationed in this part of the line of procession, and after it came the Grand Lodge of Maryland, the State Executive, the President and Directors of the Susquehanna Rail-road Company, and the Orator, E. L. FINLEY esq.—in the order here designated—

Grand Tyler, purple sash, drawn sword.
Two Grand Pursuivants, purple sashes, drawn swords.
Junior and Senior Wardens from the country, two and two; jewels of office.

Past Masters, two and two, purple sashes, jewels of office.
Worshipful Masters of Lodges from the country, purple sashes, jewels of office.

Three Great Lights in a triangle, carried by three Past Masters, purple sashes, jewels of office,
Silver Vessels, with Wine and Oil, carried by two Past Masters, purple sashes, jewels of office.

Concupia, carried by a Past Master, supported by two Past Masters carrying garlands of flowers, purple sashes, jewels of office.

Past Worshipful Junior and Senior Grand Wardens, two and two, purple sashes and jewels.

Worshipful Junior and Senior Grand Wardens, purple sashes, columns, and jewels of office.
Grand Officers of sister Grand Lodges, purple sashes and jewels of office.

GOVERNOR AND COUNCIL OF MARYLAND.
Right Worshipful Deputy Grand Master, purple sash, column, jewel of office.

THE ORATOR OF THE DAY,
Br. E. L. Finley, white sash.

The President and Directors of the Susquehanna Rail-Road, Past Most Worshipful Grand Master.
Purple Sashes and Jewels of Office.

Junior Grand Deacon, Most Worshipful Senior Grand Jewel, purple sash, GRAND MASTER, Deacon, jewel, black rod, jewel, gavel, purple sash, black rod.

Grand Sword Bearer, purple sash.
Two Grand Stewards, white rods, purple sashes.
Mayor and City Council,
Officers of the Corporation.

The Juvenile Associations, distinguished by their appropriate banners, and conducted by their marshals, closed the line of procession. The Procession moved through the streets which had been designated, and at about eleven o'clock reached the spot in the vicinity of the Falls Turnpike road where the Susquehanna Rail-road was to be formally commenced.

The spot selected for the laying of the First Stone was a short distance west of the Turnpike, and south of the first gate, on a piece of gently rising ground. From this point a section of the Rail-road had been graduated in a northern direction for the distance of a quarter to a half mile. Immediately in the vicinity of the spot prepared for the reception of the Stone was erected a platform with seats and a rostrum, handsomely decorated with flags, evergreens, &c. At one end was erected a flag staff bearing the American flag, and beneath it were placed the portraits of Washington, Jefferson, and other worthies of the Revolution. At either end of the rear of the platform was the representation of a turret, surmounted by a Rail-road Car bearing a banner. That on the left hand was inscribed "1729," and that on the right, "1829." In front of the turrets were tablets with the following inscriptions:—

1729,	1829,
Population	Population
43.	80,000.
Area	Area
60	9,300
Acres.	Acres.

As the procession approached the platform, the several bodies arranged themselves in front, and the Governor and Suite, the officers of the Rail-road Company and of the Masonick Fraternity, the Orator, the Reverend Clergy, and others, repaired to the seats allotted to them on the platform. While the Stone was preparing for removal from the car to its intended place of deposit, some appropriate airs were performed by the band. The Stone was then lowered into its place by the Association of Stone-Masons and Bricklayers. A Prayer suited to the occasion was then delivered by the Rev. Grand Chaplain WILLIAMS; after which the President of the Rail-road Company, GEO. WINCHESTER, esq. made a short explanatory address. The officers of the Grand Lodge of Maryland then advanced to the Stone, which was adjusted by Col. WILLIAM STEUART, Deputy Grand Master, in due masonic form. The Gavel used for this purpose was the identical instrument employed by General Washington, in laying the corner stone of the Capitol at the seat of the General Government. A prayer was now delivered by the Rev. Mr. REYNOLDS of Harrisburgh; which was succeeded by the reading of the following silver inscription plate by the Grand Marshal:—

IN COMMEMORATION of the Commencement of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail Road,
THIS STONE

Was placed on the 8th day of August, A. D. 1829, by

The Grand Lodge of Maryland,

under the direction of the President and Directors of the Rail Road Company,

Being the first hundredth Anniversary of BALTIMORE.

Which was laid out under an act of the Assembly of the Province of Maryland,

Passed on the 8th day of August, 1729.

On the other side of the Plate was the following:—

In the 54th year of the Independence of the United States:
Andrew Jackson, President of the U. S.
Daniel Martin, Governor of Maryland;
Jacob Small, Mayor of the City of Baltimore;
George Winchester, President of the Rail Road

Company:
James L. Hawkins, Thomas Finlay,
Sheppard C. Loakin, James Howard,
Justus Hoppie, William Jenkins,
James B. Stansbury, James C. Gittings,
Robert Purviance, Henry Didier,
John Keiso, Directors.

Wm. F. Small, Engineer.

The deposits were then placed in the cavity of the stone, consisting of the inscription plate, and a glass jar containing the newspapers of the day, coins bearing date nearest to the present period, &c. The upper stone was then affixed and cemented by the Association, and the officers of the Grand Lodge then resumed their seats on the platform. The Orator of the Day, E. L. FINLEY, esq. then arose, and delivered an address which is spoken of as an effort of talent richly meriting the high praise which it elicited.

The ceremonies being ended, the line of march was again taken up. The Procession passed along the section of the Road now graduated, and descending the hill, crossed Jones' Falls at the turnpike gate, and came down on the east side of the Falls, passing the Landvale Cotton Factory, to the York Turnpike. Entering the city by this avenue, it passed down Gay to Baltimore street, and thence to the Masonick Hall, where it was dismissed.

CICERI AND MR. MAELZEL.

Our readers have often heard of Ciceri and Mr. Maelzel; and they will, no doubt, be pleased to see an account of the very ingenious method by which the latter procured from the former the beautiful Diorama of the Cathedral of Reims. It is thus related:—Previous to his departure from this place, Mr. Maelzel conceived the idea of opening to our citizens a diorama of the interior of a church, upon a plan entirely new, introducing into it, after his own peculiar and happy manner, animated figures and music. But who should do the painting, or could execute it in the shortest period, and at the same time render it a masterpiece of art, was the first question to be settled. He thought of his friend Ciceri, the most celebrated artist in Paris; and Ciceri, said he, upon reflection, must paint my diorama. Now Ciceri is a man of great wealth, as well as extraordinary talent; and like most men of genius, would rather employ his pencil for fame than money: In a word—he paints only when he pleases. All this Mr. Maelzel was aware of; but, nevertheless, he determined his Diorama should be the effort of Ciceri, or he would have none at all. Accordingly, the moment he arrived in Paris, he called upon Ciceri; and, after the usual salutations had passed between them, thus addressed him:—"My dear sir, I have come all the way from the United States to request you to paint me a Diorama of the Cathedral of Reims, which, with my Automata, and Melodium, I desire to exhibit to my friends in the Republic. If you will execute it, you will give me much pleasure; if you cannot, I must take passage in the same packet that brought me to Havre, and return directly to America, where I have left my Automata Chess Player, Trumpeter, and Conflagration of Moscow."

This very handsome appeal to the ambition of the artist had the desired effect; and shaking him very cordially by the hand, Ciceri promised Mr. Maelzel, that he would certainly comply with his wishes. He commenced his labours without delay; and by the aid of that singular skill and industry, which he possesses in so eminent a degree above the members of his profession, Ciceri was enabled, in less than six months, to complete the "interior of the Cathedral of Reims." Several of his personal acquaintance were privately admitted to see it. They were struck with astonishment at the perfect illusion it produced; and, pronouncing it a chef d'œuvre of perspective design and brilliant colouring, they one and all desired it to be exhibited in Paris. But Mr. Maelzel had already departed for America; and Ciceri had pledged his word to send on the picture as soon as it was finished: accordingly it was packed up with the utmost care and expedition, and transmitted by the ship Charlemagne. It was received in the most perfect state; and now, for the first time in any part of the world, it is opened in this city, in a building prepared for its reception. After it shall have closed here, the friends of Ciceri have requested that it may be returned to France. There the price of admission will be five francs; here Mr. Maelzel has been persuaded to put it at 25 cents!

A NEW BAROMETER.

Observations on a leech, by a gentleman in England, who kept one several years, for the purpose of a weather glass. A phial of water, containing a leech, was kept in the lower frame of a chamber window-sash, so that, when I looked in the morning, I could know what would be the weather on the following day.

If the weather prove serene and beautiful, the leeches lies motionless at the bottom of the glass, and rolled together in a spiral form.

If it rain before or after noon, it is found crept up to the top of its lodging, and there remains till the weather is settled.

If we are to have wind, the poor prisoner gallops through its limpid habitation with amazing swiftness, and seldom rests till it begins to blow hard.

If a remarkable storm of thunder and rain is to succeed, for some days before, it lodges almost continually without the water, and discovers uneasiness in violent throws and convulsive motions.

In the frost, as in clear weather, it lies at the bottom—and in snow, as in rainy weather, it pitches its dwelling upon the very mouth of the phial.

The leech was kept in an eight ounce phial, about three-fourths filled with water. In the summer the water was changed once a week, and in the winter once a fortnight. [London Casket.]

ANCIENT AND MODERN NAMES OF PLANTS.

The culling of herbs and simples, and compounding preparations from them, to relieve the suffering of nature were the first rudiments of all our knowledge, the most grateful exertion of human talent, and after food and clothing, the most necessary objects of life. In ages of simplicity, when every man was the usual dispenser of good or bad, benefit or injury, to his household or his cattle, ere the veterinary art was known, or the drugs of other regions introduced, necessity looked up to the products of our clime, and the real or fanciful virtues of them were called to the trial, and manifests the reasonableness of bestowing upon plants and herbs such names as might immediately indicate their several uses or fitness for application; when distinctive characters, had they been given, would have been little attended to; and hence the numbers found favourable to the cure of particular complaints, the ailments of domestick creatures, or deemed injurious to them. Modern science may wrap up the meaning of its epithets in Greek or Latin terms; but in very many cases they are the mere translations of these despised "old vulgar names."—What pleasure it must have afforded the poor sufferer in body or in limb, what confidence he must have felt for relief, when he knew that the good neighbour who came to bathe his wounds, or assuage his inward torments, brought with him such things as "all-heal, break-stone, bruise-wort, gout-weed, fever-few," (fugio,) and twenty other such comfortable mitigators of his affliction; why, their very names almost would charm away the sense of pain. The modern recipe contains no such terms of comfortable assurance, its meaning are all dark to the sufferer, its influence unknown. And then the good herbalist of old professed to have plants which were "all-good;" they could assuage anger by their "loose strife;" they had "honesty, true-love, and, and heart's-ease." The cayennes, the soys, the catsups, and extra-tropical condiments of these days were not required, when the next thicket would produce "poor man's pepper, sance-alone, and hedge-mustard;" and the woods and wilds around, when they yielded such delicate viands as "fat hue, lamb's quarters, way-bread, butter and eggs, with codlins and cream," afforded no despicable bill of fare. No one ever yet thought of accusing our old simplers of the vice of avarice or the love of lucre; yet their "thrift" is always to be seen; we have their humble "pennywort, herb twopence, moneywort, silverweed, and gold." We may smile perhaps, at the cognomens, or the commemorations of friendships, or of worth, recorded by the old simplers, and their herbs, "Bennet, Robert, Christopher, Gerard, or Basil," but do the names so bestowed by modern science read better, or sound better! it has "Lightfootia, Lapeyroussia, Hedwigia, Schkuhria, Schuchzeria;" and surely we may admit, in common benevolence, such partialities as "good King Henry, sweet William, sweet Marjory, sweet Cicely, Lettuce, Mary Gold, and Rose." There are epithets however, so very extraordinary, that we must consider them as mere perversions, or, at least, incapable of explanation at this period. The terms of modern science waver daily; names undergo an annual change, fade with the leaf, and give place to others; but the ancient terms, which some may ridicule, have remained for centuries, and will yet remain till nature is swallowed up by art. No; let our ancient herbalists, "a grave and whiskered race," retain the honours due to their labours, which were most needful and important ones at those periods; by them were many of the casualties and sufferings of man and beast relieved; and by aid of perseverance, better constitutions to act upon, and faith to operate, than we possess, they, probably, effected cures which we moderns should fail to accomplish, if attempted.

CHINESE CHARACTER.

The same flourish, or character, of the Chinese, stands for an adulterous woman, and for traitorous correspondence. It is curious that the Jewish prophets should continually employ this very metaphor; and describe as the adultery of Jerusalem, that traitorous correspondence with the Egyptian court, which tended to separate Palestine from the Babylonians. Were these characters already employed throughout civilized Asia? Were they those of which the Jewess Maria (Cyncelli Chronographia, anno 5058, page 248), taught the use to Democritus of Abdera? If so, they would throw light on the hieroglyphs of the Egyptians, and derive historick elucidation from them.

HISTORICAL.

From the New York Courier and Enquirer.

THE DISCOVERY OF HUDSON RIVER, AND THE VOYAGE OF HENDRICK HUDSON THROUGH THE HIGHLANDS.

I know of nothing more entertaining than the simple narrative of Hendrick Hudson, describing his discovery of that proud river which bears his name, and is the boast of New-Yorkers. It was in the month of September, in 1609. Much as he admired its spacious bay, and beautiful scenery, and the abundance of fine mullet which its waters supplied, he was not thrown off his guard by this new and enchanting picture, but had no sooner anchored off the then wood-covered shores of Manna-hata, than he adopted, as it were by the instinctive prudence of an Englishman, all the necessary precautions against the treachery of the savages who came in their canoes to visit him. He was indeed forewarned of the necessity of watching them with the utmost vigilance, by what happened to the boat's crew which he sent the day after his arrival, September 5, to explore the passage which led to Hell-gate. Colman, who commanded the boat in that notable excursion, was shot in the throat by an arrow from an Indian canoe, somewhere in the neighbourhood of that dangerous straight, and his body brought down and buried with proper ceremonies. They related to Hudson that they had gone as far as the open sea, (Long Island Sound) and that the shores of the River (East River) were covered with grass and flowers, and goodly trees; and the air perfumed with the sweet smells which blew from them; that they were regaled with dried currants by the natives, and altogether delighted, apparently, with the appearance of the country, since so beautifully realized in its picturesque scenery of villas and lawns, and parks, and cultivated fields. The natives came on board the ship with maize or Indian wheat, beans, oysters, &c., and were clothed in mantles of fur of panthers. On the 12th, the ship being still anchored in the bay, twenty-eight canoes, full of men, women and children, came alongside. Hendrick, with the true spirit of enterprise, did not delay his time here, but soon got under weigh, to follow the course of the great river which he saw leading up by the mountain wall of the Pallisadoes, far towards the north, and which he little thought then would bear his name, and be the seat of a great city, and the thoroughfare of the world. He remarked the extraordinary passage through the mountains, and those loftier summits which are seen farther from the river, at what is now known as Catskill. Near this latter place, he was visited by several of what he calls the Governours [Sachems] of the different tribes that then occupied the banks of the river, all of whom, with their people, he found of friendly disposition, bringing platters of venison, beaver and other skins, and grapes, in return for knives and hatchets. Two young maidens, of about 17, also came on board, with their fathers, and behaved themselves very modestly. To one of the Sachemes they poured out such copious libations of wine and acquavite, [brandy] that he became quite intoxicated, much to the astonishment of his brethren, and was thereby obliged to remain several days in the cabin. Hendrick, in witnessing this novel experiment, did not contemplate how much the god of wine would afterwards be worshipped in this part of the empire of Neptune, in the bar-rooms of steamboats, packets and skippers. On their return through the Highlands, whose many points, narrow channel, and eddy winds he takes notice of, and where he encounters a stiff gale, an accident occurred of quite a romantick nature. A canoe with one man in it was constantly hanging under the stern of the ship, until at length, by the aid of the rudder, he crept into the cabin window, and stole out several Hendrick's shirts and handkerchiefs; whereupon the master's mate, says Henry, shot at him and killed him. The rest in the canoes, through fear, jumped into the water, and after Hendrick's men had recovered the stolen goods, one of the Indians, who swimming, caught hold of the boat, and tried to turn it over, "but our cook took a sword, and cut off one of his hands, and he was drowned." The first time that the waters of this limpid river had, by the hand of a white man, drank of the blood of a human victim. Hereafter to be the theatre of many a war exploit, and historical recollection. Its bosom whitened with the canvas of military expedition; its mountain passes echoing to the sound of the bugle, and the roar of artillery; the scene of Andre's capture, the storming of Stony Point, &c.

The people of the mountain, says he, came on board wondering at our ships and weapons. But they did not seem to have acquired an adequate notion of the power and advantage which civilized modes of warfare possess over bows and arrows. In the pass of the Highlands, some followed after the ship in canoes, and shot their arrows at her stern, and some hundreds who had collected there, on a point of land, tried their skill at the same exercise, to see what impression they could make upon this strange visitor. "There, (says Hendrick) with inimitable sang froid, I shot a falcon at them, and killed two of them."

Hendrick speaks of the steep precipices of the Highlands conjectured from their bear appearance, that the trees had been blasted, and that they contained metals. It would seem that he thought, in the language of alchemy, the chemistry of that day, that the spirit of the metallick substance had "buried," as he expresses it, or destroyed the vegetation.

A whitish green colour on similar rocks near what is now called Spiten-devil, made him suspect they contained copper and silver. Far above the Highlands, they met with shoals, the overslaugh upon which they several times grounded. Frequently they had wind and rain, though the weather was generally fair and hot, and he observes also that the bottom where they anchored, was often oozy. In the Highlands, they found fine salmon, and somewhere by the town now called after him, they went ashore, and gathered chestnuts.

THE LEGENDARY.

From Flint's "Western Monthly Review," for July.

MIKE FINK, THE LAST OF THE BOATMEN.

MIKE FINK was born in Pittsburgh, Pa. where his brothers, &c. still reside. He had but little knowledge of letters, especially of their sounds and powers, as his orthography was very bad, and he usually spelled his name Mische Phinck, whilst his father spelled his with an F. When he was young, the witchery, which is in the tone of a wooden trumpet, called a river horn, formerly used by keel and flat boat navigators on the western waters, entranced the soul of Mike, while yet a boy; and he longed to become a boatman. This soon became his ruling passion; and he served as a boatman on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and their tributary streams, which occupation he pursued until this sort of men were thrown out of employment by the general use of steam boats. When Mike first set foot on a keel boat, he could mimic all the tones of a trumpet, and he longed to go to New Orleans, where he heard the people spoke French and wore their Sunday clothes every day. He served out his pupilage with credit. When the Ohio was too low for navigation, Mike spent most of his time in the neighbourhood of Pittsburgh, killing squirrels with his rifle, and shooting at a target for beef at the frequent Saturday shooting matches, and company musters of the militia. He soon became famous as "the best shot in the country," and was called bang-all, and on that account was frequently excluded from participating in matches for beef; for which exclusion he claimed, and obtained the fifth quarter of the beef, as it is called, (the hide and tallow,) for his forbearance. His usual practice was to sell his fifth quarter to the tavern or dram shop keeper for whiskey, with which he "treated" every body present, partaking largely himself. He became fond of strong drink, but was never overpowered by its influence. He could drink a gallon of it in twenty-four hours, without the effect being perceivable. His language was a perfect sample of the half horse and half alligator dialect of the then race of boatmen. He was, also, a wit; and on that account he gained the admiration, and excited the fears of all the fraternity of boatmen; for he usually enforced his wit with a sound drubbing, if any one dared to dissent, by neglecting, or refusing to laugh at his jokes; for as he used to say, he told his jokes on purpose to be laughed at in a good humoured way, and that no man should "make light" of them. The consequence was, Mike always had a chosen band of laughing philosophers about him. An eye bunged up and a dilapidated nose, or ear, was sure to win Mike's sympathy and favour, for Mike made proclamation—"I am a salt river roarer; and I love the winking, and as how I'm chock-full of fight," &c. so he was in truth, for he had a chere amie in every port, which he visited, and always had a circle of worshippers around him, who would fight their deaths, (as they called it) for him. Amongst these, were two men, Carpenter and Talbot, Mike's fast friends, and particular confidants. Each was a match for the other, in prowess, in fight, or skill in shooting, for Mike had diligently trained them to all these virtues and mysteries. Carpenter and Talbot, figure hereafter. Mike's weight was about one hundred and eighty pounds; height about five feet nine inches; broad round face, pleasant features, brown skin, tanned by sun and rain; blue, but very expressive eyes, inclining to grey; broad white teeth, and square brawny form, well proportioned, and every muscle of the arms, thighs and legs, were fully developed, indicating the greatest strength and activity. His person, taken altogether, was a model for a Hercules, except as to size. He first visited St. Louis, as a keel boat man, in the year 1814 or 1815, and occasionally afterwards, till 1822, when he joined Henry and Ashley's company of Missouri trappers. Many shooting feats of Mike's are related here by persons, who profess to have witnessed them. In ascending the Mississippi above the mouth of the Ohio, he saw a sow with eight or nine pigs on the river bank; he declared in boatman phrase, he wanted a pig, and took up his rifle to shoot one; but was requested not to do so. Mike, however, laid his rifle to his face and shot at each pig successively, as the boat glided up the river under easy sail, about forty or fifty yards from the shore, and cut off their tails close to their rumps, without doing them any other harm. In 1821, a short time before he ascended the Missouri with Henry and Ashley's company, being on his boat at the landing in this port, he saw a negro lad standing on the river bank, heedlessly gaping, in great wonderment at the show about him. This boy had a strange sort of foot and heel, peculiar to some races of the Africans. His heel protruded several inches in the rear of the leg, so as to leave nearly as much of the foot behind as before it. This unshapely foot offended Mike's eye, and outraged his ideas of symmetry so much, that he determined to correct it. He took aim with his rifle, some thirty paces distant, at the boy's unfortunate heel, and actually shot it away. The boy fell, crying murder, and badly wounded. Mike was indicted in the circuit court of this county for the offence, and was found guilty by a jury. I have myself seen the record of the court. It appeared in evidence, that Mike's justification of the offence was, "that the fellow's long heel prevented him from wearing a genteel boot." His particular friend, Carpenter, was, also, a great shot; and he and Mike used to fill a tin cup with whiskey, and place it on their heads by turns, and shoot at it with a rifle, at the distance of seventy yards. It was always bored through, without injury to the one, on whose head it was placed. This was often performed; and they liked the feat the better, because it showed their confidence in each other.

In 1822, Mike and his two friends, Carpenter and Talbot, engaged in St. Louis with Henry and Ashley, to go up the Missouri with them, in the three-fold capacity of boatmen, trappers, and hunters. The first year a company of about sixty, ascended as high as the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, where they built a fort for the purposes of trade and security. From this place small detachments of men, ten or twelve in a company, were sent out to hunt and trap on the tributary streams of the Missouri and Yellow stones. Mike and his two friends, and nine others were sent to the Muscle Shell river, a tributary of the Yellow Stone, when the winter set in. Mike and company returned to a place near the mouth of the Yellow Stone; and preferring to remain out of the fort, they dug a hole, or cave in the bluff bank of the river, for a winter house, in which they resided, during the winter. This proved a warm and commodious habitation, protecting the inmates from winds and snow. Here Mike and his friend Carpenter quarrelled a deadly quarrel, the cause of which is not certainly known, but was thought to have been caused by a rivalry in the good graces of a squaw. The quarrel was smothered for the time, by the interposition of mutual friends. On the return of spring, the party revisited the fort, where Mike and Carpenter, over a cup of whiskey, revived the recollection of their past quarrel; but made a treaty of peace, which was to be solemnized by their usual trial of shooting the cup of whiskey from off each other's heads, as their custom was. This was at once the test of mutual reconciliation and renewed confidence. A question remained to be settled; who should have the first shot. To determine this, Mike proposed to "sky a copper" with Carpenter; that is, to throw up a copper. This was done, and Mike won the first shot. Carpenter seemed to be fully aware of Mike's unforgiving temper, and treacherous intent, for he declared, that he was sure Mike would kill him. But Carpenter scorned life too much, to purchase it by a breach of his solemn compact, in refusing to stand the test. Accordingly, he prepared to die. He bequeathed his gun, shot pouch, and powder horn, his belt, pistols and wages to Talbot, in case he should be killed. They went to the fatal plain, and whilst Mike loaded his rifle, and picked his flint, Carpenter filled his tin cup with whiskey to the brim, and without changing his features, he placed it on his devoted head, as a target for Mike to shoot at. Mike levelled his rifle at the head of Carpenter, at the distance of sixty yards. After drawing a bead, he took down his rifle from his face, and smilingly said, "Hold your noddle steady, Carpenter, and don't spill the whisky, as I shall want some presently!" He again raised, cocked his piece, and in an instant, Carpenter fell, and expired without a groan. Mike's ball had penetrated the forehead of Carpenter in the center, about an inch and a half above the eyes. He coolly set down his rifle, and applying the muzzle to his mouth blew the smoke out of the touch hole without saying a word—keeping his eye steadily on the fallen body of Carpenter. His first words were, "Carpenter! have you spilt the whiskey?" He was then told that he had killed Carpenter. "It is all an accident," said Mike, "for I took as fair a bead on the black spot on the cup, as I ever took on a squirrel's eye. How did it happen?" He then cursed the gun, the powder, the bullet, and finally himself.

This catastrophe, (in a country where the strong arm of the law cannot reach,) passed off for an accident; and Mike was permitted to go at large, under the belief that Carpenter's death was the result of contingency. But Carpenter had a fast friend in Talbot, who only waited a fair opportunity to revenge his death. No opportunity offered for some months after, until one day, Mike in a fit of gasconading, declared to Talbot, that he did kill Carpenter on purpose, and that he was glad of it. Talbot instantly drew from his belt a pistol, (the same which had belonged to Carpenter,) and shot Mike through the heart. Mike fell to the ground, and expired without a word. Talbot, also, went unpunished, as no body had authority, or inclination to call him to account. Truth was, Talbot was as ferocious and dangerous, as the grizzly bear of the prairies. About three months after, Talbot was present in the battle with the Aurickarees, in which Col. Leavenworth commanded, where he displayed a coolness, which would have done honour to a better man. He came out of the battle unharmed. About ten days after, he was drowned in the Titan river, in attempting to swim it. Thus ended, "the last of the boatmen."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

THE INFLUENCE OF CLIMATE ON NATIONAL CHARACTER.

An oration pronounced by Professor Schouw, at the solemn opening of the Winter Session, 1823-29, of the University of Copenhagen.

In order to eradicate the common error, which induces us to consider nature as the almost exclusive modeller of the character of nations, it is of paramount importance we should carefully keep in view, that even in the physical world, however obvious an influence they may produce, the climate, soil, and natural constitution of a country, are by no means capable of explaining all the appearances which will claim the enquirer's attention. This observation applies with peculiar force to the distribution of the various families of the vegetable and animal kingdoms over the surface of the earth. It is impossible to explain on such a datum, why England and Van Diemen's Land, though similarly circumstanced as to climate, should differ so widely in respect of their animal and vegetable productions; or why the Flora of southern Africa should possess so distinct a character from that of the northern parts of the African continent, or the flowers of New Holland be so essentially peculiar to its own soil. Much less will climate or soil enable us to account for the corporeal distinctions which characterise the several races or families of mankind. We know it is customary to ascribe the dark complexion of the negro to the extraordinary heat of the solar ray in his native clime; but do not the olive-coloured Hindoo and the fairer-complexioned tenant of the isles of the South Seas inhabit similar latitudes? or does the negro's skin become less sable when exposed to the less scorching skies of Jamaica or the Floridas? Though surrounded by the same meteorological circumstances, there is a striking dissimilarity in the complexional characteristics of the European, the Asiatic, and the aboriginal Indian of North America: the natives of Greenland and Lapland possess a darker skin than their European brethren, and the inhabitant of Van Diemen's Land, though living beneath a temperate sky, is of a complexion not far removed from black. We shall find ourselves at a similar loss in the attempt to deduce other variations from the customary premises to which I have alluded: the woolly locks of the negro, the lofty stature of the Patagonian, the slender frame of the Papu, or the little twinkling eye of the Chinese, can in nowise be charged to the account of the climate, or referred to the nature of the soil. If we follow up the influence of physical causes on isolated individuals, we shall find ourselves equally sinning against every rational assumption, should we venture to deduce the mental attributes of any one human race from such causes. In the same country, in the same spot, nay, under the same roof, we meet with individuals entirely differing from each other in their intellectual features; but it would be ridiculous to ascribe the dissimilitude to the effects of climate, food, or beverage. Intellect does not resemble the anana; it can neither be nurtured nor called into existence by artificial heat.

In looking at the characteristics of nations, it is impossible not to observe the marked shades of diversity which sever one people from another, even where the climate is precisely similar, or not essentially different. The Europeans cultivate the soil, dwell in towns, live under regular forms of government, and, in general, are devoted to the arts and sciences; whereas most of the Asiatick regions, where the circumstances of climate are similar, are tenanted by nomadick tribes, who derive their livelihood from rearing cattle, are entire strangers to social polity, and have no conception of a more advanced state of civilization; whilst the aborigines of North America are untutored savages, wandering from spot to spot, from wood to plain. The feeble, peaceable, thrifty Hindoo lives beneath a climate scarcely differing from that which is breathed by the athletic, fierce, and lazy negro, or the miserable indigenes of South America, whose wild exterior and uncouth gestures excite both pity and aversion. The Chinese are, in every respect, strikingly dissimilar from any other nation surrounded by the same natural circumstances; and the proud and ingenious Briton possesses few characteristics in common with the poor, timid inhabitant of Van Diemen's Land. We find the most discordant masses intermixed and living together under the same sky; in the innermost parts of Africa the Arabian dwelling with the negro, and far surpassing the latter in every mental endowment; in its southern districts, the Caffre hordling with the Hottentot, with whom he has no earthly similitude; and towards the northernmost confines of Scandinavia, the Laplander hutting with the Swede and Norwegian.

If we weigh the effect of physical circumstances, to which is usually attributed the formation of national character, it will be found to depend neither necessarily nor demonstrably upon the influences ascribed to them: on the contrary, we shall frequently find the closest affinity of character existing where those circumstances wear the most widely diverse of aspects. A clear atmosphere is held to foster gentleness of manners, and give vitality to art and science; and Greece and Italy are cited in proof of the justness of this inference. The surface of the globe, however, will show us many a country where the atmosphere is more rarefied than in those regions; and such are the islands of the South Seas, or the elevated plains of Peru, Quito, or Mexico: yet in these, where shall we discover the manners and intellectual energy of the olden Greeks? Whilst under the dense and humid sky of England, man has reached a state of intellectual advancement to which few other nations have attained. Again; large rivers are esteemed conducive to the interchange of social relation, and, consequently, to human civilization; and the proofs of this argument are drawn from the Nile and the Indus. Now, the largest streams which exist are those of South America, along whose banks the uncivilized Indian toils for a bare and miserable existence; whilst the Dane, who is scarcely inferior to the most intelligent of his contemporaries, treads a soil unfertilised by a single stream. The Mediterranean is brought forward to exhibit the propitious influence attending large masses of water encompassed by land; yet where shall we discover the minutest traces of civilization along the capacious lakes of North America, around the Caspian, or among the numberless thickly-studded isles of the Indian Seas? The coasts of the Cattegat, where social intercourse is impeded by storms, and sand-banks, and floating fields of ice, are ennobled by those civil institutions and mental energies, which will be sought after in vain among the islands of that ocean, on which the name of "the Pacific" has been appropriately bestowed.

The slender influence derivable from climate will become still more apparent, when it is recollected, that nations which have abandoned their native soil, and sought a home under stranger skies, have undergone no change whatever in their character. Among the colonists who have settled in the interior of the colony at the Cape of Good Hope, there is no difficulty in recognizing the Dutchman; yet his dwelling stands on an elevated plain, which is celebrated for the dryness of its soil and atmosphere, whilst his ancestors toiled in a land, damp as it was flat and low, and enveloped in a dense atmosphere of fog. In India we shall find as little difficulty in detecting the Englishman, as the Spaniard in South America, or the descendant of the Gaul and Briton in the Canadas or United States; whilst the Jews, dispersed over the face of every nation, and scattered beneath every various sky, afford an interesting proof, that the peculiar characteristics of an individual race may be faithfully retained under the most striking dissimilarities of physical circumstances.

The lapse of time will be frequently marked by a deterioration in the national character, though soil and climate remain unchanged. In vain should we seek to discover, among the Greeks of the present day, those traits of character and expressions of intellectual greatness which distinguished their forefathers in the hour of their noblest splendour; and yet the Grecian sky is not less translucent, nor its atmosphere less kindly, than they were in former ages; and if ever this unfortunate race should succeed in raising themselves from their present low estate, one circumstance, at least, is placed beyond a doubt,—they will not owe their elevation to any revolution of their climate. The Scandinavian sky has undergone little or no alteration, yet the Scandinavian himself has risen from the depths of barbarism to a state of civilized prosperity.

Let it not be imagined that we are inclined altogether to deny the influence of climate, and other physical causes. There are regions where these operate with so sinister an effect, that the inhabitants, though incessantly contending against them, are incapacitated from attaining any eminent degree of mental refinement: and such must be the event, where the climate is overcharged with cold or heat, or where the atmosphere is loaded with unwholesome vapours. The Icelanders afford, however, a signal instance of the extent to which the inward powers of man are capable of overcoming such obstacles as these.

The effects of what are termed "moral causes" on national character are beyond the limits of the present discourse: yet we can not refrain from observing, that in this particular, also, too great a stress has been laid upon isolated appearances. One party will profess to resolve such effects into the influence of legislation and political institutions; another will refer them to that of education; and a third, to the impulses of religion. All these causes are undoubtedly co-operative; nay, they are far more influential than any physical impulses; yet are they of trivial moment, when placed by the side of those powerful agents which exist in the innate qualities of the human mind: for what are called "moral causes" are usually the immediate results of national character; and on this principle, despotism is the consequence of popular depravity and servility.

Under every view of the subject, we are warranted, therefore, in assuming, that God has endowed every nation, as well as every single individual, with a peculiar character, the expansion of which is favoured or retarded by external circumstances, though it can never become the subject of direct and unerring calculation.

The upright, if he suffer calumny to move him, fears the tongue of man, more than the eye of God.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

THE WEDDING RING.

"Think Well on it."

Reasons for the use of the Wedding Ring in the Marriage Ceremony, by the Rev. George Montgomery West, Chaplain to the Bishop of Ohio, and late of Cork.

1. As by turning a ring forever no end can be found, so the friendship cemented by marriage should be endless and perpetual; not even broken off finally, by the interruption of death, but the marriage party separating merely during the night of the grave in sure and certain hope of meeting again on the following of a glorious resurrection, when all that was pure and lovely in the union, shall be more so still, with the high additional perfection of continuing uninterrupted throughout the endless round of a blessed immortality.

2. As the marriage ring should be made of pure gold, which is the most pure or simple of all metals, so the marriage union, cemented by that impressive pledge given and received, should be pure in its origin, pure in its continuance, and so pure in all its motives as to contra-distinguish the contracting parties from all intimacies founded upon cross or carnal principles, and as nearly as possible resembling the love of Christ for his spouse, the Church, who so loved the Church that he gave himself for it.

3. As gold of which the marriage ring should be made, is esteemed the most valuable of all metals, so the love and friendship implied in the marriage ring should ever be considered as infinitely more valuable than any other system of which human nature is capable.

4. As gold is the most compact or least porous of metals, so the marriage love and friendship should be so closely cemented by the blending into each other of all the kind and good affections of the parties, as to leave no possible aperture or opening for the introduction of any strange or forbidden affection. Each party should always be prepared to say of the other,

"Thy loveliness my heart hath possessed,
And left no room for any other guest."

5. As gold, by the action of the most intense heat, even in a crucible, cannot lose any particular of its original weight and worth, but comes out of the crucible as heavy and as valuable as when it was put in, losing nothing in consequence of the fiery ordeal, except whatever portion of dross or alloy may have been incorporated with the pure metal; so the most severe afflictions, and fiery persecutions, which may be the portion of the marriage parties, during some of the changes and chances of this mortal life, should never be able to deteriorate or take from the marriage union any part of its intrinsic worth or beauty, but the parties should rise from the furnace of affliction and the dishonours of the grave without having lost any thing except the grosser particles of earth and sin, which may have unhappily attached themselves to the mystick union which was intended to secure their felicity.

6. The marriage ring should be perfectly plain, that is; no chased, raised, or artificial work should appear on its surface—implying, that the marriage union should not be the result of any artifice, on account of wealth, equipage, honour, or the undue influence of friends, but the plain result of an honourable and religious affection between the contracting parties and that God who first instituted the holy estate of matrimony.

7. As gold is an incorruptible metal, that is, if thrown into the mire, or embedded in the most impure soil, it will never become corrupt, corrode, or imbibe one speck of rust or impurity, so should the marriage love and friendship, however it may be sometimes obliged to descend from the elevation of affluence into the deepest valley of penury or distress, be doomed "To waste its sweetness on the desert air," be incarcerated with the gloomy confines of the prison cell, or associate with the poor, the mean, or the illiterate; still, like its incorruptible emblem, should it continue as bright and beautiful as ever.

8. As gold is the most ductile of all metals, so that an ounce can be beaten out to cover an acre of land, or gild a finely attenuated thread to embrace the circumference of the world's surface, so should the results of the marriage union fulfil the original command, to increase, multiply, and cover the earth with "The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold."

9. As the marriage ring exhibits nothing to imply pre-eminence of the one party over the other, notwithstanding that the word obey is applied to the Lady rather than the Gentleman, yet the Gentleman; should even recollect, that as, in forensick Courts, especially Courts of Equity, the Plaintiff must appear with what is called, "clean hands," in other words, have fully done his part and duty; so before the husband can have any right to command, or the wife be under obligation to obey, he must remember the rest of his love and sincerity, which is given in Holy Scriptures; viz. "Husbands love your wives, as Christ loved the Church." But how did Christ prove his love for the Church? by dying for it. When a love, of which this is the model, predominates in the husband's heart, he can require no obedience from his wife, but what she will ever feel it to her honour, privilege, and delight to render.

When a lady "reads, marks, learns, and inwardly digests" the foregoing, with all its implied suggestions and endearments, and then glances at the honoured finger, which bears the pure insignia of such voluminous delight and serious responsibility, how inexpressibly happy she must feel that she can be at all times, and under all circumstances, the bearer of so dear and portable a pledge of all that constitutes real terrestrial felicity, and may she often recur to the title or motto, and "Think well on it."

"This love worth commending, Still beginning, never ending."

THE PRESENT SULTAN AND THE PACHA OF EGYPT.

The unpublished travels of Captain Frankland, from which an extract is made in the London Court Journal, of July 11, received at this office, gives the following romantic anecdote relating to the two greatest men of which the East now boasts—Sultan Mahmoud and Mahmet Ali. It was related by Lady Herter Stanhope to Capt. Frankland.

The growing power of the Pacha of Egypt had long been the cause of uneasiness to the Sublime Porte. It was feared, at Stamboul, that Mahmet Ali would some day throw off the yoke of the successor to the Caliphate. In vain the perfidious policy of the seraglio despatched Capidgi Bashis, armed with the bowstring and the dagger, to the capital of the Pyramids; in vain its treacherous agents endeavoured, by poison or stratagem, to rid the Porte of a dangerous rival. Mahmet Ali was too well warned, by his spies at Constantinople, of the toils which were spread around him, to suffer himself to fall into the snare.

At length the Sultan Mahmoud resolved upon adopting a scheme, which should be so cleverly devised, and involved in such impenetrable secrecy, that it was impossible it could fail of success. He had in the harem a beautiful Georgian slave, whose innocence and beauty fitted her, in the Sultan's eyes, for the atrocious act of perfidy, of which she was to be the unsuspecting agent. The belief in talismans is still prevalent throughout the East; and perhaps even the enlightened Mahmoud himself is not superior to the rest of his nation, in matters of traditionary superstition. He sent one day for the fair Georgian, and affecting a great love for her person, and desire to advance her interests, told her that it was his imperial will to send her to Egypt, as a present to Mahmoud Ali, whose power and riches were as unbounded as the regions over which he held the sway of a sovereign prince, second to no one in the universe but to himself, the great Padisha. He observed to her how much happiness would fall to her lot, if she could contrive to captivate the affections of the master for whom he designed her; that she would become as it were the Queen of Egypt, and would reign over boundless empires. But in order to insure to her so desirable a consummation of his imperial wishes for her welfare and happiness, he would present her with a talisman, which he then placed upon her finger. "Watch," said he, "a favourable moment, when the Pacha is lying on your bosom, to drop this ring into a glass of water, which, when he shall have drunk, will give you the full possession of his affections, and render him your captive for ever."

The unsuspecting Georgian eagerly accepted the lot which was offered to her, and, dazzled by its promised splendour, determined upon following the instructions of the Sultan to the very letter. In the due course of time she arrived at Cairo, with a splendid suite, and many slaves bearing rich presents. Mahmet Ali's spies had, however, contrived to put him on his guard. Such a splendid demonstration of esteem from his imperial master alarmed him for his safety. He would not suffer the fair Georgian to see the light of his countenance; but, after some detention in Cairo, made a present of her to his intimate friend, Billel Aga, the Governor of Alexandria, of whom, by the bye, the Pacha had long been jealous. The poor Georgian having lost a Pacha, thought she must do her best to captivate an Aga, and she administered to him the fatal draught, in the manner Sultan Mahmoud had designed for Mahmet Ali. The Aga fell dead upon the floor; the Georgian shrieked and clapped her hands; in rushed the eunuchs of the harem, and bore out the dead body of their master. When the Georgian was accused of poisoning the Aga, she calmly denied the fact. "What did you do to him?" was the question. "I gave him a glass of water, into which I had dropped a talisman. See, there is the glass, and there is the ring." The ring, it was true, remained; but the stone which it had encircled was melted in the water.

ANTI-MASONRY IN NEW-JERSEY. Extract of a letter from a citizen of Huntingdon county, New-Jersey, to the editor of the Record, dated—

August 19, 1829.

"There is no anti-masonick excitement in New-Jersey, at this time, except in Morris county, where it is subsiding very fast, it being discovered that the leading antis were disappointed political aspirants, who had no merit themselves, nor any influence among the people; hence their ghostly tales about Morgan and masonry are not regarded by intelligent Jerseymen. The anti-masonicks are completely put down in this state; their idle stories are made a jest of by nine-tenths of the people; they can only find knaves and fools to listen to their mighty matters of falsehood and wo! Their exertions to transform the Morgan prejudices into political influence, has failed entirely in New-Jersey, because their political schemes were not in concert, consequently they were moving in a retrograde way, instead of advancing their influence. The people were well convinced of their hypocrisy and entire want of honest integrity even among themselves—thereby destroying confidence in the old adage, "honour among thieves."

ANTI-MASONRY IN PENNSYLVANIA. John B. Otto, William Weimar, Peter Stump, Henry Bitting, Henry Wunder and Jacob Guth, who were appointed members of the anti-masonick committee of Berks county, Pennsylvania, have declined the honour, and publicly advertised that their names were used without their knowledge or consent.

John Bower and George Weirick, esqrs. of Union county, have also publicly declined acting as committee men, declaring that they will not serve on the committees or support the candidate nominated by the convention, but will use all honourable means to oppose him.

Mrs. Royal, in accordance with the judgment of the court, "has paid her fine and given security to keep the peace." Her securities are said to be major Lewis, the second auditor, Dr. Jones, the postmaster at Washington, Mr. Heusten, a clerk in one of the public offices, and major Eaton, the Secretary of War.

PRIZE ADDRESS. The board of trustees of the Baltimore Theatre and Circus Stock Company, offer fifty dollars or the value in a piece of plate, for the best poetical address, to be delivered at the opening of the house on the 10th of September next. Addresses offered for the premium are to be addressed to Jos. Robinson, secretary, Baltimore, and sent previous to the first of September.

☞ It is reported that the anti-masons in Jamestown, Chautauque county, spiked the cannon that was intended to be used in the celebration of the 4th of July. We have not learned whether this gallant and patriotick action was done for the benefit of "religion," "law," or "decency."

☞ The editor of the Niagara Courier thinks himself an excessively sharp fellow. He may be, if you turn him edge-wise: the receipt to do which, is, a la Mrs. Glass, "first find his edge."

☞ The yankee abilities of the profound anti of Ulster, would reflect more credit upon a button-mole factory, than upon the editorial chair.

FOREIGN NEWS. English papers to the 17th and French to the 22d July, have been received at New-York. We select the most interesting items of news.

BUCHAREST, July 2. At this moment a courier, sent off from Silistria, has arrived with the intelligence of that place having fallen under the victorious attacks of the Russians. The Turkish garrison, who, after an obstinate resistance, had been reduced to the last extremity, have surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The garrison consisted of 10,000 men, exclusive of the inhabitants. In this number are captain Hady Achmet and Serf Mahmoud, both three-tailed pachas, and many other officers. The trophies of this victory are 250 pieces of cannon, two horse-tails, upwards of 1000 stand of colours, the flotilla of the Danube, and a great quantity of ammunition and provisions.

Accounts had been received at Selim, in which it is stated that the Russians had failed in their attempts to cross the Danube at several places, and that Constantinople continued in a state of the most profound tranquility, whilst the sultan proceeds in all his enterprises with great judgment and energy, a line of conduct which has gained him the respect both of his own countrymen and foreigners.

CONSTANTINOPLE, June 22. "The British and French ambassadors have not yet had an official interview with the Reis Effendi, but have endeavoured to have a confidential understanding with them upon the object of their mission. In this manner they have learned that the Porte will not negotiate upon the basis of the protocol signed at London, and especially upon the article which requires the extension of the frontiers of Greece from the gulf of Volo to that of Arta; so that they already foresee great difficulties in the way of their mission. The grand vizier is collecting all the troops he can at Choumla, and hopes to be able to assemble 50,000 men without weakening the garrison. All the men capable to bear arms have departed for the Balkan; the Turks admit that the number of men and artillery lost by them in the battle of the 11th was very considerable. Some persons still flatter themselves with the hope of peace, and speak of agents having been sent to the Russian camp. Ali Pacha, it appears, was killed in the battle of the 11th. The Captain Pacha has not yet returned from the Black Sea." Another letter from Constantinople of the same date, says—"The Grand Vizier returned to Choumla after the battle of June 11, with 6,000 men of cavalry and 12,000 infantry. The Mussulmans, thrown into consternation by the first intelligence of the defeat, resumed courage when they learned that the mass of the army had returned into the camp. It was also represented to them that the loss of the Russians was very considerable."

German papers anticipate the fall of Rudschuck, as well as Silistria, and look upon those events as likely to lead to a peace. A Congress of the great powers, was already spoken of, to settle the affairs of the belligerents and provide for the peace of Europe. The exigencies of Russia are said not to be exorbitant. It is supposed that the basis of the arrangement will be formed on the treaty of Ackerman, and the freedom of Russian commerce in the Black Sea. The fortresses of Asia to remain in her hands; and the principalities to be made independent. The emperor it is said, has expressed the formal intention, not to attempt the extension of the Russian territory.

For some days there have been no executions at Lisbon, but they still continue at Oporto. Don Miguel seems to have returned to the idea of marrying queen Donna Maria; and it is said that the states of the kingdom are to be convoked to take the question of the marriage into consideration.

After the victory of 11th June, the emperor of Russia, it is said, addressed a diplomatic note to all the European cabinets, to reassure them of his intentions, and protesting his desire to make peace with Turkey as soon as that government should have satisfied the just demands of the Russian cabinet.

The apostolical party in Spain oppose the King's marriage with the Neapolitan princess.

The Nuremberg Correspondent announces after intelligence from the frontiers of Italy, that Athens has surrendered by capitulation to the Greeks.

A letter from Paris, states the universal prevalence of a conviction that some great and general change, in the administration will speedily follow the prorogation of the chambers. M. De Chateaubriand will occupy a prominent position in the new arrangement.

From the Buffalo Journal.

HEAR THEM! When the "Boston Free Press" first published its base slander, insinuating that governor Clinton committed suicide, the hirelings in this region eagerly seized the tale, and published it with great glee and commendation. It was the discovery of a new and important fact which was to add fresh fuel to the anti-masonick fire. But the tale carried villany upon the face of it, and it is beginning to recoil upon its authors. Now mark the change. The Anti-masonick Inquirer, of Rochester, on Tuesday last, thus commences sounding the retreat.

"We wish our friends of the Boston Free Press would strike from the letter which they are publishing, an intimation that governor CLINTON committed suicide. The suggestion is utterly unfounded, and is equally injurious to ourselves, and the memory of the distinguished man upon which it reflects."

"Injurious to ourselves"—there's the rub. What honesty of purpose, to state a malicious falsehood, libelling the illustrious dead, and send it forth upon all the winds, and when it became "injurious to ourselves," request, with down turned corners of the mouth, "our friends" would strike it out! This is the atonement offered by the spirit of anti-masonry to an insulted people. The name of one whose memory is associated with the choicest blessings which our people enjoy, is branded with the crime of self-murder, for the basest of political designs, and when popular indignation is visiting the authors and promulgators of this villany with deserving retribution, pardon is craved upon condition that the libellers will strike out the infamy from the body of a letter.

So with the story that colonel King was not dead. The same party promulgated that falsehood, both orally and in print, until it became injurious to themselves, when it was abandoned and denied. But these things, though once surprising, are no longer so. The authors have libelled alike the living and the dead, they have disturbed the worship of the God of our fathers, they have invaded the silence of the tomb, and dragged the bodies of our fellow men from their last homes—for the unworthy motive of obtaining official supremacy. Such is political anti-masonry.

From the Vermont Watchman, August 1.

FRUITS OF "EXCITEMENT." A specimen of what rational men may do, when under the influence of strong excitement and partly bereft of reason, came to our knowledge on a recent journey, in the southeasterly part of Caledonia county. On the authority of a number of respectable gentlemen in the town of Barnet, we state the disgraceful fact, that a valuable monument erected over the grave of the late Adam Duncan, esq. formerly sheriff of the county, and for a number of years a representative of the town of Barnet, has been demolished, and its broken fragments strewed about the burying ground. The deed was done during the recent disgraceful excitement on the subject of masonry. Mr. Duncan lived and died a mason. It is not known who were the perpetrators of this outrage upon the feelings of the living, and this sacrilegious insult to the memory of the dead. No reason for such conduct can be assigned, unless it be found in the fact that a few masonick emblems were engraven upon the tomb of the lamented Duncan. And this fact surely can afford no reasonable plea, as there are living victims enough to satisfy any ordinary spirit of persecution, without seeking objects in the field of graves, and among the monuments of the sleeping dead on which to wreak its vengeance! We must therefore conclude that the act is chargeable to no reasonable party, and to no rational human being. A cannibal, in the frenzy of a fanatic, or in the delirium of a madman, could alone have done it.

From the Batavia People's Press.

RELIGIOUS ANTI-MASONRY. Two or three weeks since, the Session of the first Presbyterian Church in Albion, passed the following resolution:—

"Resolved, that we consider freemasonry, as revealed and testified to before this session, to be a moral evil, and therefore cannot fellowship any brother in this church who is a mason, until he shall absolve himself from its obligations, and all connection with masons, as such."

This was published in the Orleans Telegraph, and eagerly seized upon by the anti-masonick presses as another evidence of the "beneficial effects" of anti-masonry. But there is a second edition of this transaction, "corrected and revised," which these same presses say nothing about. It is this: some of the leading members of the church and society being masons, this proceeding was likely to raise a breeze; the resolution was therefore almost immediately rescinded, and the masonick members of the church are again permitted to worship their Maker in peace. This is the manner in which the crusade against them has terminated; fanaticism has not yet gained the entire ascendancy.

VARIETIES.

Canadian Difficulties. We regret exceedingly, says the Quebec Old Gazette, the state of affairs in Upper Canada. We repeat that that province cannot be long governed under the present system. It is nearly in the state of Ireland before Catholic Emancipation, writhing under a system adverse to the opinions, feelings and interests of a majority of its inhabitants, and to the rights to which they consider themselves entitled, as British Subjects. A government of this character is essentially a government of force, and can only exist while it is supported by force, a necessary instrument of government we admit, but of all others, the one which, for obvious reasons, ought to be the least used. We also repeat that nothing will ever induce the inhabitants of Upper Canada, to abandon one iota of the common rights which belong to, or have been enjoyed by British subjects in the colonies; and it is not for the interests of England that they should. It is only those who have the spirit to maintain these rights, that can maintain her dominion on this continent.

Duke of Wellington. A year ago the Duke was very much in debt; within a few weeks, he has found means to free himself from all pecuniary embarrassment, and has purchased the beautiful estate of Sir Peter Pole, the ex-banker at Strathfieldsay, for two hundred and sixty thousand pounds, and has annexed two other estates to it—the whole costing near half a million—and enclosing a space of nearly thirty miles in circumference. In addition to this, the site is marked for a superb mansion, which will cost two or three hundred thousand, or more. Apsley House, his Grace's mansion at Hyde Park corner, has undergone a complete repair, at an expense exceeding thirty thousand pounds, and orders have been given, it is said, for new furniture! Some suppose it is the money of the rich physician, whose only child, it is reported, the Marquess Drury, the eldest son of the Duke, will shortly lead to the Hymeneal Altar.

A Tomb in the Clouds. The Duke of Athol is said to have upwards of sixty miles of gravelled walks on his Perthshire estates, and more than half that number of miles of carriage roads; many of which are formed out of the solid rock, and lead through the most picturesque scenery, to the tops of various of the lower range of the Grampians. But all of these yield to that which the Earl of Hife has for some years been forming to the top of one of the highest Bens in Scotland, (Macdui, in Brae Mar, which is upwards of four thousand feet above the level of the sea,) by which materials are carried for the erection of a family tomb, upon the highest pinnacle of the mountain! The length of the ascent is nearly seven miles from the foot.

A Miser. A miserly bachelor schoolmaster died a short time since at Exeter, who had worn the same coat twenty years, and had himself darned his worsted stockings so many times, that no remains of the original colour were perceptible. After his interment his poor relatives sent for a gentleman to look over his scraps of paper, and, on the tester of the bed, were found, wrapped up in pieces of worsted rags or old stockings, sixteen hundred pounds in interest notes, from different Exeter bankers, of 2½ per cents, commencing 35 years since, the interest of none of which had been applied for; the compound interest of the whole would have been £4,000. A dread of being required to assist his relatives appears to have been his motive for withholding the secret of his wealth.

From the New-York Cabinet.

THE BURNING OF MOSCOW.

Oh! terrors there are that appal the soul,
When aloud through the heaven's pealing,
The dread bursts of a tempest in thunders roll,
The grandeur of God revealing.

And the firmest spirit will be dismayed
When the lightnings are wildly glaring,
And the bravest soldier will be afraid,
And the boldest forget his daring.

Yet, those peals are but what the tempests sing,
As they rush to the bloodless battle,—
Though the mountains tremble, and vallies ring,
Yet 'tis not with the death-shot's rattle.

And the lightning's course is amid the storms
That are gathered in dire commotion,
And the foes it seeks, are the vapour forms
That arise from the angry ocean.

But ah! wo! wo! wo to the soldier's wife,
And alas! for the maiden, sighing,
If her husband march to the bloody strife
Or her love to the field is flying.

For thunders that boom o'er the battle ground
Tell of death in each fearful roaring
And the flash preceding its boding sound
Is not quenched, but, where blood is pouring.

'Tis a dreary hour when the storms arise,
And the clouds are in wrath contending,

When the lightning speed through the dark'ned skies,
The strong bulwarks of heaven rending.

Yet, what are the flashings that cleave the air
To the gloom of a burning city?
When the orphan's cry, and the mother's prayer
Ask in vain for relief or pity!

I look o'er the mountains and see afar
A bright host, that I may not number
They rush to the home of the mighty Czar,
While it seems in a death-like slumber.

But now, the wild uproar of war I hear
And I see where the flames are curling,
And I see them spreading and they appear
Like a banner of fire unfurling!—

Let all who are charmed with the true sublime,
All the lovers of contemplation,
And those who to pleasure devote their time,
Go to Maelzel's "Conflagration."

TO VARRO.

In Answer to his Stanzas, published in the Record of August 1.

Are Varro's years, (though few, yet gay,)
 "Like clouds that stain the summer sky?"
 So tardily they pass away,
 Their shadows dark still on him lie?
 Is life a dream, a mere mischance?
 A vision of a meteor kind?
 That wanes ere half its noon's advance.
 And leaves no vivid trace behind?

In fitful dreams or phrenzied hours,
 Some mingled shapes of fairy nam e
 Come flitt'ring o'er his slumbering powers,
 And smiling, paint a world in fame.
 Are youth and beauty, wealth and ease,
 All irksome in the morn of life?
 Has life no charm, no power to please,
 No pole-star, haven, nought but strife?

Sic transit gloria mundi seems
 A charm to thee, if charm can find
 In thee a point, in Reason's beams,
 To lure the current of thy mind.
 Vain are such thoughts, such whinnings vain,
 And ill besem a man, too soon;
 What! but to hush, with cold disdain,
 The social germ of heaven's boon.

When from the portals of the sky,
 On errands kind, to mortals sent,
 "The angel HORE is fluttering by,"
 Thy looks seem scorn and discontent;
 No wonder that his weary wings,
 "Are perched upon the stormy wave,"
 "And dark despair his fetters flings,"
 To hide, perchance, them in the grave.

Yet if that dull, cold apathy,
 Be monarch of thy better mind,
 And that foul form of "LETHARGY"
 T' oblivion's care thy power's consigned,
 Sad is thy fate, and drear thy doom,
 Thy star will set in endless night,
 The milky way of night's dim noon
 May be thy only distant light.

THE HUNTED STAG.

BY T. MARSHALL.

What sounds are on the mountain blast?
 Like bullet from the arbalast,
 Was it the hunted quarry past
 Right up Ben-ledi's side?
 So near, so rapidly he dashed,
 Yon lichen'd bough has scarcely plashed
 Into the torrent's tide.
 Ay!—the good hound may bay beneath,
 The hunter wind his horn;
 He dared ye through the flooded Teith,
 As a warrior in his scorn!
 Dash the red rowel in the steed,
 Spur, laggarde, while ye may!
 St. Hubert's staff to a stripling's reed,
 He dies no death to-day!

"Forward!" Nay, waste not idle breath,
 Gallants, ye win no green-wood wreath;
 His antlers dance above the heath,
 Like Chieftain's plumed helm;
 Right onward for the western peak,
 Where breaks the sky in one white streak,
 See, Isabel, in bold relief,
 To Fancy's eye, Glenarney's chief,
 Guarding his ancient realm.
 So motionless, so noiseless there,
 His foot on earth, his head in air,
 Like sculptor's breathing stone!
 Then, snorting from the rapid race,
 Snuffs the free air a moment's space,
 Glares grimly on the baffled chase,
 And seeks the covert lair.

MARY.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

I saw a tear run down her fading cheek,
 Like a silver dew-drop from the red rose shaken;
 It seemed a pearl, of sorrow's own, to speak
 What yet her tongue could not—"I am forsaken!"

I saw her in that dreary lapse of doubt,
 When shades of wo and night were spread above her,
 When every gleam of hope was prisoned out,
 And none but me was left on earth to love her.

I would not own that she had ever sinned,
 That heaven's pure veil had there been rent and broken,
 I gave those dreamings to the idle wind,
 And the sad girl my trusting heart in token.

Heaven blessed the thought; her spirit's dimness went,
 Like evening shadows from the sun's adorning,
 And smiles and tears were in her blue eyes blent,
 Like sun and dew on violets in the morning.

She turned from leaning on a broken reed,
 The dawning summer of her bosom made her
 A happier girl—more fully blest indeed
 Than if the garb of wo had not arrayed her.

And she was nearer than a mother's love;
 If but my slightest feature told dejection,
 She hovered by me like a summer dove,
 And clad me in the sun-light of affection.

Two swift and sunny years she lingered here,
 As a light flower on autumn's withering bosom,
 And then she drooped without a pang—a fear,
 And slept in earth—a seed for heaven's pure blossom.

Sleep, Mary, for the summer dews lie soft,
 In the bright turf above thy lonely pillow,
 The summer winds blow sweetly there and oft,
 And long, thin grass waves, like a sea green billow.

Angel—for now thou art—if ever thou
 Among the stars art one—in distance trembling,
 Let thy sweet radiance fall upon my brow,
 Like a bright drop—thy joyous tear resembling.

Come, and be near me in my evening dreams,
 Around my heart-string like faint music hover,
 Flit not away in the morning's golden beams,
 But always light the bosom of thy lover.

THE GRAVE.

BY BOWRING.

Why should the grave be terrible?
 Why should it be a word of fear,
 Jarring upon the mortal ear?
 There repose and silence dwell:
 The living hear the funeral knell,
 But the dead no funeral knell can hear.
 Does the gay flower scorn the grave? the dew
 Forget to kiss its turf? the stream
 Refuse to bathe in? or the beam
 Of moonlight shun the narrow bed,
 Where the tired pilgrim rests his head?
 No! the moon is there, and smiling too!
 And the sweetest song of the morning bird
 Is oft in that ancient yew tree heard;
 And there may you see the harebell blue
 Bending his light form—gently—proudly,
 And listen to the fresh winds, loudly
 Playing around yon sod, as gay
 As if it were a holiday,
 And children freed from durance they.

THE SOLDIER'S DEATH-BED.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Like thee to die, thou Sun!—my boyhood's dream,
 Was this; and now my spirit with thy beam,
 Ebbs from a field of victory!—yet the hour
 Bears back upon me, with a torrent's power,
 Nature's deep longings:—Oh! for some kind eye,
 Wherein to meet Love's fervent farewell gaze;
 Some breast to pillow Life's last agony;
 Some voice, to speak of Hope and brighter days,
 Beyond the pass of Shadows!—But I go,
 I, that have been so loved, go hence alone;
 And ye, now gathering round my own hearth's glow,
 Sweet friends! it may be that a softer tone,
 Even in this moment with your laughing glee,
 Mingles its feeling while ye speak of me:
 Of me, your soldier 'midst the mountains lying,
 On the red banner of his battles dying,
 Far, far away! And oh! your parting prayer!
 Will not his name be fondly murmured there?
 It will!—a blessing on that holy hearth!
 Though clouds are darkening to o'ercrest its mirth.

Mother! I may not hear thy voice again;
 Sisters! ye watch to greet my step in vain:
 Young brother, fare thee well!—on each dear head,
 Blessing and love a thousand fold be shed.
 My soul's last earthly breathings!—May your home
 Smile for you ever! May no winter come,
 No world between your hearts!—May even your tears,
 For my sake, full of long-remembered years,
 Quickened the true affection that entwined
 Your lives in one bright bond!—I may not sleep
 Amidst our Fathers, where those tears might shine
 Over my slumbers! yet your love will keep
 My memory living in the ancestral halls,
 Where shame hath never trod. The dark night falls.
 And I depart. The brave are gone to rest,
 The brothers of my combats; on the breast
 Of the red field they reaped;—their work is done—
 Thou, too, art set—farewell, farewell, thou sun!
 The last lone watcher of the bloody sod,
 Offers a trusting spirit up to God.

DIFFERENT SPECIES OF DRUNKENNESS.

When George was poor as poor could be,
Drunk as a beggar still was he;
 Espousing then a wealthy dame,
 Sudden a fortune to him came:
 To drink he now could well afford,
 And daily got—drunk as a lord.

STOVES, FRANKLINS, &c.—HEERMANS, RATHBONE, & Co. No 47, State-street, Albany, offer at wholesale or retail the most perfect and extensive assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this city; comprising the latest and most approved patterns of Cooking
 Stoves, Franklin, Box, Oven, and Hall Stoves, together with Ranges,
 English and Philadelphia Sheet Iron, Brass Andirons, Shovel and Tong, Tin Plate, Stove Pipe, Clay Furnaces, &c. &c.; all of which they will sell on the most reasonable terms.

TO PRINTERS AND EDITORS.—Pecuniary embarrassments induce the proprietor of the BUFFALO REPUBLICAN to offer for sale. The materials of the office embrace a greater variety and extent than any other in the western country—from Pearl to 20 line Fica.
 The materials are all new, or nearly new, but few having been used more than a year. There is a large assortment of flowers, cuts, &c.
 Thirty quires are printed weekly, and not more than 30 papers are taken by mail carriers or post riders. The permanent yearly advertising will over-reach 500 dollars, the "occasional" advertisements will amount to 300 dollars more. The job printing, (not excluding book printing) will average 20 dollars a week. The materials have cost about 5000 dollars.

The whole office will be sold for 2200 dollars—the present editor remaining in the establishment for a stated term, if desired, for a reasonable compensation. One half will be sold for 1100 dollars; or one-third for 767 dollars—the purchaser being either an editor of talents and experience, or a good practical printer. In case either of the two last propositions should be taken up, a partnership, proportionably reciprocal in all respects, will be arranged. The title to the materials will be passed by men of undoubted responsibility.

Money being the object of selling, a handsome payment down will be expected; and the rest amply secured, and on a reasonable credit.
 It may be remarked, with entire truth, that the future prospects of Buffalo warrant the belief that the Buffalo Republican will become as profitable and as popular a publication as may be found in this section of the state.

The purchaser must be a Jackson republican.
 Persons desiring further particulars can obtain them by applying to the subscriber by letter, (post-paid,) or otherwise.
 SMITH H. SALISBURY.

TO PRINTERS OF THE UNITED STATES.—FRANKLIN
 LETTER FOUNDRY.—The reduced cost of the materials used in the composition of Printing Types, and the improvements and increased facilities of casting them, have induced the subscribers to adopt the following list of prices.

The style of their large and small letter is modern, and of the most elegant kind. The metal will be found very hard and durable, having a new ingredient in its composition. For accuracy and finish, the type cast at their foundry is warranted equal to any whatever. They have on hand a complete assortment of Book and Job Letters, so that they are prepared to execute orders for entire offices of Job, News-per, or Book Printing, on a short notice. They are thankful for the patronage they have received, and will be happy to receive the orders of printers, which will receive prompt attention.

Merchants and others who have orders from abroad, will be supplied not only with type, but with Presses, Cases, Composing Sticks, and every thing necessary for a printing establishment, and put up with care and perfect accuracy.

Their new specimen book will be published soon, and ready to be sent to printers, in which will be exhibited a greater variety than has been shown by any Foundry in the United States.

NOTES ON ANTI-MASONRY.

From "Omniferous Laws Exemplified—or, how to Curse and Swear Lie, Cheat and Kill, according to Law!"

BY LORENZO DOW.
Concluded.

O, my countrymen! remember the declaration of '76, with the principles and concomitants thereto belonging. And in these days of exigency and excitement I wish and hope for the voluminous essays or writings of THOMAS JEFFERSON to appear in print, to cultivate and improve the publick mind.

The present excitement, to pull down old and long established societies for political purposes of a sinister nature, tends to accomplish objects of a cruel and unjust principle, by procuring laws to oppress and depress their fellow citizens—such as will bring them under the power of tyrannical instruments—to drive them into hypocrisy, self defence, exile, poverty and destruction; totally unworthy a free, generous and independent people.

Often, in Church and State, a very few men sway the whole multitude, who act from the impulse of the moment, without reason, why or wherefore.

Corrupt hearts, for party purposes and self interest, love treachery to accomplish it. But John Bull and brother Jonathan, with all mankind, despise the traitor.

You attempt to deceive a noted liar, and he will revenge upon you, because he respects the truth, if he does not possess it.

Also, cheat a knave, and he will resent it, knowing that truth, justice, fidelity and humanity, are proper virtues for all to possess, and bring forth in all their fruits of practice.

But this doctrine that some publick characters evince by their practice and profession, (taking their own word for it,) that no oath is binding, except made before a magistrate in form of civil law, is pernicious in its consequences.

For if an oath is not binding, neither can a promise be; and if not, why fine a man for a "breach of promise"?

Such principles for doctrine (taught by preachers who profess to teach the truth of God in fidelity of heart,) must tend to corrupt the minds of youth, who generally imbibe first notions, which are apt to grow up with them, and become a trait in their after life, characteristic, to the great injury of society.

For where can you place confidence where no obligation is felt?

For such ideas generated in the breast of youth, that no contract is binding, except made in form by civil law, destroys all force of moral obligation from the mind: and thereby, to fling off moral restraint, as it relates to society, unless you come under the lash of the law, is to open a wide field for iniquity; and will prove, in its consequences, ruinous to society.

The Pope was the first anti-mason, of late years, in which he denounced them by his bull, as heretics—assigning as a reason, their requirement of a belief in one God, without descending to particulars, as it relates to creeds—as though a protestant could not be saved as well as a Catholic.

The second appearance of the anti was the inquisition of Spain, after the return of Ferdinand VII. to the throne; allowing freemasons Jews and heretics, only forty days to come in and make their recantation, or share all the horrors of the inquisition: from forty to fifty thousand persons were imprisoned in monasteries and convents, there not being other prison-room sufficient to contain them; and most of those poor wretches have never been heard of since.

The third anti appearance was called the "Holy Alliance," or the Unholy League, who declared "that the principles of liberty were systematically prevailing, as exemplified in Naples, and a firebrand of it had got into Greece." Numbers of the masons were executed, not only in Spain, but at Rome and Naples also.

The fourth appearance of anti was by the priests in Spanish America, to prevent light, and to keep up the old order of things—ignorance, superstition, darkness and bondage—for self aggrandizement.

The fifth appearance of anti was by Alexander, of Russia.

He began his reign under favourable auspices, with a prospect of enlightening the dark, northern, savage regions. On the fall of Napoleon, he invited the Bonapartists, who were afraid of the Bourbons, to come into his dominions.

Several hundred thousands, of the brightest talents, and greatest genius, were drawn to his empire, from several parts of Europe. After holding out objects of inducement, to the astonishment of the world, his sun set in a cloud, and he died without lamentation by his surviving observers.

For first, it appears, he would bring back the dark ages of barbarism, by destroying the good principles he had suffered to begin, as it relates to literature, liberty of conscience, bible truths, and historical information.

And secondly, would moreover require perjury of those whom he had invited to come and settle in his dominions, and officiate under his government. Also, more than one hundred thousand were commanded to quit his dominions within a given period, under painful circumstances, beyond the possibility of compliance.

Alexander fell asleep in the way of his forefathers, a just retribution according to the view of that Hand, which from time immemorial has interfered in the affairs of mortals, by rendering retributive justice, according to the declaration—"That which ye measure to others, shall be measured to you again." However, fourteen thousand masons disappeared by human power—and where have they been heard of since?

The sixth anti appearance is in the United States; who are infatuated under the idea of "Religion and Politics," like their forefathers who hung the Quakers for Heresy, and in their FANATICISM and DELUSION must hang the Witches, too.

And thus bring back, as blue skins, the "BLUE LAWS" of former days, with a kind of INQUISITORIAL SPIRIT, as if the days of Barbarian Darkness and Oppression must be brought to deluge and overflow the land, in order to accomplish, by every stratagem possible, TWO ORDERS OF MEN—one to be favoured, and the other to be oppressed.

The doctrine of "EQUAL RIGHTS" is plainly the fundamental principle of these United States, are exemplified in the Declaration of July 4, 1776—with the letters of General Washington to Congress during the struggle; and also that Constitution, in the Federal Compact, on which the General Government is bottomed, since 1789.

General Warren, who fell at Bunker Hill, was the first leader and chief head, in his day, of that ancient Institution through the northern states.

General Washington was his successor. And although he advised against secret societies, when speaking of political affairs, which shows he must have referred to societies of a political nature; but he was the friend of humanity, and of course could never have referred to humane societies; as his letters to the Masonick Fraternity fully exemplify, and moreover his continuing in the official capacity, as head of the Society, subsequent to that day.

After him, De Witt Clinton, whose publick character is well known, continued the office to the end of his life.

Many of the antis are strong Jackson men, and voted highly for him, who stands one of the first on the list, and yet are striving to ruin the citizens' community, who are of the same craft.

And those "ANTIS" have the eggs now in "embryo," within their nest, to hatch a political "EQUESTRIAN" statue—impregnated with that principle, socially, which Washington in his "FAREWELL ADDRESS" advises the citizens against, as being dangerous to society.

And if the calmness of the Publick mind—with that good principle of COMMON SENSE—should be so exercised, judiciously—as to prevent confusion, delusion, fanaticism, convulsion, anarchy, and TYRANNY—it will be a happy thing—to transmit former privileges to generations yet unborn!

As it relates to candid and judicious people in these days of excitement, who are clear of Party Spirit—you will save yourself much trouble and expense, by not concerning yourself about that which you are ignorant of—and of course are incompetent to exercise and determine judiciously about it.

I would give my counsel to such, as a friend, to let it alone.

For if the Balance of the principles of 1776 be overthrown in this country, then, surely, the Palladium, which is the pendulous regulator of our national safety, is gone—and the surety and doctrine of Equal Rights driven from these shores, and banished from the world. For where else do they exist, or where can they be found in a social point of view!

Before the conquest of England by William, one of his predecessors, viz. King Athelstane, in 926, gave a Charter to a certain Society in York. Hence the origin of the well-known phrase—"Ancient York Masons." And the King's brother, Edwin, was the Grand Master.

Some laws in succeeding reigns were passed against them. When the Grand Lodge was convened at York, Queen Elizabeth sent some of her confidants, with a military force, to seize them with their papers, and bring them to her. But some of the leading men being initiated, made a favourable report to her Majesty, so that the opposition died away.

When a boy, I heard my father read of our people being carried into Algerine slavery, but some were let off without ransom, whilst others were retained and redeemed at the publick expense—which made an impression upon my mind.

But I had my prejudices as well as others of my day, without proper notions or judgment on the subject. And probably I should have carried them with me, till my dying day, had it not been for the following circumstance.

When on Rhode-Island, 1824, in my sleep, thought myself in a Masonick Lodge—where I received the first degree; after which I stood up to give them an address; in doing which I waked myself up. A strange, weighty exercise—sleep fled—early I crossed the ferry to Warren, where I related the circumstance at breakfast—noticed the countenance of some present, which appeared to be an index of their mind—concluded they were Masons—on enquiry found it to be so.

Then I resolved to see the difference betwixt dream and reality, the first opportunity, which soon presented at Bristol. I anticipated, step by step, and was not disappointed; the circumstances answering to my dream.

And travelling on, I have found no cause to repent my journey through the degrees of masonry, ancient and modern steps—but find the principles to be such as I would wish to treasure in my heart, and practise in my life, till my dying day—as I now see and feel.

The antiquity of it, the data and circumstances attending the origin of the several degrees, the parts separate and taken together to form one whole—there is a chain and a harmony in the institution, common opinion and assertion to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is noble in its administration; to think and let think, beyond the narrow contracted prejudices of bitter sectarians in these modern times.

In common with other citizens, to do good to all—but those of the Brotherhood have more especially claim.

It is general or universal Language, fitted to benefit the poor stranger, which no other institution is calculated to reach by extending the beneficent Hand.

Even the modern degree, called the Mediterranean Pass, known all around the shores of that sea, existed anterior to the date of the Knights of Malta; taking its rise at the capitulation of the Isle of Rhodes, which island had been maintained 200 years by the Christians after their expulsion from the Holy Land, against all the power of Turkey, which is near 400 years since.

The Wooden Mallet, now preserved in the English Museum of Antiquities as a curiosity, because King Charles 2d used it in laying the corner stone, publicly, of St. Paul's, and Masonick Hall, upwards of 150 years ago, shows the folly of some who attempt to assert its origin subsequent to that period, arising from the delusion of the South Sea Company, 1720.

The statute of Henry IV. of England, the 3d year of his reign, interdicting masonry, perhaps about 1425, is not brought into view by the "antis."

The Missionaries in the East have found the benefit of their having been initiated into this ancient institution (in the West,) among the Indoos—when otherwise even their sacred office and character would not have saved them.

Other societies strive to make disciples by proselyting, but this does not. Others beg your money, when out of the society, or belonging to another, but this does not. But in common with other societies and the publick at large, they show their equality in paying their proportion of the poor taxes, and also, the general kindness to the neighbours' distresses; yet over and above all that, they aim to help each other with their own money, which is not begged from others, but is the fruit of their own earnings. And provided they wish to extend their institution beyond the little narrow contracted prejudices of local societies, who do they injure? Let Truth and Justice answer the question!

Supposing a "Royal Arch Knight Templars' High Priest" should drop a few hints to all whom it may concern:

"Don't give up the ship"—but in the storm lay to; the gust, when it comes to its zenith, must lower away; and then set your sails, and steer your course. But learn the lesson—mind what characters compose your crew, and see there be not too many raw hands "admitted" for the voyage. But, while you have this opportunity, purge your decks of disorderly and improper members, by seeking a reformation, to correct whatever is amiss, that the institution may not be injured by those who are unworthy.

Signs always denote substances—and the substance is beyond the sign.

There was an outward stone table—outward manna—and an outward name written—kept from those without, the Gentile world.

But there is a "hidden manna," a "living stone," and a "new name" written, "which no man knoweth but he that receiveth it." Christ revealed in the heart, by the spirit, is the true knowledge of God!

To go no further than the signs, is to be only what may be considered as a mere nominal, outward court worshipper—a formal professor.

But those who study and pursue the true principle, to enjoy it inwardly, will find a sublime theory—an interesting study—refreshing, sweet contemplation—worthy a rational being, above the brute creation, which has but animal contentment; but you may study God; enjoy God—as an inward and spiritual worshipper—anticipating the joys of the world to come.

The conclusion of the whole matter, "Fear God and keep his commandments," which are, "repentance" for sin; the exercise of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ—and to "love the Lord with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself," practically doing to others as you would they should do to you—and thus lay up treasure in heaven.

EXPULSION.

At a regular communication of Vermont Lodge, No 1, holden at Masons' Hall, in Windsor, June 15, A. L. 5729, voted unanimously, that Jabez Delano and James Bailey, of Windsor, for unmasonic conduct, be expelled from this lodge. Printers in the United States, friendly to the institution of masonry, are requested to give the above a place in their respective papers. By order of the lodge.

MARTIN P. PINNEY, Sec'y.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

THE HUMAN EAR.

A Lecture delivered at the Royal Institution, London, May 30, 1823—by J. H. Cusack, Esq.

The Ear consists of three principal divisions, viz. the external, intermediate, and internal ear. The different parts of the first division, or external ear, are described by anatomists under the name of the helix, antihelix, tragus, antitragus, the lobe, cavitas innominata, the scapha, and the concha. In the middle of the external ear is the meatus, or passage, which varies in length in different individuals. The external or outward ear is designed by nature to stand prominent, and to bear its proportion in the symmetry of the head, but in Europe it is greatly flattened by the pressure of the dress; it consists chiefly of elastic cartilage, formed with different hollows, or sinuosities, all leading into each other, and finally terminating in the concha, or immediate opening into the tube of the ear. This form is admirably adapted for the reception of sound, for collecting and retaining it, so that it may not pass off, or be sent too rapidly to the seat of the impression. There have been a few instances of men who had the power of moving the external ear in a similar manner to that of animals; but these instances are very rare, and rather deviations from the general structure; nor did it appear in these that such individuals heard more acutely: a proof that such a structure would be of no advantage to the human subject. With respect to the external ear in man, whether it is completely removed either by accident or design, deafness ensues, although its partial removal is not attended with this inconvenience. The external ear, therefore, or something in its form to collect sound, is a necessary part of the organ.

The next division is the intermediate ear; it consists of the tympanum, mastoid cells, and Eustachian tube. The tympanum contains four small delicate bones, viz. the malleus, the incus, the stapes, and the os orbiculare, joined to the incus. The intermediate ear displays an irregular cavity, having a membrane, called the membrana tympani, stretched across its extremity; and this cavity has a communication with the external air, through the Eustachian tube, which leads into the fauces, or throat. The membrane of the tympanum is intended to carry the vibrations of the atmosphere, collected by the outward ear, to the chain of bones which form the peculiar mechanism of the tympanum. Besides the effect of the hard and bony parts of the ear in increasing the power of sound, the tension of the different membranes is also a requisite: thus various muscles are so situated as to put the membrane on the stretch, that the sound, striking upon it, may, from its tension, similar to that of the parchment of a drum head, have full influence upon the sense. In respect to its tension, the membrane of the tympanum may be also compared, not unaptly, to the string of a violin, or musical instrument, even more properly than to a drum; as the state of tension and relaxation in such chords produces a variety of sound in the instrument, so, in the same manner, circumstances, which affect the tension and relaxation of the tympanum, vary most perceptibly its powers of action, and the customary agency of the organ. Its four bones act mechanically, in consequence of the power of the local muscles: they strike like the key of an instrument, and produce a percussion on the nerves of the tympanum. Not only may the membrane of the tympanum be partially destroyed, and hearing be preserved, but the small bones of the tympanum have been in certain cases lost, or have come away, from ulceration, and through a constitutional or other cause; but in such cases it appears that the stapes was, in most instances, left, and thus the openings of the fenestra ovata and fenestra rotunda were preserved, which prevented the escape of sound from the labyrinth and internal parts. With respect to the Eustachian tube, its aperture into the throat seems indispensable to hearing; and whenever closed, from malconfirmation or disease, deafness is the certain consequence.

The third division of the organ is the internal ear, which is called the labyrinth; it is divided into the vestibule, three semi-circular canals, and the cochlea: the whole are incased within the petrous portion of the temporal bone. The internal ear may be considered as the actual seat of the organ; it consists of a nervous expansion of high sensibility, the sentient extremities of which spread in every direction, and in the most minute manner; in-osculating with each other, and forming plexus, by which the auricular sense is increased. Here, also, sound is collected and retained by the mastoid cells and cochlea. To this apparatus is added the presence of a fluid, contained in sacks and membranes; as this fluid is in large quantities in some animals, there is no doubt it is intended as an additional means for enforcing the impression: the known influence of water, as a powerful medium or conductor of sound, strengthens this idea. The internal ear of man, therefore, has all the known varieties of apparatus, which are only partially present in other classes of the creation; and its perfection is best judged of, by considering the variety or form of the internal ear of other animals. The internal ear of some animals consists of little more than a sack of fluid, on which is expanded a small nervous pulp; according to the situation of this, whether the creature lives in water, or is partially exposed to the air, it has an external opening with the ear, or otherwise

From the (Chopertown) Watch Tower.

ON THE POISONOUS PROPERTY OF THE BLACK CHERRY TREE. The "Prunus Nigra" of Botanists. The fact, that the withered leaves of the cherry are a deadly poison to cattle, has been long known in the country; but I never recollect to have heard of any ill consequences from the use of the bark, a domestick remedy very much celebrated for the cure of jaundice, &c. The following case is perfectly satisfactory to my mind, and must establish the fact of its poisonous properties beyond a doubt. On Thursday, July 23, I was called in great haste to visit a young lady who had been seized with vertigo, insensibility and syncope, followed by an alarming difficulty of respiration, in consequence of a draught of about half a pint of cider, taken from a closely stopped bottle which was filled the evening previous with cherry bark, fresh from the tree. These symptoms were followed by a small pulse, nausea and vomiting. The more violent symptoms passed off in about twenty or thirty minutes, and before I saw her, yet I am inclined to believe, that a larger dose might have proved fatal without any return of sensibility. In this case, it returned and the patient soon recovered with no ill consequences, except extreme languor and debility.

Another young lady in the family, who had good health and constitution, took also, about the same time, a very small quantity of the contents of the bottle and was immediately affected with faintness, giddiness of the head, and tremour of the whole body, which lasted about half an hour.

Whether the bark in these cases was more poisonous in consequence of the small sprouts, from which it was taken, being broken down and partly withered, (which is known to be the case with the leaves,) or whether such effect will be uniformly produced when the bark is put immediately into closely stopped bottles, I will not attempt to decide. I relate the facts only, and hope they may lead to farther inquiries.

The discoveries of the French chemists have recently revealed the truth, that the deleterious principle of the cherry and laurel, the kernels of the peach, and some other vegetables, is very analogous to the prussick or hydeocyanic acid. This acid, in its condensed form, is one of the most violent poisons in the world; snuffed up the nostrils incautiously, it produced sickness, and even syncope; a feather dipped in it and drawn across the eye ball of an animal produces instant death—a method often resorted to by physiologists to terminate the sufferings of animals which have been made subservient to their experiments. Two drops have been known to kill a vigorous dog in an instant. The whole body of animals killed by it, exhales the odour of bitter almonds, no disorganization or evidence of inflammation ever being discovered.

TEMPERANCE.

Temperance Societies are the order of the day; but, according to the meaning given by these societies to the word Temperance, it only means abstinence from ardent spirits. But temperance really means something more than this, and must include abstinence from gluttony, not less than from excessive drinking. If the abuse of ardent spirits has led to much drunkenness in the land, voracity of appetite has made known and familiar among us a Destroyer, that, in his way too, slays his thousands—Dyspepsia!! to say nothing of other subalterns in the same service, and deriving their existence and power from the same source. We are no great admirers of societies or associations of any sort, for superintending and regulating the affairs of our neighbours: but if such be the impulse of the hour, we do not see why anti-gormandizing societies should not find favour in the eyes of the publick, as well as anti-drinking societies. We threw out the suggestion for those who may think it worth considering, and by way of illustrating the dangers incident to excessive eating, we subjoin some extracts from the article on Dyspepsia in the 7th No. of the Southern Review:

"We may safely take it for granted, after long observation, that almost every man, woman and child in this country, habitually eats and drinks twice as much every day, on a moderate estimate, as is necessary. Now this procedure must be corrected, both by those who would preserve and those who would regain their health; unless they adopt the Roman custom of taking a vomit immediately after their feasts. "The Romans," says Seneca, "vomit that they may eat, and eat that they may vomit. It was used, says Dr. Middleton, "as an instrument both of their luxury and of their health. Thus Vitellius, who was a famous glutton, is said to have preserved his life by constant vomits, while he destroyed all his companions who did not use the same caution. And the practice was thought so effectual, that it was the constant regimen of all the athletes or professed wrestlers, trained for the publick shews, in order to make them more robust.

When Cæsar dined with Cicero, and took a vomit before dinner, it was a compliment to the host, as it intimated a resolution to pass the day cheerfully, and to eat and drink freely with him."* It is, doubtless, more rational to adopt this emptying habit than to die with an overloaded stomach; and, as we scruple not to take an emetic to remove indisposition, we see not why it should not be taken to prevent it. They, however, who think otherwise, must be content to submit their appetites to a rigid rule. We lay it down then as a general rule, liable to very rare exceptions, that three light meals at the utmost, with meat at one only, are as much as any one, much more a dispeptic, should venture on; and if he make them two, it will, perhaps, be so much the better. Between these two meals no luncheon or any thing whatsoever should be eaten; and any repast in the nature of supper, after eight o'clock, should be eschewed. Some physicians have recommended that we should eat little and often. And Drs. Potter and Calhoun, in their edition of Gregory's Elements, say, "it will be proper, when the person is disposed to inordinate indulgence, to take some food half an hour before the regular meal, &c. to prevent oppression of the organ." To this Dr. Paris objects, because the several processes of chymification, chyliification, &c. follow each other in a certain order, as he says, and "cannot be simultaneously performed without such an increased expenditure of vital energy as weak persons cannot, without inconvenience, sustain: thus chyliification would appear to require the quiescence of the stomach, and sanguification to be still more incompatible with the act of chymification. If, therefore, the stomach be set to work during the late stages of digestion, the process will in weak persons, be much disturbed, if not entirely suspended." He adds, "the specious aphorism of Dr. Temple, that the stomach of an invalid is like a schoolboy, always at mischief unless it be employed, has occasioned more dispeptic disease than that respectable physician could ever have cured, had his practice been as successful as that of Æsculapius, and his life as long as that of an antediluvian." The reasons given by Dr. Paris are not satisfactory. He assumes the fact that chymification and chyliification cannot be carried on at the same time without too great an expenditure of vital power; yet if Dr. Phillip's account of digestion be correct, the chyme is gradually formed and poured into the duodenum as it is formed, whereby a fresh surface of food is exposed to the gastric juice—consequently, these two processes are simultaneous after the first layer of food has been chymified. But we have no doubt of the injurious nature of the practice, for other reasons. It interrupts the healthy habits of the stomach by putting it to work at irregular periods—it keeps it almost constantly employed—"all work and no play"—and it destroys the appetite which nature has implanted to excite the flow of saliva and gastric juice. An exception, however, must be made when the stomach is unable to bear food enough at one time, but such cases are very rare, and when such patients become a little stronger, the practice of a little and often should be abandoned."

A DUTCH TALE.

A ballad of Rooje is perhaps the most touching story which the Dutch possess. It is of a maid—a beloved maid—born at her mother's death —bred up 'midst the tears and kisses of her father—prattling thoughtlessly about her mother—every one's admiration for beauty, cleverness, and virtue—gentle as the moon shining on the downs. Her name was to be seen written again and again on the sands by the Zeeland youths—and scarcely a beautiful flower bloomed but was gathered for her. Now in Zeeland, when the south-winds of summer come, there comes too a delicate fish, which hides itself in the sand, and which is dug out as a luxury by the young people. It is the time of sport and gayety—and they venture far—far over the flat coast into the sea. The boys drag the girls among the waves—and Rooje was so dragged, notwithstanding many appeals. "A kiss, a kiss, or you go further," cried her conductor—she fled—he followed, both laughing:—"Into the sea—into the sea," said all her companions—he pushes her on—it is deeper, and deeper—she shrieks—she sinks—they sink together—the sands were faithless—there was no succour—the waves rolled over them—there was stillness and death:—The terrified playmates looked—

"All silently.—they looked again—
And silently sped home—
And every heart was bursting then,
But every tongue was dumb.

And still and stately o'er the wave,
The mournful moon arose,
Flinging pale beams upon the grave,
Where they in peace repose.

The wind glanced o'er the voiceless sea,
The billows kissed the strand—
And one sad dirge of misery
Filled all the mourning land."

CHAMBERS STREWED WITH RUSHES.

"Fashion of death! were not the king here, he should strew the chamber like a Rush
Buxary d'Ambois

Before carpets came into use, in England, the floors of chambers and the stage itself were strewed with rushes. Thus in the "Widows Tears."

"Their honours are upon coming, and the room not ready!

"Rushes and seats instantly."

And in the Coccomb:—

"Take care my house be handsome,
And the new stools set out, and boughs and rushes."

To the above remark of Whally, Mr. Gifford has caustically added:—

"My predecessor might have added, that from the indelicate and filthy habits of our fathers, carpets would have been a greivous nuisance: whereas rushes, which concealed the impurities with which they were charged, were, at convenient times, gathered up and thrown into the streets, where they only bred a general plague instead of a particular one." Gifford's Jonson, vol. 2.

Fastidious Brisk in Jonson's "Every man in his humour" observes:—

"Fore god, sweet lady, believe it, I do honour the meanest rush in this chamber for your love."

In "Cynthia's Revels," too, we are informed "that all the ladies and gallants lie languishing upon the rushes."

"Rushes," says Dr. Bullein, "that growe upon dry groundes, be good to strew in halles, chambers and galleries, to walk upon, defending apparel, as traynes of gownes and kirtles, from dust. Rushes be old courtiers: and when they be nothing worthe, then they be cast out of the doores: so be many that doe tread upon them. Bulwarke of defence 1759: they not only trod, however, but danced upon them: not the best way to keep their "trains from dust."

Thou dancest on my heart lascivious queen,
Even as upon these rushes." Dumb Knight.

BLACKGUARD.

In all great houses, in Britain, about two hundred years ago, there were a number of mean and dirty dependants: whose office it was to attend to the woodyards, sculleries, &c. Of these the most abject were selected to carry coals to the kitchens, halls, &c. To these wretches who attended the "Progresses" and rode in the carts with the pots and kettles, which with every article of the furniture were, at that time, moved from palace to palace, the people, in derision, gave the name of black guards, a term which has since become familiar but whose derivation has puzzled many an Etymologist. This degraded class is referred to by Webster:—

"A lousy knave, that within this twenty years rode with the black guards in the Duke's carriages, amongst spits and dripping pans."

White Devil.

And by old Ben:—

"And so the black guards are pleased with any lease of life."

And Dekker:—

"King. What place would you serve in?

Gazette. Any, but one of your turnbroaches; I would not be one of your black guards, there's too much fire in me already." Match me in London.

THE EXCELLENCE OF RELIGION.

I envy no quality of the mind, or intellect of others; not genius, power, wit or fancy; but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, I prefer a firm religious belief to every other blessing; for it makes discipline of goodness—creates new hopes, when earthly hopes vanish; and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life in death, and from corruption and decay, calls up beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture, and of shame, the ladder of ascent to paradise; and, far above all combinations of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions of palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blest, the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and sceptick only view gloom, decay, annihilation, and despair! BUNYAN AND THE QUAKER.

Bunyan had a native turn for wit and repartee which appears in the following story. Towards the close of his imprisonment, a Quaker called on him, probably hoping to make a convert of the author of the Pilgrim. He thus addressed him. "Friend John, I am come to thee with a message: from the Lord, and after having searched for thee in all the prisons in England, I am glad that I have found thee at last." "If the Lord had sent thee," returned Bunyan sarcastically, "you need not have taken so much pains to find me out, for the Lord knows I have been a prisoner in Bedford jail these twelve years past."

ANECDOTE OF A PAINTER.

Rembrandt, being in want of money, and finding his work of heavy vent, put into the newspapers that he was dead, and advertised a public sale of the finished and unfinished paintings in his house. Crowds flocked to the auction, eager to possess one of the last efforts of so great a master. The meanest sketch sold at a price, which entire pictures had never fetched before. After collecting the proceeds, Rembrandt came to life again; but the Dutch, who resent improbity even in genius, never would employ him after his resurrection.

FITZMAURICE THE MAGICIAN.

"I have lived three hundred years! In that time—in all that time, I have never seen the glorious sun descend, but followed still its rolling course through the regions of illimitable space. I have shivered on the frozen mountains of the icy north, and fainted beneath the sultry skies of the blazing east: the swift winds have been my viewless chariot, and on their career wings I have been hurried from clime to clime. But, nor light, nor air, nor heat, nor cold, have been to me as to the rest of my species; for I was doomed to find in their extremes a perpetual torment. I howled, under the sharp, pinching pangs of the icy north; I panted with agony, in the scorching fervour of the blazing east; and when mine eyes have ached, with vain efforts, to pierce the darkness of the earth's centre, they have been suddenly blasted with excessive and intolerable delight.

"All the currents of human affection—all that makes the past delightful, the present lovely, and the future coveted, were dried up within me. My heart was like the sands of the desert, parched and barren. No living stream of hope, of gladness, or of desire, quickened it with human sympathies. It was a bleak and withered region, the fit abode of ever-during sorrow and comfortless despair. I was as a blighted tree, that perishes not at the root, but is withered in all its branches. Tears, I had none. One gracious drop, falling from my seared orbs, would have been the blessed channel of pent-up griefs that seemed to crush my frenzied brain. Sighs, I breathed not. They would have heaved from my bursting heart some of that misery, which loaded it to anguish. Sleep never came. I was denied the common luxury of the common wretched, to lose, in its sweet oblivion, its brief forgetfulness, the sense of what I was. Death, natural death, closed his many doors against me. All that lived, except myself—the persecuted, the weary, and the heavily laden of man's race—could find a grave! I, alone, looked upon the earth, and felt that it had no resting place for me! God! God! what a forlorn and miserable creature is man, when, in his affliction, he can not say to the worm, I shall be yours! I might have cast away, indeed, the YENAKON—the Giver of Life—the elixir of the Sibyl—but that would have been to subject myself to a power of darkness, in whose fell wrath I should have suffered the casting away of mine eternal soul!

"Thus the stream of time rolled on, burying beneath its dark waves, our little span of present, in the huge ocean of the perpetual past, and devouring, as the food of both, our swift decaying future. But I floated on its surface, and beheld whole generations flourish and fade away, while age and silver hairs, growing infirmities, and the closing sigh that ends them all, mocked me with a horrible exemption. I remained, and might have remained, for ages yet to come, the fixed and unaltered image of what I was, when in Mauritania I encountered the potent Amamon, the damned magician of the den, but for that—woman's faith, and man's fidelity—which have made me what I am!

"This was my destiny. Now mark how I became enthralled to it; and how it befell, that at last I shook it off, and found redemption.

"In my middle manhood, when scarcely forty summers had glowed within my veins, I left my native Italy, and journeyed to the Holy Land, upon the strict vow of a self-imposed penance. It was for no sin committed in my days of youth, but for the satisfaction of an ardent piety, and the growing spirit of a long enkindled devotion. I had patrimonial wealth in Apulia; I had kindred; I had friends. I renounced them all, to dedicate myself, thenceforth, to the service of THE CROSS. My purpose was blessed, by a virtuous mother's prayers, that I might approve myself a worthy soldier of Christ; and it was sanctified by a holy priest at the altar.

"Even now, the recollection is strong within me, of the feelings with which, as the rising sun illumined the tops of the surrounding hills, I approached the once glorious, and still sacred, city of Jerusalem—that chosen seat of the Godhead—that Queen among the nations. Eclipsed, though it was, and its majestic head trodden into the dust, by the foot of the infidel, my gladdened eyes dwelt upon what was imperishable, and my wrapt imagination pictured what was destroyed. The valleys of Jehosaphat and Gehinnon, Mount Calvary, Mount Zion, and Mount Acre, stretched before me. The palace of King Herod, with its sumptuous halls of marble and of gold—the gorgeous Temple of Solomon—the lofty towers of Phasaelus and Mariamne—the palace of the Maccabees—the Hippodrome—the houses of many of the prophets—grew into existence again, beneath the creative force of fancy. I stood and wept. I knelt, and kissed the consecrated earth which once a Saviour trod."

THE IDIOT GIRL.

When Peverell reached his own house, his man Francis met him with a strangely mysterious look and manner.

"Here is one within," said he, "that will not, by any dint of persuasion, go; though I have been two good hours trying my skill to that end."

"Who is it?" inquired Peverell.

"That, neither can I discover," quoth Francis. "She knocked at the door—it might be something after eleven, perhaps near upon twelve—and when I opened it, she whips into the hall without saying a word, walks into every room in the house—I following her, as a beadle follows a rogue, till he sees him beyond the parish bounds—and at last takes possession of your low chair, and, without so much as 'by your leave,' begins to wring her hands, and cry 'Lord! Lord!' 'What do you want, good woman?' said I. But I might as well have addressed myself to the walls, for 'Lord! Lord!' was all her moan."

Peverell hastened into the room and there he saw poor Madge—her face buried in her hands, rocking to and fro, weeping most piteously, and as Francis had described, ever and anon calling upon the Lord, but in a tone of such utter wretchedness, that it pierced his very heart.

He spoke to her. She started up at the sound of his voice, looked at him, and then mournfully exclaimed, while she pointed to the ground—"They have buried her!"

"Then be comforted," said Peverell, in a kind and soothing voice; "your hardest trial is past."

"What a churl he was!" continued Madge, not heeding the words of Peverell; "I only asked him to keep the grave open till to-morrow, and he denied me! Only till to-morrow—for then, said I, the cold earth can cover us both. But he denied me! So I fell upon my knees, beside my Marian's grave, and prayed that he might never lose a child, to know that blessedness of sorrow which lies in the thought of soon sleeping with those we have loved and lost! It was very wrong in me, I know, to wish to call down such affliction on him—but he denied me—and I had to hear the rattling dust fall upon her coffin—ay, and to see that dark, deep grave filled up; as if a mother might not have her own child!"

"Poor afflicted creature!" exclaimed Peverell, in a half whisper to himself.

"Yes!" said Madge, drying her tears with her hands. "Yes! I have walked with grief, for my companion in this world, through many a sad and weary hour. But I shook hands with her, and we parted, at the grave of Marian. I buried all my troubles there. What is the hour?"

"Hard upon two," replied Peverell.

"Then I must be busy," replied Madge, in a wild, hurried manner, and smiling at Peverell, with a look of much importance, as if what she had to do were some profound secret. "You'll not betray me, if I tell you?" she continued, taking his hand—"Feel!" and she placed it on her heart. One, two; one, two; one, two—and so it goes on; it can not beat beyond two! Oh, God! in what pain it is before it breaks!"

She now returned to the chair from which she had risen, at the sound of Peverell's voice. He approached nearer; and (with a view rather to draw her gently from her own thoughts, than from any desire that she should leave his house,) he asked her "if she would go home?"

"Yes," she replied; "bear with me yet a little while, and I'll go. It is near the time I promised Marian, when last I kissed her wintry cheek, as she lay shrouded in her coffin; and I may not fail. Lord! Lord! what a troubled and worthless world this seems to me now! A week ago, and the sun, and the moon, and the stars, and the green earth, and all that was upon it, were dear to mine eyes; and I should have wept to look my last at them! But now, I behold nothing it contains, save my Marian's grave! You will see me laid in it, for pity's sake—won't you?"

"Ay," said Peverell, "but that will be when I am gray, and thinking of my own: so, cheer up. He that shall toll the bell for thee; now sleeps in his cradle, I'll warrant."

She beckoned Peverell to her, and taking his hand, she again placed it on her heart. A sad, melancholy smile played for a moment across her pale wrinkled face, and her glazed eyes kindled into a fleeting expression of frightful gladness, as she feebly exclaimed, "Do you feel? One!—one!—one!—and hardly that. I breathe only from here," she continued, pointing to her throat. "Feel!—feel!—one!—one!—another!—how I gasp!—see!—see!"

She ceased to speak; the hand which retained Peverell's relaxed its hold—her head dropped—one long-drawn sigh was heaved—and poor Madge resigned a being touched with sympathies and feelings not often found in natures of nobler quality, in the world's catalogue of nobility. If, among the thousand doors which death holds open for mortal man to pass through, ere he puts on immortality, there be one, the rarest of them all, for broken hearts, this hapless creature found it. A self accusing spirit bowed her to the earth, with the sharpest of all griefs—a mother's anguish for an only child—lost to her, as gamblers lose fortunes—thrown away by her own hand.

MISCELLANY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

THE LEGENDS OF ALBANY.

We who inhabit these confederated Republics are in comparison with the rest of the world, a new people. Our arrival at the years of discretion has been exceedingly precocious. Antiquity can scarcely be said to have appeared in our land. The graves of our ancestors are still plainly visible, and but few portions of our history are seen through the dim veil of uncertainty and tradition. Our countrymen seek in foreign climes and adventures the objects on which to exercise their genius, and the few legends that still haunt some of the oldest parts of our country, the spectres of the past, are gradually fading from remembrance and if told at all forgotten almost as soon.

Yet new as our country is, and young as is our existence as a nation, I am convinced that there are many places in our land upon which the dust of antiquity has begun to accumulate, places which though destitute of the tales of ancient chivalry, have been the scenes of many a dark and wild adventure, and I hope that fact will support me in the assertion when I say that Albany possesses as rich a mine of legendary lore as any other place in the Union. We claim to be the oldest city in the states,—to have acquired the first charter. The relics of the olden day project their peaked roofs to our gaze in almost all our streets—legends in themselves. The Old Elm still exists, under whose shade generation after generation have passed; whose cooling influence all have appreciated. The Council of the Savage was held around it,—the grave assemblage of the Hollander blessed its luxuriant branches—the Colonist felt his loyalty to the crown begin and end there, and how much of the present wisdom of our municipality is owing to its influence I leave to others to decide.

"That green and venerable tree,"

But not alone are we to look for the mementos of the past from inanimate objects. There are those who daily walk our streets

"Whose thoughts are with the olden days," and to whom the reminiscences of what we call "old times" are far more familiar and acceptable than the occurrences of the present hour. There are not a few who, rejecting the modern innovation of dress, cherish the same costume in which they appeared

"When Life's enchanting dream was new," they serve as the links to connect the past with the present. Long may they continue.

One of the talented authors of the Talisman, says that there is romance, genuine romance, in Albany. He is correct, our city has passed through days of dread and danger which could not fail to bring with them singular and wild adventures. If the sceptick asks when those times were, I would tell him it was when the scite of our city, where at present was a large hill covered with thick forest and exhibiting as its only mark of the white man, a few scattering huts in which the trader affrighted at his own temerity, essayed the first traffick with the myriads of demoniack savages around him. And it was in the time too when the settlers had obtained a stronger foothold, when Fort Orange reared its walls of protection and the broad banner of the High Mightinesses claimed all around it as its own, when the manners and customs of the little colonies were as completely Dutch, as though they had never left their Vaderland; and I would tell him of the era when the inhabitants found themselves quietly transferred from the government of the Netherlands to that of England, almost without a struggle.

"Twenty spires glisten to the skies,"

A diversity of other changes have befallen our city, the sway of the Briton has yielded to "The People by the Grace of God, free and independent." Hostile armies once threatened our city, it has been the darling place of their ambition. Burgoyne from the North and Vaughan from the South, coveted its possession, but the one made his entry here as a prisoner, the other was repulsed long before he could reach us. The time is still in the recollection of a few of our oldest men, when the limited bounds of our city were placed under a vigilant patrol to protect them from the attack of the savage. One of the first meetings of Delegates from the colonies was held at Albany. The titled noblemen of the Eastern Continent have sought an asylum here; our graves have received their dust. Government after government, and year after year, has brought new scenes to the history of our city. Now, all is changed, we enjoy the luxuries of life, where the deer once startled at the step of the Indian. Shall not these legends then, which must and which do exist among us, be preserved from utter oblivion? Let not the tale of our olden days go to the grave of forgetfulness

"Unwept, unsung."

The contrast between the pains and perils of our ancestors and our present free and happy condition, will heighten the pleasures of the latter, and strengthen the remembrance of the former. The genius and talent of our city could scarcely be devoted to a more praiseworthy subject.

"This is our own, our native land."

THE FEMALE OFFICERS.

In 1805 I was residing in Tournay. At the conclusion of a dejeune dinatoire, at which about twenty persons had assisted, the worthy host, Mr. Delvigne, took me aside, and in a low tone asked me what I thought of the two sisters, one of whom had been seated by me during the repast. "The lady with whom I conversed," was my reply, "is evidently of a mild, amiable disposition; witty, quick at repartee without a particle of causticite; her person graceful; her shape lovely in the extreme—perhaps almost too slender; her eyes, large, brilliant, and expressive; her hands and feet the smallest and most delicate I have ever beheld: she may, without exaggeration, be termed a very pretty woman;—yet, I think, she is not without a degree of coquetterie in her composition; but that, you will say, is the natural concomitant of nearly the whole of her sex. The gentleman who sat opposite to her is, I presume, one of her admirers, probably a lover, and apparently not a successful suitor. He appears to be unhappy,—possibly experiencing some jealousy whilst she was in earnest conversation with me and the person who sat at her left. The mere restlessness he evinced, the more she seemed to exert her talents in rendering herself pleasing to me and to the company. She was asked to sing, and instantly complied: her melodious and playful voice gave full effect to a satirical and facetious song, entitled "Le Malheureux Felix." Her admirer sighed—then frowned—then sighed again: but all would not do; she continued her song, enraptured all the company, and, at its termination, proposed that we should remove to the garden and dance quadrilles. In vain the lover solicited her hand for only one dance: she was sorry—was always engaged to some other person. It was clear she had made arrangements to dance with persons she had previously selected, and who would instantly come forward at any sign she made."

"You are mistaken altogether," said Mr. Delvigne "in ascribing this behaviour to coquetterie; she is naturally of a cheerful disposition, and the gaiety she evinces is not assumed. Her motives for acting thus proceed from circumstances highly honourable to her character. The gentleman you have remarked is the son of a French Marquess, recently returned from emigration;—he indeed loves the lady, and has declared his passion, but she refuses to give him the slightest encouragement. The objections she makes are, that her age exceeds that of Monsieur de R. by eight years, and that she would never enter into a family of ancienne noblesse that might look upon her with distrust, and perhaps with feelings of horror."—"Of horror!" exclaimed I, "how can such a sentiment exist towards so lovely a creature?"—"Attend," replied my friend, "to what I have to relate about this interesting and extraordinary female. You would not suppose, when looking at her, that she is in her twenty-ninth or thirtieth year, she scarcely seems to have exceeded the age of eighteen. You will hardly believe me if I tell you, that when only sixteen years old, she entered the ranks of the Republican Army, accompanied by her sister, served during three years, and was promoted, for an action of great valour, to be Aid-camp to Dumouriez, one of our most distinguished Generals.

"During the whole of the time she was in the army her conduct was marked with the strictest propriety, and her military talents were duly appreciated by her superiors. Unlike the Maid of Orleans, she and her sister never appeared in the field otherwise than in female attire. Their modest behaviour, beauty, and amiable manners, caused them to be universally respected, and their presence caused the most enthusiastick feelings among the military, many of whom, particularly the younger officers, strove to gain the approbation of these interesting women by feats of bravery. Upon one occasion, the elder, of whom I have been speaking, being then a Lieutenant, was despatched by her general officer to interrupt a part of the enemy's waggon-train;—she not only completely succeeded, but actually disarmed the officer who commanded it, and brought him a prisoner into the camp. In this skirmish she received a slight sabre wound in the neck. The Austrian officer whom she had taken became the laughing-stock of the French military; and, in a fit of rage and despair, at having delivered up his sword to a female, he committed suicide by blowing out his brains. The young lady rapidly recovered from her wound; and the Government, to reward her gallant conduct, presented her with a handsome country residence, with several acres of land.

"When Dumouriez was compelled to leave the French territory, she left the army with her sister, the young lady you see sitting by M. de Noailles.† Their father, before the Revolution, was an opulent Rentier, but had been ruined by some Austrian nobleman. He swore eternal enmity to that nation; and when war broke out, he solicited and obtained the situation of Quarter-master of Cavalry, and took his two daughters with him to the army:—such was the cause which led them to a military life.

"You will now understand," continued Mr. Delvigne, "the reasons which prevent her accepting the hand of Monsieur de R. Her opinion is, that a female who has lived in a camp ought never to become a wife. "My conduct," she adds, with a smile, "will bear the minutest investigation: but gentlemen, you know, are apt to be suspicious;—and besides, who can tell, if a husband behaved harshly or unkindly towards me, whether I might not call him out,—fight, and disarm him."

"The name of our fair Amazon," continued my friend, "will descend to posterity in our military annals; and future historians will celebrate the gallant exploits of the lovely and amiable Fernig."

EXCERPTS.

"The best Words of the best Authors."

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task he undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain that one. Pope.

Worldly ambition is founded on pride or envy, but emulation (or laudable ambition) is actually founded in humility, for it evidently implies that we have a low opinion of our present attainments, and think it necessary to be advanced; and especially in religious concerns it is so far from being pride for a man to wish himself spiritually better, that it is highly commendable, and what we are strongly exhorted to in many parts of the Bible.

Bishop Hall.

Volatility of words is carelessness in action; words are the wings of action. Lavater.

The good yeoman wears russet clothes, but makes golden payment, having tin in his buttons, but silver in his pocket. If he chance to appear in clothes above his rank it is to grace some great man with his service, and then he blushes at his own bravery. Otherwise, he is the sweet landmark, whence foreigners may take aim of the ancient English customs; the gentry more floating after foreign fashions. Fuller.

In order to look into any person's temper I generally make my first observation upon his laugh, whether he is easily moved, and what are the passages which throw him into that agreeable kind of convulsion. People are never so much unguarded as when they are pleased; and laughter being a visible symptom of some inward satisfaction, it is then, if ever, we may believe the face. There is, perhaps, no better index to point us to the particularities of the mind than this, which is itself one of the chief distinctions of our rationality. For, as Milton says,

Smiles from reason flow, to brutes denied—
And are of love the food.

It may be remarked in general, under this head, that the laugh of a man of wit is for the most part but a faint constrained kind of half laugh, as such persons are never without some diffidence about them: but that of fools is the most honest, natural, open laugh in the world. Steele.

If you find a person accusing you of willingly perverting the truth, merely because you differ from him in judgment, say no more to him; for how can you expect him to confide in what you say, who already believes you to be a hypocrite? For he who wilfully perverts judgment is the worst of all hypocrites. There is another reason why you should say no more to such a person, and that is he sets up for infallibility. He thinks himself so infallibly right that all who differ from him must do so against the dictates of their own judgment. It is therefore useless to reason with him, for who can upset infallibility? What is the most mortifying of all, those who are the most ignorant, the most governed by passion, personal interest, or prejudice, themselves, are the most vehement contemners of others, and the most pertinacious of their own opinions. Let them alone therefore.

We see in needleworks and embroideries it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon a sad and solemn ground, than to have a dark and melancholy work upon a lightsome ground: judge, therefore, of the pleasure of the heart by the pleasure of the eye. Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant where they are incensed or crushed: for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1829.

93- New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

93- We recommend to the attentive perusal of every one, the circular of the New-York State Temperance Society, which we publish in another column. We do not subscribe to the extravagant tales which pronounce us "a nation of drunkards," and give currency to a multitude of libels and bug-bear stories which would sink us beneath the savages, if they were true; but we hold it to be a self-evident truth, that the less men drink intoxicating liquors, the more will they be disposed to cultivate the peace and harmony of society.

LORENZO DOW. This excellent citizen and esteemed preacher of the Methodist persuasion, has been for some weeks past, engaged in a tour of religious duties in Upper Canada, and the western parts of this state. On Saturday last he delivered a discourse in Palmyra, Wayne county. Some remarks from his caustic and excentric pen, on the subject of anti-masonry, are concluded in the Record of today. There is none, we think, who will deny that Mr. Dow is governed purest principles, and his opinions and reasoning will be received with deference, and be respected by honest men, the declarations of those who make a merit of perjury, to the contrary notwithstanding.

HUZZA FOR RITNER! The progress of anti-masonry in Pennsylvania is truly astonishing—it beats every thing we ever heard of. The Washington Examiner says that a general meeting was lately held by the antis in Chartiers, and several adjoining townships, "at which there were present exactly seven persons!" And "so great is the interest manifested in that section of country in favour of Mr. Ritner, that an adjourned meeting was appointed and held a few days afterwards, at which were present eight souls, all told!" A bright and mighty one of the west says, "if Ritner crosses the Susquehanna with 20,000 majority, he will be governor, as sure as fate!" And, truly, after the above display of strength, we are very much disposed to congratulate the prophet on his prospects.

We copy the following description of St. Paul's church, recently erected in this city for the use of the congregation of which the Rev. Mr. BURY is Rector, from the Daily Advertiser. This building was consecrated to the worship of God, by Bishop Hobart, agreeably to the forms and usages of the Protestant Episcopal Church, on Monday last, and will be opened for divine service to-morrow morning, at the usual hour.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH. This edifice is situated at the corner of Ferry and Dalleus streets, in this city. The building was commenced a year ago last May, by Mr. Henry Peers, the builder and contractor, and Mr. J. Clement, the mason, and is now completed.

The design is from an ancient Gothick temple. The width of the main body of the building is fifty-six feet by eighty-five long; fronted with a semi-octagonal vestibule of thirty-two feet diameter, with a corresponding roof, rising into the front pediment of the main roof. The walls of the whole building are of unwrought stone, 3½ feet thick in the basement—the upper walls, two feet. There are five windows on each side, and two in front supported by center piers, diverging at the head, so as to form three distinct Gothick arches to the casements and frames of each window. The mullions are diagonally disposed, and contain glass of 5½ inches square. The angles of the walls and the partition wall at the landing of the gallery stairs, are supported by buttresses of two feet square, having in each three abatements coped with cut stone, and surmounted with quadrangular Gothick pinnacles. The eaves finished with a deep Gothick frieze and cornice, and the parapet carried up in the form of battlements.

There are niches in the right and left angles of the entrance way, prepared for statuary. The front door is ten feet wide, on each side of which are columns supporting the arch of a window above the impost of the door. The eaves of the vestibule roof are finished with a cornice and chainwork, and the angles surmounted with pinnacles.

The interior finish is also Gothick, and painted (by Messrs. Russel and Davis of this city) in imitation of oak; there are 148 pews below, and 66 in the gallery. The pulpit, screen and altar were designed and drawn by Mr. George Vernon, architect, and built by Mr. J. Biggelow. The screen is twenty-four feet wide, supported by four octagonal Gothick columns, in panel work, and rising about eighteen feet from the chancel floor. The columns are finished at the top with pinnacles, ornamented and encircled with carved leaves and vines; in the centre of the screen and immediately over the pulpit, there rises a pediment supported by clustered columns and an arch; the pediment is also surmounted with a richly ornamented pinnacle extending to the ceiling and standing in relief, in a niche prepared to receive it. The top of the screen and bases of the pinnacles are finished with castellated battlements, and the panel work in quatre foils.

The church is supplied with a large and beautiful organ, from the factory of Mr. Henry Eben, of the city of New-York.

This church has been built for the congregation of which the Rev. Richard Bury is the rector, and the building and interior finish has been done under the superintendence and direction of Mr. W. W. Dougherty.

The whole building may be considered as an excellent specimen of Gothick architecture, and there are excellencies in the design and execution of the screen and pulpit, and in the imitation of the oak, which are very creditable to the artists and mechanics who executed them. It is an ornament to the city, and will do credit to the age in which it was built.

The Cherokee Phenix says that reading and writing are as common among the Indians at New-Echota, as among the neighbouring whites; and asserts that "those Cherokees who have attended to their alphabet (invented by Mr. Guess) one week, write more correctly than the English scholar, who has been steadfast to his book two years." For the sake of the editor's modesty we hope he tells truth.

A directory of the city of Cincinnati has recently been published, containing, besides the usual local information, an article upon the rise and progress of the city, and some interesting statistical information. From a notice of the work, (which is stated to be the first of the kind ever issued there) in the Chronicle of the 15th inst. we select the following items.

" In 1795	our population was	500
1800	"	750
1805	"	950
1810	"	2320
1815	"	4,000
1819	"	10,293
1824	"	12,015
1826	"	16,230
1829	the first half of the year	24,148

" The ordinary revenue of the city for the year ending in March 1829, was upwards of $25,000.

" About 30,000 square yards of street pavement will be made during the present year.

" The amount of postage in this city for the year ending 31st March 1829, was $12,150, giving an increase of near $4,000 since 1826.

" Twenty-three mails arrive and depart weekly, 18 of which are carried in stages and five on horseback.

The anti-masons of Vermont, who, like their brethren in every quarter, are more noted for their noise than their logic, are gifted with an odd sort of consistency. Samuel Clark, Esq. an anti-administration candidate for councillor, and who was nominated for the same office by the late anti-masonic convention for that quarter of the world, "is a Royal Arch Mason, and attends regularly upon the communication of Lodges in his vicinity!" The antis are so excessively patriotick that they have forgotten which side they belong to. We hope they may soon come to their senses and return to their heterogeneous labours: their support is mortifying and disgraceful to an honest man; and cannot be too severely deprecated, by those who, in the language of Mr. Colden, would "eachew all evil."

A new musical work, under the title of Peninsular Melodies, is in progress in London. The Court Journal says it will consist of a collection of melodies by the most esteemed composers of Spain and Portugal. The poetry is to be chiefly by Mrs. Hemans; which will guarantee its grace and elegance; and the melodies are to be harmonized by Senor la Disma, Maitre de la Chapelle to the King of Spain.

A ship from the Indies lately arrived at Boston, brought from Siam two youths, connected together by an elastick ligament, extending from the lower extremity of the breastbone of one to that of the other. The following letter relating to this curious freak of nature, is copied from the Boston Daily Advertiser.

Some Account of the Siamese Boys lately brought to Boston.

DEAR SIR—In compliance with your request, as well as in obedience to what I consider a professional duty, I undertake to give some account of the Siamese Boys, and particularly of the medium by which they are united together.

The boys are supposed to be about eighteen years old. They are of moderate stature; though not as tall as boys of that age in this country. They have the Chinese complexion and physiognomy. The forehead is more elevated and less broad than that of the Chinese, owing to malformation. They much resemble each other; yet not so much but that upon a little observation, various points of dissimilarity may be noticed.

The substance by which they are connected is a mass two inches long at its upper edge, and five at the lower. Its breadth from above downwards may be four inches; and its thickness in a horizontal direction, two inches. Of course it is not a rounded cord, but thicker in the perpendicular, than in the horizontal direction. At its lower edge is perceived a single umbilical, through which passed a single umbilical cord, to nourish both children in the fetal state. Placing my hand on this substance, which I will denominate the cord, I was surprised to find it extremely hard. On further examination, this hardness was found to exist at the upper part of the cord only; and to be prolonged into the breast of each boy. Tracing it upwards, I found it to be constituted by a prolongation of the ensiform cartilage of the sternum, or extremity of the breast bone. The breadth of this cartilage is an inch and a half; its thickness may be about the eighth of an inch. The cartilages proceeding from each sternum meet at an angle, and then seem to be connected by a ligament, so as to form a joint. This joint has a motion upwards and downwards, and also a lateral motion. The latter operating in such way that when the boys are in either direction the edges of the cartilage are found to meet and shut. The lower face of this cartilage is concave; and under it is felt a rounded cord, which may be the remains of the umbilical cord. Besides this there is nothing remarkable felt in the connecting substance. I could distinguish no pulsating vessel.

The whole of this cord is covered by the skin. It is remarkably strong, and has no great sensibility; for they allow themselves to be pulled by a rope fastened to it, without exhibiting uneasiness. On ship board, one of them sometimes climbed on the capstain of the vessel, the other followed as well as he could, without complaining.

When I first visited the boys, I expected to see them pull on this cord in different directions, as their attention was attracted by different objects. I soon perceived that this did not happen. The slightest impulse of one to move in any direction, is immediately followed by the other; so that they would appear to be influenced by the same wish. This harmony in their movements is not the result of a volition, excited at the same moment. It is a habit, formed by necessity. At an early period of life it is probable they sometimes differed. At present this is so rarely the case, that the gentlemen who brought them, have noticed only a single instance. Having been accustomed to use the cold bath, one of them wished it when the weather was cool; to which the other objected. They were soon reconciled by the interference of the commander of the ship. They never hold a consultation as to their movements. In truth, I have never seen them speak to each other, although they converse constantly with a Siamese lad, who is their companion. They always face in one direction; standing nearly side by side; and are not able, without inconvenience, to face in the opposite direction; so that one is always at the right and the other at the left. Although not placed exactly in a parallel line, they are able to run and leap with surprising activity. On some occasions, a gentleman in sport pursued them round the ship, when they came suddenly to the hatchway, which had been inadvertently left open. The least check would have thrown them down the hatchway and probably killed one or both; but they leapt over it without difficulty.

They are quite cheerful: appear intelligent: attending to whatever is presented to them, and readily acknowledging any civility. As a proof of their intelligence it is stated, that in a few days, they learned to play at drafts well enough to become antagonists of those who had long been versed in the game.

The connexion between these boys might present an opportunity for some interesting observations in regard to physiology and pathology. There is, no doubt, a network of blood vessels and some minute nerves passing from one to the other. How far these parts are capable of transmitting the action of medicines and of diseases, and especially of what particular medicines and what diseases, are points well worthy of investigation. Captain Coffin informed me they had never taken medicine since they had been under his care. Once they were ill from eating too heartily, but were relieved by the efforts of nature. He thinks that any indisposition of one extends to the other; that they are inclined to sleep at the same time; eat about the same quantity, and perform other acts with great similarity. Both he and Mr. Hunter, the gentleman who united with him in bringing them here, are of opinion that touching one of them when they are asleep, awakes both.

The pulsations of the heart are exactly alike in both boys. I counted seventy three pulsations in a minute, while they were sitting; counting first in one boy, then in the other. I then placed my fingers on an arm of each boy, and found the pulsations take place exactly together. One of them stooping suddenly to look at my watch, his pulse became much quicker than that of the other; but after he had returned to his former posture, in about a quarter of a minute, his pulse was precisely like that of the other boy. This happened repeatedly. Their respirations are, of consequence, exactly simultaneous.

This harmony of action in primary functions shows a reciprocal influence, which may lead to curious observations and important deductions. Whether it will be in my power to obtain any further information in regard to them, is uncertain. If not, some one else can better accomplish the task.

Let me add that there is nothing unpleasant in the aspect of these boys. On the contrary, they must be viewed as presenting one of the most interesting objects of natural history, which have ever been known to scientific men.

You are at liberty to employ the above statement in such way as you think likely to be useful.

I have the honour to be, yours, &c.

NEW YORK STATE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

(CIRCULAR)

The Executive Committee of the "New-York State Temperance Society," after some unavoidable delay, have at length commenced their operations, and would now call upon the citizens of the state for their co-operation and aid.

The committee cannot but hope that the community are now ready for a vigorous and united movement in this noble enterprise.

The levity and incredulity with which the incipient efforts in this cause were at first regarded, have, in a great measure, ceased. The light that has been shed upon the subject—the many experiments, triumphant and glorious in their results, that have been made, can scarcely leave a doubt in the minds of candid and reflecting men, that something may be done to arrest the evils of intemperance, and that it is the duty of every good citizen to contribute his influence and aid.

The principles of the temperance enterprise are few and easily understood; and no man, it is believed, can fairly examine them, without becoming convinced of the following truths—

1st. That the evils of intemperance in this country are so serious, that something ought at once to be done to arrest them.

2d. That these evils may be removed by an entire abstinence from distilled spirits on the part of temperate men.

3d. That such an entire abstinence would be productive of no injury, either to the interests or character of the community. And

4th. That such an abstinence may be effected by associations to sustain each other in these new habits, and thus to make them reputable and common.

In view of these truths, so fully sustained as they are by arguments and facts now extensively before the public, the committee propose to proceed at once to organize such associations in every county and town, throughout the state, and by this means to concentrate and embody, as systematically and rapidly as possible, the influence of the friends of temperance amongst us.

In pursuance of this object, they have engaged the services of an agent, who is also secretary of the society, whose time and labours will be devoted exclusively to carrying forward its enterprise, and whose first object will be to visit, as soon as practicable, every county in the state, to organize county auxiliaries. It must be seen, however, that neither the committee nor their agent can accomplish much without the co-operation of the friends of the object generally throughout the state.

This co-operation, therefore, from their fellow citizens, they earnestly solicit; and beg leave candidly and concisely to state some of the ways in which it may be afforded.

1st. In the first place, they do not ask for money. The expenses of their agent and the other incidental expenses of the state society, will be sustained exclusively by a few benevolent individuals in the city of Albany, and in other parts of the state, who will stand mutually pledged to furnish the funds to promote this enterprise throughout the state.

It is hoped, however, that county societies, when organized, will take upon themselves the responsibility and the expense of organizing town auxiliaries in every town within their limits.

2d. They request that clergymen of all denominations will take the earliest measures, by preaching—publicly reading printed discourses—private conversation, &c.—to prepare the minds of their hearers to act understandingly and promptly, when called upon to form associations.

3d. They ask that the conductors of newspapers, whether religious, literary, or political, will appropriate a column, or part of a column, in every paper, for articles, either original or selected, on the subject of temperance, and thus exert, in favour of this cause, that mighty moral power with which the conductors of the periodical press in this country are entrusted.

4th. It is desired that country societies already organized, will declare themselves auxiliary to the state society, and immediately forward a copy of their constitution and a list of their officers, without expense if practicable, to the secretary of that society at Albany; and that town associations will declare themselves auxiliary to their county society; and also, that reports may be sent from the town to the county, and from the county to the state society, previous to the meeting of the state society in January next; so that at that time the statistics and other information on this subject, collected from all parts of the state, may be condensed and arranged, and again sent abroad for the mutual edification and encouragement of all.

5th. It is requested, that every individual in this community, and especially all who are in public and influential stations, will immediately examine this subject with attention, and enquire, whether the effort now making to rescue our country from the degradation and the miseries of intemperance, is not at least worth an experiment; and whether he ought not at once to give it his decided countenance and support.

Fellow-Citizens of the State of New-York: Shall this enterprise succeed? Shall the state of New-York go forward and throw the whole weight of its influence in favour of this effort for our country's good; or shall it be found reluctant and opposing? Shall the multitudes from other states and from foreign countries, who annually throng our rivers, and canals, and high-roads, to visit our springs and our water-falls,—shall they find here a tone of public sentiment on this subject, which shall be healthful, and which they shall carry back, with electrical rapidity, to all parts of the country,—or shall that tone of sentiment be disastrous to ourselves, and pernicious in its influence, as it spreads around, to others? Upon you, fellow-citizens, the answer to these momentous enquires mainly depends.

THE SPANISH INVADING EXPEDITION. The schr. Eclipse, at New-Orleans from Tampico, which place she left on the morning of the 19th July, reports "that part of the Spanish squadron which left Havana, consisting of one ship of the line, one frigate, and two corvettes, had arrived, and were at anchor off that place. The transports having on board the troops had not yet been heard of. The commandant at Tampico had received instructions from his government to declare that port blockaded on the first appearance of the hostile fleet, which we infer, has actually taken place in consequence of its arrival. It is also stated that a levy by government of ten millions of dollars was to take place on all monies that should be brought from the interior, for the purpose of clothing and paying the army, which was to be accounted for at the close of the campaign. Orders had been given to station 10,000 troops at Tampico, 8,000 at Campeachy, and at all other places on the coast in the same proportion.

The Pensacola Gazette announces that the U. S. schr. Shark, capt. Voorhees, arrived at that port on the 1st inst.

On the 20th July, capt. Voorhees understood at Trinidad that letters had that day been received from Vera Cruz, stating that our MINISTER, MR. POINSETT, HAD BEEN ASSASSINATED at the city of Mexico. This report was generally believed at Trinidad.

In relation to the reported assassination of Mr. Poinsett, the N. Y. American remarks as follows:—

The rumour of the assassination of Mr. Poinsett, brought by the U. S. schr. Shark to Pensacola, seems to us to be sufficiently contradicted by the fact, that news from Tampico direct, of 19th July, has been received in New-Orleans, and no allusion is made to any such occurrence or rumour. Capt. Voorhees heard the rumour at Trinidad, (Trinidad de Cuba, we presume, on the south side of that island) on the 20th July—as coming from Vera Cruz, which is distant (lying to leeward too) not less than ten day's sail—and Vera Cruz itself is more distant from the city of Mexico than Tampico—so that this rumour cannot be well founded.

ITEMS.

Generous Offer. The proprietors of the Academy buildings and grounds in Middletown, Conn. lately occupied by Capt. Partridge, as the seat of his military and scientific institution, have offered to present them, as a donation to the Methodist Episcopal Church, to aid in the establishment of a college or university in that place on certain conditions.

The buildings, which are of very permanent construction, and grounds are thought to be worth forty thousand dollars. They are, however, estimated at $33,333 33, and are given gratuitously on condition that the Methodist community raise an additional sum of $66,666 66 for the endowment of the college which is required to go into operation Oct. 1 1830. Should the N. York Conference of the Methodist Church unite with the New-England Conference for the establishment of a college, no doubt Middletown would be the location, and the terms of this generous offer promptly complied with; but if the New-England Conference must sustain such an enterprise alone, while New-York should found its own college, a preference will probably be given to Wilbraham as the seat of a college for the use of New-Englanders. [New-England Palladium.]

A correspondent of the N. Y. Courier recommends, as the season for musquitos to be plentiful has just arrived, to throw into each cistern of rain water, two or three small shovelfulls of common ashes, which will destroy the insects before they emerge from their chrysalis state. The preventive has succeeded at the South.

The London papers mention as a very curious document that in which it is shown that the amount of our national debt is just one fourth of the annual public expenditure of Great Britain. Miserable democracy!

Mr. Rothschild has been cast by a Chancery suit. The suit was brought against him by Mr. Brookman, on account of various disastrous operations of Exchange undertaken for him. Mr. Rothschild was adjudged it is said, to pay to the plaintiff £20,000 sterling, with thirteen years' interest.

Advantage of being drunk. A stage-coach near London ran over the leg of a drunken woman lying in the road. She was carried to St. Bartholomews Hospital and the leg amputated—the stump bandaged, and every thing placed in apple-pie order before she became sober—or was aware of the accident or operation. As the Yankees would say, "she must have been pretty considerably in for it."

The Journal des Debats considers the fall of Silistria as almost a decisive blow for the Turks. It secured to the Russians the whole line of the Danube, from which to operate into the heart of the Ottoman empire in Rometia.

The Difference. The Turks are called infidels and atheists, but they attribute their successes to the favour of Almighty God. The Russians are professed christians, but they supplicate the blessing of the God of War.

STANZAS.

'Tis midnight—and you silent moon
Has but a midway path to trace,
And we shall lose, alas! how soon
All memory of its placid face.

O! brightly will the morning come,
And ushered with its gaudy light,
Sin will its golden pinions plume,
And breathe o'er all its withering blight.

I look around—the pensive flowers
Are crowned with light profusely strown,
And fleetly the enchanting hours
Seem on the wings of radiance borne.

And yet here in this balmy air,
So pure, so healing to the heart,
There comes a wasting sense of care,
A keen and a corroding smart—

A thirsting for an absent one,
Whose spirit, and whose hopes are mine,
Whose smiles, whose voice, and every tone
Are as a seraphs, so divin.

And I had left her carelessly,
And roamed o'er many a joyous scene,
With heart that seemed untouched and free,
Nor told the grief that gnawed within.

I who had folded her in youths
Fondest, and earliest embrace,
And kist the away the tears in ruth,
That fell upon her angel face—

Had left her with a heart all broken,
For other, gayer ones had strove
To lip the words that Love hath spoken,
And make a mockery of love.

And time stole by, and I had been
A weary and a heart-sick one;
With apathy all sights had seen;
And hope despondingly had flown.

It matters not to say we met,
To say that youths fair sky was clear,
That her whom I would once forget,
Was to my bosom now more dear,

But once again I am away,
Amid a whispering wild of flowers,
And hill, and tree, and flowers are gay,
And bear away the flying hours.

And I am sad and sorrowful
Beneath the moons transcendent light,
Where luxury doth seem to lull
The very darkness of the night.

For thinking of thee, Isabel,
I win much sorrow for my heart;
For that far time I cannot tell
When we shall meet no more to part.

I SPEAK NOT—I TRACE NOT.

I speak not, I trace not, I breathe not thy name—
There is grief in the sound—there were guilt in the fame;
But the tear which now burns on my cheek may impart
The deep thought that dwells in that silence of heart.

Too brief for our passion, too long for our peace,
Were those hours—can their joy or their bitterness cease?
We repent, we abjure, we will break from our chain—
We must part, we must fly, to unite it again.

Oh! thine be the gladness, and mine be the guilt;
Forgive me, adored one—forsake if thou wilt;
But the heart which I bear shall expire undebased,
And man shall not break it, whatever thou mayest.

And stern to the haughty, but humble to thee,
My soul in its bitterest blackness shall be;
And our days seem as swift, and our moments more sweet,
With thee by my side, than the world at our feet.

One sigh of thy sorrow, one look of thy love,
Shall turn me or fix, shall reward or reprove;
And the heartless may wonder at all we resign,
Thy lip shall reply not to them, but to mine.

IN THE VALLEY OF WATERS.

In the valley of waters we wept o'er the day
When the host of the stranger made Salem his prey,
And our heads on our bosoms all drooping lay,
And our hearts were so full of the land far away.

The song they demanded in vain—it lay still
In our souls, as the wind that hath died on the hill:
They called for the harp—but our blood they shall spill
Ere our right hand shall teach them one tone of their skill.

All stringlessly hung on the willow's sad tree,
As dead as her dead leaf those mute harps must be
Our hands may be fettered—our tears still are free,
For our God and our glory—and Sion!—Oh, thee!

From the same.

THEY SAY THAT HOPE IS HAPPINESS.

Felix qui potuit feram cognoscere causam.

Virgil.

They say that hope is happiness;
But genuine Love must prize the past,
And memory wakes the thoughts that bless:
They rose the first—they set the last;
And all that memory loves the most
Was once our only hope to be,
And all that hope adored and lost
Hath melted into memory.

Alas! it is delusion all:
The future cheats us from afar,
Nor can we be what we recall,
Nor dare we think on what we are.

THE FIELD OF BANNOCKBURN.

A fearful form from Stirling's tower
Was dimly seen to bend;
He looked as though, 'mid fate's far hour,
Some mighty woe he kenned.
White was his hair, and thin with age,
One hand was raised on high,
The other held the mystick page
Of human destiny.

And oft, ere shone the moon's pale ray,
His eyes were seen to turn
Where, in the gloomy distance, lay
The plain of Bannockburn.

And fair uprose the queen of night,
Shining o'er mount and main;
Ben Lomond owned her silvery light,
Forth sparkled bright again.
Fair, too, o'er royal Scoone she shone,
For there the Bruce had knelt,
And, half forgetful, looked she down
On Falkirk's fatal field.

For ere to-morrow's sun shall set,
Stern Edward's self shall learn
A lesson pride may ne'er forget,
Where murmurs Bannockburn.

A voice is heard from Stirling's tower,
'Tis of that aged seer,
The lover leaves his lady's bower,
Yet chides her timid tear.
The infant wakes 'mid wild alarms,
Prayers are in vain outpoured,
The bridegroom quits his bride's fond charms,
And half unsheathes his sword.
Yet who may fate's dark power withstand,
Or who its mandate spurn?
And still the seer uplifts his hand
And points to Bannockburn.

"There waves a standard o'er the brae,
There gleams a highland sword;
Is not yon form the Stewart, say,
Yon, Scotland's Martial Lord?
Douglas, with Arran's stranger chief,
And Moray's Earl, are there;
Whilst drops of blood, for tears of grief,
The coming strife declare.

Oh, red th' autumnal heath bells blow
Within thy vale, Strathearne:
But redder far, ere long, shall glow
The flowers of Bannockburn!

"Alas! for Edward's warrior pride,
For England's warrior fame;
Alas! that o'er from Thames' fair side

Her gallant lances came!
Lo! where De Bohun smiles in scorn,—
The Bruce, the Bruce is near!
Rash earl, no more thy hunter horn
Shall Malvern's blue hills hear!
Back, Argentine, and thou, De Clare,
To Severn's banks return,
Health smiles in rural beauty there,—
Death lowers o'er Bannockburn!

"Up, up, De Valence, dream no more
Of Mothven's victor fight—
Thy bark is on a stormier shore,
No star is thine to-night.
And thou, De Burgh, of Erin's isle,
Whom Eth O'Connor leads,
Love's tear shall soon usurp his smile
In Ulster's emerald meads.
But oh! what tears will Cambria shed
When she the tale shall learn—
For Forth's full tide shall flow blood red,
Ere long, from Bannockburn!

"But not alone shall Southron vale
Lament that day of woe—
Grief's sigh shall soothe each ruder gale
Where Scotia's waters flow.
From Corra Linn where roars the Clyde,
To Dornoch's ocean bay—
From Tweed, that rolls a neutral tide,
To lonely Colinsay:
But see, the stars wax faint and few,
Death's frown is dark and stern—
But darker soon shall rise to view
Yon field of Bannockburn!"

NOW IS N'T IT A PITY.

A favourite Ballad sung by Madame Feron.

I love a lad, a handsome lad,
And love him, too sincerely;
He played a part that won my heart,
And vowed to love me dearly.
And vowed to love me dearly, &c.

But Aunt's consent she will deny,
Indeed it's very pretty;
And I'm so vexed that I could cry,
Now is n't it a pity?
Now is n't it a pity, &c.

My cruel Aunt will jeer and taunt,
And cry young girls should tarry
Because she yet could never get
A man in mind to marry:
A man in mind to marry, &c.

It's right down spite, you can n't deny,
Indeed it's very pretty;
And you may laugh, but I could cry,
Now is n't it a pity?
Now is n't it a pity, &c.

MASONICK RECORD.

The undersigned, members of the masonick institution, and principally of Aurora Lodge, or King Solomon's Royal Arch Chapter, at Montpelier, Vt., beg the privilege of calling the attention of the publick to the following

APPEAL.

It can not be unknown to you, fellow citizens, that on the 5th of the present month, there assembled in this Village a body of individuals, who collectively denominated themselves an Anti-Masonick State Convention.

The first principles of this government necessarily imply the right, which is expressly sanctioned by its written constitution, of any body of men collecting peaceably together, to redress any grievances within the scope of their immediate authority, or unitedly presenting their solemn declarations of opinion against the practical adoption of any principles or the continuation of any practices, repugnant to all and each of the benefits, privileges and immunities which are invariably secured to the people by the federal compact. It matters not what name such a convocation may be pleased to assume to itself, or even against what interest it may be ostensibly directed, so long as the real purpose is, the procurement of a justifiable remedy for a palpable and sensible wrong.

None of us are disposed to deny this position in the abstract or the concrete, for many of us have been witnesses to the advantages it has secured, the dangers it has averted, and the injuries it has summarily redressed. Whenever the contingency may arrive, that the aid of all or either of us shall be required, by our voices, our property or our persons, for the conservation of any of the rights already identified with republican liberty, or those which the progress of intellect and knowledge may hereafter annex to the list, we have given a record of our names, which will stand as a pledge of preparation to obey the call.

Had we supposed that the leaders of the anti-masonick convention were governed by this principle, and that a society dangerous to our free institutions, obtained among us, without doubt or difficulty, one and all, we would have yielded our hearts to their cause, and our strength for its support. Had we been in doubt upon the matter, and been brought to our present belief by a series of artificial and intangible reasoning, we would have searched longer and farther for the truth, and avoided an obtrusion of our opinions upon your notice, until that which we sought had been gained, and the obscurity which might have clouded our minds was dispelled by the labours of research and the potency of knowledge. But knowing, as we do, fellow citizens, that our association owns no principle and no practice but such as are in perfect conformity with the purest republicanism—that the earliest lesson masonry taught us, was the rigid observation, in spirit and in letter, of our oath of allegiance to our God and our country—that the being a good mason necessarily and inevitably implies the being a good citizen,—that the institution inculcates principles of equality, and charity, and brotherly affection, among men,—and binds its members with deep solemnity, to the practice of those moral virtues, which strengthen the bonds of human society, and as an inevitable consequence, those of the government, without which this society could not, in its force and purity exist,—knowing that the broad and sweeping denunciations, and unqualified allegations of murder, and treason, and corruption against it, by the body of which we speak, are totally unwarranted, and directly reprobated by its principles, so far as any of us know them, and utterly and unequivocally disproved and confuted by so much of its practical operation as our experience or observation has enabled us to witness,—we have thought it a duty which we owed you as well as a respect due to our own characters and reputations, in this publick manner, to manifest our most solemn denial of the charges that have been, with so much assurance made.

The abduction and probable death of Wm. Morgan, which justly excited the alarm and indignation of the community, is conceded, we believe on all sides, to have been the incipient steps towards the progress of the party denominated Anti-Masonick. Why a class or party of individuals should usurp to themselves exclusively the right or privilege of entertaining sentiments of deep horror and solemn indignation at an outrage which concerned every American citizen, or constitute themselves a tribunal, with the cognizance of crimes, which are legitimately to be inquired of, and punished by the judiciary of our country, we confess ourselves unable to determine. That they should go even further, and not merely assume the ermine of the judge, and the sable of the executioner, but by an ex post facto process, identify a large and respectable society of individuals, dispersed over the whole territory of these United States, with the abductors and probable murderers of a single man, greatly shakes our confidence in the sanity of some, and belief in the purity of intention of others. If we entirely disregard the effects thus far, which this assumption has produced, and direct the publick attention to the future, there will, in the view of all judicious men, be discovered sufficient of direful and dreaded evil, to induce the repudiation of a principle, pregnant with destruction to that which it cost much rich blood to secure. As masons no less than as men and christians,—and we have found no reason to convince us of the incompatibility of the characters,—we have disclaimed, and do here again disclaim all knowledge of, or participation in, Morgan's abduction. In all our experience, we have found no masonick principle or obligation that would justify, or palliate it; and in this opinion, we are fortified by the sentiments of every member of the fraternity, within the boundaries of our knowledge. A masonick governour was the first to offer a large reward for the detection of the perpetrators of the nefarious act; and we conscientiously believe that this demonstration of official authority has met the hearty concurrence and co-operation of every true freemason whose exertions could avail the least. We have reason to believe that some calling themselves members of the fraternity, were concerned in the transaction; but that its principles gave them any warrant or colouring for the proceeding, from our best knowledge and belief, we utterly deny. In our society, as in all others, are found vicious and misguided men. When such yield themselves to their propensities, the masonick character is necessarily cast aside, and as we would not sanction the conduct, so we ought not to be visited by its odium.

There is nothing in masonry, so far as we are acquainted with it, that at all answers to the charge which has been so sweepingly made. We have heard the lodge declared to be a refuge for cut-throats and villains; and that under its sanction every sort of iniquity was perpetrated. We should exhaust your patience were we to go through the detail of enormities which have been heaped upon us and our order. Not infrequently have the charge and the invective proceeded from an individual styling himself a seceding mason. If such an one was what he pretended, and if he knew anything of masonry, he knew also, that the accusation was directly at variance with the truth. We know it and declare it to be so. In the outset we deemed it too ridiculously absurd to gain credence with any one, but we have found that by continued and obstinate repetition, and the assumption of every possible shape and form, there have been found, those who, in the absence of denial, were disposed to yield it their belief. Again we declare it to be untrue: as also the allegation, that one mason is bound to aid in the political aggrandizement of another.

We have never known masonry, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the political concerns of the state or nation; and during the whole course of our membership, which to some of us answers for more than thirty years,—we have known no instance, in which it was made a subject of discussion or remark in the lodge. Among us are found men of all religious and political sects and parties which have had a being since our government began. Some of us, it will be seen have been warm advocates of the cause we espoused, while others of us will be found to have been arrayed upon the opposing side, with at least an equal zeal. During all these times, we have met in the lodge room, under the influence of masonry, as friends; and we have met there thus, because we left party partialities and prejudices without the door.

If our institution recognizes any such principles as are now attempted to be fastened upon it, why have any of these professed seceding masons, why has any honest and enlightened man, after receiving one or more degrees, sought to involve himself deeper in this sink of iniquity? We know the answer to this is, that they were stimulated on from finding nothing in the lower degrees worth possessing. Fellow citizens, if there be nothing worth the possession in a pure and upright heart, and a belief in God and the Holy Scriptures,—in faith and charity,—in morality and brotherly love,—in temperance, fortitude, prudence and justice,—in upright conduct before God and man,—in peace, fidelity and equality,—then we are constrained to acknowledge the lower degrees of masonry vain, barren and useless. All these principles and virtues are there inculcated, and the man who can pronounce them worthless, is just such an one as should renounce and denounce masonry. If seceding masons have delivered you an unvarnished tale, why did they so long continue with us, thus blackened with infamy? It was only after the idea had gone abroad that masons were to be deprived of offices of trust and emolument, that they seem to have collected their reason about them sufficiently to be convinced that their pretended shackles hung heavy on their consciences. They contend that the moral blindness in which they were enveloped by their initiatory ceremonies, was moved only on the eve of their secession. As miserable as is the subterfuge, we will answer it by the remark, that for ourselves, we have no consciousness of mental obscurity in this matter, and that if such obscurity is about us, the prospects of political preferment are not yet sufficiently apparent, to shake the scales from our eyes.

If seceders were convinced that masonry is what they represent it to be, why did they not remain in the lodge and devote the labours of a life in exertions to convince and reclaim their brethren, and guide them to the path of duty, instead of dealing out their railing accusations in the streets, and mounting the forum and hurling their anathemas at every head which dared yet to believe the order what it had been regarded from time immemorial, and hazard rebuke and suffering for a season, rather than assume the accommodating and obsequious bearing of the flatterer, or the time-serving blasphemy of the hypocrite.

Masonry, so far as we know, requires not of its members, the performance of any act in contravention of the statutory regulations, or the laws and usages of our country. By becoming a mason, an individual voluntarily imposes upon himself a double obligation, to be, in the literal and legitimate meaning of the term, a true and faithful citizen. This is expressly and in direct terms inculcated in the lodge, and fortified by those moral precepts without which, christianity itself could not exist. We have in no instance been required to bind ourselves to yield a suffrage for a member of the institution in preference to one who is not, or use exertions for the relief, protection or escape of such as had rendered themselves obnoxious to the retributions of the laws. Doctrines like these, in masonry, we have never found. Neither have we discovered aught, which by fair and honest interpretation, could be brought to sanction a solitary principle militating, in the remotest manner, against the purest and strictest christian morality.

Surely, we impose upon ourselves the duty of administering to the necessities of a worthy brother, his widow and orphans. To this we hardly thought the most captious could except. But it seems there is at this day abroad a spirit, whose magical influence can transform the dearest of charity's doing into machinations of the most wicked depravity. We have been charged, on this very account, with being exclusive in our charities. Before we became masons, there existed between us and our fellow men certain well defined relations and obligations. Aside from any thing else, the law of nature imperatively taught us, so far as our means extended, to satisfy the wants and remove the necessities of those who might be smote by the visitation of these afflictions. Can these obligations be in any way shaken off, or evaded? The casuist who should hazard such an assertion, would be at once silenced by the opposing power of every finer feeling which has existence in the human breast. When we took upon ourselves the duties which masonry enjoins, we found among them that of relieving the distresses, administering to the wants, and soothing the sorrows of those, whom the misfortunes of our brethren should leave in destitution. The previous obligation still remained fresh in force. We had no power or right to divest ourselves of it. Nature clothed us with it, and it became incipiently a portion of us, and must exist inseparably from us, until nature shall itself expire. We voluntarily enlarged the sphere of our charitable ministrations, and for so doing, we believed and still believe, an act was performed, which renders us more worthy of the confidence and affections of mankind.

It has been urged against the institution that its rites are blasphemous. There are quite a number amongst us, fellow citizens, who have for many years belonged to the visible church, and been the professed followers of the humble Saviour of men. We have never deemed that masonry would supply the place of our christian system of religion, or be alone sufficient to ensure us an immortality of bliss. We have found it, in many instances, a great help to the inculcation of purely religious duties, and in a multitude of others, we have been enabled by its influence, to impress moral precepts upon the mind, where otherwise the admonition would have utterly failed. In all our observation, we discovered nothing in which sacred things were sported or trifled with, and above all, nothing to which we should suppose the most fastidious could affix the epithet we have recited above. The pretensions of the institution have also undergone a rigid scrutiny. What some of its vain or enthusiastic members may have represented it to be, is a matter for which we are wholly irresponsible. For ourselves we have mainly regarded it—and our opinion is in no wise changed,—as a moral and benevolent institution. One, calculated in many cases, to still the cry of human misery, and convert the bitter tears of affliction into substantive testimonials of gratitude and joy. One calculated to reclaim erring man; by impressing upon his mind moral beauties, in a manner simply eloquent and forcibly effective; and in an eminent degree, to nurture and cherish, and to bring into active exercise those generous and sympathetick feelings of our nature, which freely and fully interchanged, soften the asperities of the human heart, and elevate man a degree nearer to the state of superiour intelligence.

It cannot be expected that in this brief exposition of our principles, we should advert to every charge which the railers against our order have been pleased to make. We bear willingly our united testimony to the purity of its principles, and having thus destroyed the basis upon which the monstrous superstructure they have reared must rest, we feel a ready conviction that you will concur with us in opinion, that the superstructure itself must crumble to the earth.

We have but a few words to add, fellow citizens, and we have done. We have made it a point during our lives to be good members of the republic as well as good masons. We have given and still continue to give of our substance, for the support of our invaluable government, and the effectual execution of its laws. We have yielded, as men, something to sustain kindred societies established for the amelioration of the condition of degraded portions of the human race. We have been taught that all mankind were brethren, and that all, at least in this government, were entitled to an equal and impartial distribution of privileges. If of the latter we are deprived, the honourable badge of the citizen will become polluted by the groveling weeds of the slave. To degrade us to this point, do not the principles of action of the anti-masonic party, directly tend?

When a laudable feeling pervaded the minds of a large and respectable body of individuals in the state of New-York, at the outrage there perpetrated upon the rights of personal inviolability, we feared nothing, because we knew their every effort was tempered with judgment, and prudence and discretion. Now that the face of things has changed; and a spirit of unqualified proscription is pouring its desolating fruits upon us, the same equanimity of feeling and consciousness of security cannot in the nature of things prevail. We have been told, and that too, openly and without circumlocution, that of each and all of us, the church of God must be purged! That we must no more enter the sanctuary and participate in the ceremonial commemoration of the most signal act,—which would suffer debasement by being simply denominated magnanimity,—that hath ever been witnessed since the world began. We have been told that character and conduct of such spotless purity that the malignant slanderer hath never dared to breathe upon it, is to weigh but as a feather, contrasted with continued adhesion to the institution. That in despite of all this, and every other virtue which humanity hath ever known, the halls of legislation, the chair of the executive, and the bench of the judiciary are to undergo a rigid inquisition, and the test of competency rest entirely in the single, simple fact, whether the incumbent is or is not a mason! You may be startled at the annunciation of doctrines like these. Not more so than were we, when they were first promulgated. That they are those of the leaders of the party styled anti-masonic, for confirmation we appeal to any and every one who witnessed the proceedings of the late convention. And for what is this war of extermination waged against us? Plainly and shortly, because we will not stand up in the face of heaven and earth and swear that to be of vicious tendency which we conscientiously believe in perfect harmony with the strictest morality and virtue.

It would seem, fellow citizens, that the times are radically changed. When doctrines like the above are unblushingly given to the world, and with the sanction of those who are professedly "legates of the skies," it can augur nothing less than a revolution in human polity, co-extensive with the existence of republican liberty. It is not simply masons or masonry which it will affect; but each and every one, be he friend or foe to it or them, who will not directly lend his exertions in aid of this impious crusade, will be marked as a subject of interdiction, and his property as the rightful spoil of an unholy civil conquest.

We have witnessed, and you will believe us when we say with no ordinary pain, ministers of the Gospel, forgetful of the retiring humility of their master, harranguing the people with an indiscreet and reprehensible zeal, and calling to their assistance every artifice which their associations could suggest, for the purpose of creating an unnatural and unwarrantable excitement in the public mind. We have seen them herd with men, whose only claim upon their affections or to their confidence, was resolved into the single questionable recommendation, of a peculiar solicitude for the success of projected political schemes. We have found those of a sister state intruding upon the political concerns of this, and using unmeasured pains to excite the storm and direct it to subvert their purposes. We have seen in this sister state political bankrupts of every hue and faction, become regenerated by the utterance of the magical polysyllable anti-masonry and assimilate with apparent coherency, for the guidance of its bark in the tempest to the goal of office. We have seen a portion of the public press teem with misrepresentations, repeated and reiterated to force conviction, and these dispersed like firebrands over the country, to inflame the public feeling. We have seen the most irrelevant circumstances dragged in, invested with a new and different dress, and then charged to the account of masonry. We have seen the institution portrayed by its enemies, not as it is, but as they wished it might be, to answer their ends, and then a series of inferences drawn, with a quantum of low abuse and invective superadded, perfectly in character with the spirit manifested in the previous assumption of the counterfeit premises. For all and more than this, we have but to refer you to the columns of journals which are officially intruded upon your observation.

Fellow citizens, we have done. Some of you have long known and long lived with us on terms of free and familiar intercourse. To such of you we put the question, whether you believe us guilty of the foul enormities which are disposed in such formidable array against us? We here renew the declaration, that in masonry we have never been taught, have never observed or received, any thing, either in principle or practice, contrary to our moral, or civil, or religious duty—our obligations to man, to our country, or our God. You cannot fail to be well assured, that it is not against masonry merely that the weapons of the leaders of anti-masonry are hurled; or the simple abolition of that institution the object nearest their hearts. Although there are found in the anti-masonic ranks many honest and conscientious men, yet you well know, that those who have conspicuously embarked in the enterprise, have risked their all upon the issue of the voyage. Therefore is there every inducement presented for them to marshal their best energies to attain the end, without regarding the means—to secure power if in so doing, they trample the liberties of the people beneath their feet. In our intercourse with you, have you discovered that gross impropriety of conduct which will warrant the unqualified sentence of outlawry? Anything deserving disfranchisement,—the division of our families, the destruction of our social intercourse, the derangement of our business, and the annihilation of all hopes of future comfort or usefulness? If not, bear testimony to the unbroken and unimpaired confidence which we still possess. You have our pledge for the truth of this relation. It has been reluctantly drawn from us, but the call was so clear and so explicit, that a decent respect for your opinions impelled us to the exposition, however unwilling we might have been to present ourselves for the publick attention. We believe there can be no doubt upon the question of masonry or political anti-masonry, and if you will bring your unbiased judgments to the task of scrutinizing this matter, you will assuredly arise from the investigation convinced that we have spoken to you the words of truth and soberness.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

MAKING TEA.

By Dr. Kitchiner.

It has been long observed that the infusion of tea made in silver, or polished metal tea-pots, is stronger than that which is produced in black, or other kinds of earthenware pots. This is explained on the principle that polished surfaces retain heat much better than dark, the calorick being confined in the former case, must act more powerfully than in the latter.

It is further certain, that the silver or metal pot, when filled a second time, produces worse tea than the earthenware vessel; and that it is advisable to use the earthenware pot, unless a silver or metal one can be procured sufficiently large to contain at once all that may be required. These facts are readily explained by considering, that the action of heat retained by the silver vessel so far exhausts the herb as to leave very little soluble substance for a second infusion; whereas the reduced temperature of the water in the earthenware pot, by extracting only a small proportion at first, leaves some soluble matter for the action of a subsequent infusion.

The reason for pouring boiling water into the tea pot before the infusion of the tea is made, is, that the vessel being previously warm, may abstract less heat from the mixture, and thus admit a more powerful action. Neither is it difficult to explain the fact why the infusion of tea is stronger if only a small quantity of boiling water be first used, and, more be added some time afterwards; for if we consider that only the water immediately in contact with the herb can act upon it, and that it cools very rapidly, especially in earthenware vessels, it is clear that the effect will be greater where the heat is kept up by additions of boiling water, than where the vessel is filled at once, and the fluid suffered gradually to cool.

When the infusion has once been completed, it is found that any further addition of the herb only affords a very small increase in the strength, the water having cooled much below the boiling point, and consequently, acting very slightly.

TO MAKE THE LIQUEUR CURACOA.

Put into a large bottle, nearly filled with alcohol, at thirty-four degrees of Baume (or thirty-six) the peels of six fine Portugal oranges, which are smooth skinned, and let them infuse for fifteen days. At the end of this time, put into a large stone or glass vessel, 11 ounces of brandy at eighteen degrees, 4 1-2 ounces of white sugar, and 4 1-2 ounces of river water. When the sugar is dissolved, add a sufficient quantity of the above infusion of orange peels, to give it a predominant flavour; and aromatise with three grammes of fine cinnamon, and as much mace, both well bruised. Lastly, throw into the liqueur 31 grammes (one ounce) of Brazil wood, in powder. Leave the whole in infusion ten days, being stirred three or four times a day. At the end of this time taste the liqueur; and if it be too strong and sweet, add more water to it; if too weak, add alcohol, at 36 degrees; and if it be not sweet enough, put syrup to it. Give it colour with caramel when you would tinge it.

HYDROPHOBIA.

In the New Monthly Magazine for October, 1826, is the following statement of the efficacy of the guaco for the cure of the bite of a mad dog, published by the gentleman who first made use of the plant in South America, as an antidote to that scourge of human nature, hydrophobia; his words are, "I shall simply state, that during my residence in South America, I had frequent opportunities of witnessing the direful effects of hydrophobia, without having in any one case that came under my care been successful in its cure by the usual modes prescribed in Europe. It fortunately occurred to me, that the guaco, so celebrated for curing the bite or sting of all venomous snakes, might prove equally efficacious in hydrophobic cases. How far my idea was correct that an analogy existed between the virus of a serpent and that of a rabid dog. I leave to others to determine; but such was my opinion, and I acted upon it in all subsequent cases with complete success."

MUTTON HAM.

The Journal des Connoissances Usuelles gives the following method of curing legs of mutton like ham:—It is necessary that the mutton should be very fat. Two ounces of raw sugar must be mixed with an ounce of common salt and half a spoonful of saltpetre. The meat is to be rubbed well with this, and then placed in a tureen. It must be beaten and turned twice a day during three consecutive days; and the scum which comes from the meat having been taken off, it is to be wiped, and again rubbed with the mixture. The next day it should be again beaten, and the two operations ought to be repeated alternately during ten days, care being taken to turn the meat each time. It must be then exposed to the smoke for ten days. These hams are generally eaten cold.

NEW PYROMETER.

A new air-thermometer has been invented by M. Pouillet, for the purpose of measuring degrees of heat in very high temperatures; an object hitherto of very difficult attainment. By means of this instrument it has been ascertained, that the heat of melted silver is 1677°; of a melted mixture of one part gold and three parts silver, 1803°; and of melted pure gold 2096°.

TO MAKE KITCHEN VEGETABLES TENDER.

When peas, French beans, &c. do not boil easily, it has usually been imputed to the coolness of the season, or to the rains. This popular notion is erroneous. The difficulty of boiling them soft arises from an excess of gypsum imbibed during their growth. To correct this, throw a small quantity of subcarbonate of soda into the pot along with the vegetables. [From the French.]

TRANSPLANTING SHRUBS IN FULL GROWTH.

Dig a narrow trench round the plant, leaving its roots in the middle in an isolated ball of earth; fill the trench with plaster of Paris, which will become hard in a few minutes, and form a case to the ball and plant, which may be lifted and removed any where at pleasure. [French Paper.]

TO HOUSEWIVES.

The N. Y. American, which is exemplary in matters of taste, says—"The way to boil rice is not to boil it at all. Put it in a pot and cover it with water, place it near the fire, or over coals on the hearth, were it will get gradually hot, but not at any time faster than to simmer. It will thus be cooked so that every grain will be distinct and separate, and have that crawling appearance so much boasted of by the Carolinians."

A Virginia paper gives this recipe to make corn soup: cut the corn from the cob, and boil it in water until it is sufficiently done: then pour in new milk, with salt, pepper, and one or two eggs; continue the boiling, and stir in flour in order to thicken it a little. This soup is superiour to the best turtle soup ever made.

If so, our Farmers may live like Aldermen.

THE NATURALIST.

ICE MOUNTAIN.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer gives the annexed account of a singular natural curiosity existing in Virginia.

The curiosity, which it is my purpose to introduce to your notice, is appropriately called the Ice Mountain. It stands in the county of Hampshire, not far distant from the road leading from Winchester to Romney, and near a small stream called the North River. It is not of a very great altitude, nor are its sides very steep and precipitous. About half a mile, or perhaps more, of that side fronting the West, is formed entirely of stone from its base to very near its summit. These stones, varying in weight from one to ten or twenty pounds lie loosely together, and may be easily removed with the hand—no earth of any consequence being found among them, of course no trees can grow there, and the only shrubs to be found are a few wild currant bushes.

The side of the above mentioned mountain is fully exposed to the rays of the sun, from 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning until sun set, without any intervening mountain or grove to protect it. In this mountain may be found, at all seasons of the year, in Summer as well as in Winter, an abundance of ice. It is procured without the least difficulty; it is only necessary for the stones lying on the top to be removed, and underneath, the ice will be found lying among and adhering to other stones, in pieces of different sizes, all as hard and as firm as in the Winter season. It was on the 4th of July last, that I visited this mountain; and, it will be recollected that prior to that time, there had been some very warm and oppressive weather; nevertheless with the assistance of a gentleman who accompanied me, I procured plenty of ice, and I am very confident, that in the space of ten minutes we would have found more than we could have conveniently carried. So easily is it procured, and so abundantly is it found, that persons living in the neighbourhood are in the daily habit, during the Summer months, of procuring it for the use of their families. The ice I saw was found near the foot of the mountain; but I was informed, and have no doubt but that it might be procured a considerable distance up the mountain; but the difficulty of ascending over the loose rocks, and, indeed the danger of those above tumbling down in the removal of those below, prevented my ascertaining the fact. Out of this mountain, and through these stones there issues a strong current of extremely cold air. It is not like the common breeze that blows over our fields, abating at intervals, but is continual and unrelenting, and is as cold as the wind in the middle of December. From my recollection of the Blowing Cave, mentioned by Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes of Virginia, I am pretty confident that the current of air which issues from the mountain is much stronger than that from the Cave, and greatly colder. It may be furthermore mentioned as descriptive of this singular mountain, that a gentleman who lives near, and whose plantation lies adjacent to the mountain, has built among the stones a small house, for the purpose of keeping fresh meats, butter, milk, &c. I saw when there icicles hanging from the bottom logs of this house as firm and as hard as are found here in the depth of Winter, and was told, that it was not uncommon to find the flies and insects, attracted by the meats, &c. lying numbed and motionless upon the stones.

As may be supposed, a person on approaching the mountain experiences a manifest change in the atmosphere; and I have no doubt, that, in the warmest and most sultry day, a person, by remaining on it for a few hours, would feel a coolness almost disagreeable.

THE GATHERER.

DEAN SWIFT.

His character seems to have been radically overbearing and tyrannical;—for though, like other tyrants, he could stoop low enough where his interests required it, it was his delight to exact an implicit compliance with his humours and fancies, and to impose upon all around him the task of observing and accommodating themselves to his habits, without the slightest regard to their convenience and comfort. Wherever he came, the ordinary forms of society were to give way to his pleasure; and every thing, even to the domestic arrangements of a family, to be suspended for his caprice. If he was to be introduced to a person of rank, he insisted the first advances and the first visit should be made to him. If he went to see a friend in the country, he would order an old tree to be cut down if it obstructed the view from his window—and was never at his ease unless he was allowed to give nicknames to the lady of the house, and make lampoons upon her acquaintance. On going for the first time into any family, he frequently prescribed before hand the hours for their meals, sleep, and exercise; and insisted rigorously upon the literal fulfilment of the capitulation. From his intimates he uniformly exacted the most implicit submission to all his whims and absurdities; and carried his prerogative so far, that he sometimes used to chase the Grattans, and other accommodating friends, through the apartments of the Deanery, and up and down stairs, driving them like horses, with a large whip, till he thought he had enough of exercise. All his jests have the same character of insolence and coarseness. When he first came to his curate's house, he announced himself as "his master;"—took possession of the fireside, and ordered his wife to take charge of his shirts and stockings. When a young clergyman was introduced to him, he offered him the dregs of a bottle of wine, and said, he always kept a poor parson about him to drink up his dregs.

JEMIMA WILKINSON.

This petticoated mis-leader of a band of lunatics from Rhode Island purchased a large and beautiful farm near Seneca Lake, N. Y. which is now in possession of one of her disciples called Aunt Esther; it is not far from Penn-Yan, (or Pennsylvania and Yankee town.) Aunt Esther holds fast to the glebe, and will not sell a rod; her companions are twenty fawn coloured cats. A late traveller relates one of Jemima's miracles, which is quite as convincing as those of the prince bishop Hohenloe. She announced her intention of walking across Seneca Lake, and alighting from her carriage, walked to the water on the white handkerchiefs strewn in the road by her followers; she stepped ankle deep into the water, and then turning to the multitude, inquired whether they had faith that she could pass over, for if not, she could not; on receiving an affirmative answer, she returned to her carriage, declaring that as they believed in her power, it was unnecessary to display it. Jemima died some years since, and Aunt Esther is probably the only disciple remaining; it is conjectured that she values Jemima's earthly legacy, the farm, more than her prophetick teaching.

RIVER MELODIES.

Between Pittsburgh and Shawneetown, whilst "gliding merrily down the Ohio," in a keel-boat, "navigated by eight or ten of those half-horse and half-alligator gentry commonly called Ohio boatmen," Judge Hall was lulled to sweet sleep, as the rowers were "tugging at the oar," timing their strokes to the cadence:—

"Some rows up, but we rows down,
All the way to Shawnee town:
Pull away—pull away."

LONG SNOW.

In 1614, there was one of the heaviest and longest snows which has ever been remembered in the north of England. The Parochial Register, of Wotton Gilbert, states that it began on the 5th of January, and continued to snow more or less every day, (the heaviest fall being on the 22nd of February,) till the 12th of March,—to the great loss of cattle, and of human life as well.

NAPOLEON.

Napoleon never shrunk from allusions to his origin; and an adroit reference to his early life was one of the surest modes of conciliating him. At the famous interviews at Erfurt, when dining with the Emperor of Russia and an elite of kings, he began a sentence with, "When I was an engineer in the regiment of la Pere," M. de Bausset, who stood facing the royal diners, within a few feet, tells us, that these words produced a lively emotion among the crowned heads; a shudder, we suppose, ran from one end of the line to the other, to think of the lump of illegitimacy they were cringing to.

The butchers of Geneva, have a singular mode of preventing flies from attacking the meat in their shops. They rub the walls and boards, upon which the meat is placed, with the essential oil of laurel, the smell of which keeps away this troublesome insect.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Menageries.

ENCOUNTER WITH A LEOPARD.

"We have been favoured, by a gentleman who was formerly in the civil service at Ceylon, with the following description of an encounter with a leopard or panther, which in India are popularly called tigers:—

"I was at Jaffna, at the northern extremity of the Island of Ceylon, in the beginning of the year 1819; when, one morning, my servant called me an hour or two before my usual time, with 'Master, master! people send for master's dogs—tiger in the town!' Now, my dogs chanced to be some very degenerate specimens of a fine species, called the Poligar dog, which I should designate as a sort of wiry-haired grey-hound, without scent. I kept them to hunt jackals; but tigers are very different things: by the way, there are no real tigers in Ceylon; but leopards and panthers are always called so, and by ourselves as well as by the natives. This turned out to be a panther. My gun chanced not to be put together; and while my servant was doing it, the collector, and two medical men, who had recently arrived, in consequence of the cholera morbus having just then reached Ceylon, from the continent, came to my door, the former armed with a fowling-piece, and the two latter with remarkably blunt hog-spears. They insisted upon setting off without waiting for my gun, a proceeding not much to my taste. The tiger (I must continue to call him so) had taken refuge in a hut, the roof of which, as those of Ceylon huts in general, spread to the ground like an umbrella; the only aperture into it was a small door, about four feet high. This collector wanted to get the tiger out at once. I begged to wait for my gun; but no—the fowling-piece (loaded with ball, of course,) and the two hog-spears were quite enough. I got a hedge-stake, and awaited my fate, from very shame. At this moment, to my great delight, there arrived from the fort an English officer, two artillery-men, and a Malay captain; and a pretty figure we should have cut without them, as the event will show. I was now quite ready to attack, and my gun came a minute afterwards. The whole scene which follows took place with an enclosure, about twenty feet square, formed, on three sides, by a strong fence of palmyra leaves, and on the fourth by the hut. At the door of this the two artillery-men planted themselves; and the Malay captain got at the top, to frighten the tiger out, by worrying it—an easy operation, as the huts there are covered with cocoa-nut leaves. One of the artillery-men wanted to go in to the tiger, but we would not suffer it. At last the beast sprang; this man received him on his bayonet, which he thrust apparently down his throat, using his piece at the same moment. The bayonet broke off short, leaving less than three inches on the musket; the rest remained in the animal, but was invisible to us: the shot probably went through his cheek, for it certainly did not seriously injure him, as he instantly rose upon his legs, with a loud roar, and placed his paws upon the soldier's breast. At this moment, the animal appeared to me about to reach the centre of the man's face; but I had scarcely time to observe this, when the tiger, stooping his head, seized the soldier's arm in his mouth, turned him half round staggering, threw him over on his back, and fell upon him. Our dread now was, that if we fired upon the tiger, we might kill the man: for a moment there was a pause, when his comrade attacked the beast exactly in the same manner as the gallant fellow himself had done. He struck his bayonet into his head; the tiger rose at him—he fired; and this time the ball took effect, and in the head. The animal staggered backwards, and we all poured in our fire. He still kicked and writhed; when the gentlemen with the hog-spears advanced, and fixed him, while some natives finished him, by beating him on the head with hedge-stakes. The brave artillery-man was, after all, but slightly hurt: he claimed the skin, which was very cheerfully given to him. There was, however, a cry among the natives that the head should be cut off: it was; and, in so doing, the knife came directly across the bayonet. The animal measured scarcely less than four feet from the root of the tail to the muzzle. There was no tradition of a tiger having been in Jaffna before, indeed, this one must have either come a distance of almost twenty miles, or have swam across an arm of the sea nearly two in breadth; for Jaffna stands on a peninsula on which there is no jungle of any magnitude."

A DREAM.

The following account of a rather singular dream is given by Sir Walter Scott in his notes to the new edition of the Antiquary, as the original of the legend of Mrs. Grizel Oldbuck.

Mr. R—d of Rowland, a gentleman of landed property in the vale of Gala, was prosecuted for a very considerable sum, the accumulated arrears of teind (or tithe) for which he was said to be indebted to a noble family, the titulars (lay impropriators of the tithes.) Mr. R—d was strongly impressed with the belief that his father had, by a form of process peculiar to the law of Scotland, purchased these lands from the titular, and therefore that the present prosecution was groundless. But after an industrious search among his father's papers, an investigation of the public records, and a careful inquiry among all persons who had transacted law business for his father, no evidence could be recovered to support his defence. The period was now near at hand when he conceived the loss of his lawsuit to be inevitable, and he had formed his determination to ride to Edinburgh next day, and make the best bargain he could in the way of compromise. He went to bed with this resolution, and with all the circumstances of the case floating upon his mind, had a dream to the following purpose. His father, who had been many years dead, appeared to him, he thought, and asked him why he was disturbed in his mind. In dreams men are not surprised at such apparitions. Mr. R—d thought that he had informed his father of the cause of his distress, adding that the payment of a considerable sum of money was the more unpleasant to him, because he had a strong consciousness that it was not due, though he was unable to recover any evidence in support of his belief. "You are right, my son," replied the paternal shade, "I did acquire right to these teinds, for payment of which you are now prosecuted. The papers relating to the transaction are in the hands of Mr. —, a writer (or attorney,) who is now retired from professional business, and resides at Inveresk, near Edinburgh. He was a person whom I employed on that occasion for a particular reason, but who never on any other occasion transacted business on my account. It is very possible," pursued the vision, "that Mr. — may have forgotten a matter which is now of a very old date; but you may call it to his recollection by this token, that when I came to pay his account, there was difficulty in getting change for a Portugal piece of gold, and that we were forced to drink out the balance at a tavern." Mr. R—d awoke in the morning with all the words of the vision imprinted on his mind, and thought it worth while to ride across the country to Inveresk, instead of going straight to Edinburgh. When he came there, he waited on the gentleman mentioned in the dream, a very old man; without saying any thing of the vision, he enquired whether he remembered having conducted such a matter for his deceased father. The old gentleman could not at first bring the circumstance to his recollection, but on mention of the Portugal piece of gold, the whole returned upon his memory; he made an immediate search for the papers, and recovered them; so that Mr. R—d carried to Edinburgh the documents necessary to gain the cause which he was on the verge of losing. The author has often heard this story told by persons who had the best access to know the facts, who were not likely to be deceived, and were certainly incapable of deception. He cannot therefore refuse to give it credit, however extraordinary the circumstances may appear. The circumstantial character of the information given in the dream, takes it out of the general class of impressions of the kind which are occasioned by the fortuitous coincidence of actual events with our sleeping thoughts. On the other hand, few would suppose that the laws of nature were suspended, and a special communication from the dead to the living permitted, for the purpose of saving Mr. R—d a certain number of hundred pounds. The author's theory is, that the dream was only the recapitulation of information which Mr. R—d had really received from his father while in life, but which at first he merely recalled as a general impression that the claim was settled. It is not uncommon for persons to recover, during sleep, the thread of ideas which they have lost during their waking hours. It may be added, that this remarkable circumstance was attended with bad consequence to Mr. R—d, whose health and spirits were afterwards impaired by the attention which he thought himself obliged to pay to the visions of the night.

MISCELLANY.

DYING LACONICKS.

The late John Philpot Curran, in one of his splendid orations, said, "the hour of dissolution is a period of more than ordinary illumination." Many have at that moment spoken with a prophetic air, to which the local associations added an imposing solemnity. The instances, too, of death-bed repentance, or recantation, are innumerable; and on that account the disciples of Voltaire deny the truth of Curran's assertion. They deny that Voltaire, when expired, wished to return into the bosom of the church, and contend that, even if he had, his conduct might be fairly attributed to a cause very different from that described by Mr. Curran. Leaving the partisans of each to argue that point, we shall pass on to another frequent attendant upon "the parting hour"—we mean stoicism, or rather an extraordinary mode in which it is manifested: confining ourselves to cases where the actors had not been debilitated either in mind or body by previous indisposition; and who, consequently, and indisputably, died in the full possession of their faculties.

The origin of the ostentatious, and somewhat pompous, declarations and expressions of expiring martyrs and heroes is quite obvious. But it would puzzle a Locke to analyze that irrepressible levity displayed by persons in momentary expectation of death, and culprits at the place of execution—that levity and self-possession, apparently so unbecoming, so incompatible with their dreadful situation, and which belong not exclusively to either sex, neither to the strong nor the weak, to the Christian nor the infidel.

"Extremes meet," and every one has, at one time or other, experienced the difficulty of refraining from loud laughter at the merest trifle, on the most solemn, nay, melancholy occasions. This is nervous excitement—but jests, bon-mots, witticism, even practical jokes, require a disengaged mind, an arrangement of the intellect. When a man has uttered a good thing, or composed a pointed epigram, he is said to have been "very happy;" but how can that expression apply to the last words of a wretched culprit, about to step into the grave? They may be called paradoxical phenomena, of which we shall subjoin a few striking instances, and which we consider not unworthy the contemplation of the philosopher.

Anne Boleyn, on the scaffold, it is well known, grasped her small, but lovely neck, and, with a smile, remarked it would not give the executioner much trouble to divide it.

The late Duke of Orleans, surnamed Egalité, having been condemned to death by his associates, was guillotined at the same time with a great number of minor culprits. His grace is said to have died with some courage; he, however, had no ambition for precedence; and, on the scaffold, pushed forward one of his unfortunate fellow-sufferers—a hair-dresser. The latter turned round, and perceiving who the distinguished individual was who thus acted the usher, with a low bow, and a polite air, made way for the duke, saying, "Après vous, Monseigneur!"

When the infamous Danton was about to make his exit on the same bloody stage, he also had many companions in misfortune, one of whom approached Danton to salute (kiss) him, which was customary with those in their unhappy situation. Danton declined the embrace as unnecessary, "for you know," said he, "our heads will meet in the sack!"

An English clergyman, the Reverend Mr. Jackson, was found guilty of high treason in Dublin, about the year 1794. The day after his conviction he was brought up to receive sentence. He had previously been advised that forfeiture and attainder could not attach unless the sentence was formally pronounced. On being placed at the bar, his leading counsel, the late Mr. Mac Nally, proceeded to argue an arrest of judgment; having nearly concluded, Jackson earnestly entreated him to continue, and to speake against time; "for," added he, with a ghastly smile, "we have deceived the senate!" He was, at that moment, in the agonies of death, having swallowed poison previous to his leaving the gaol, and in a few minutes after expired in the dock, before the dreadful sentence of the law could be pronounced.

In September, 1798, the unfortunate Theobald Wolfe Tone was taken prisoner by Sir J. B. Warren, in the Hogue, which formed part of a French expedition for the invasion of Ireland. He had been a barrister of eminence of Dublin, but held then the rank of general of division in the French service. He was sent to Dublin, where he was tried by court martial, and sentenced to death. He requested to be shot by a file of grenadiers, "in order that his (French) uniform should not be dishonoured." This was refused; and in consequence he determined to die by his own hand: he stabbed himself in the throat with a pen-knife. A surgeon was immediately sent for, who examined the wound. "Is it mortal?" asked Tone. "I think not," replied the surgeon. "I am sorry for it," rejoined Tone; "for I find I am a bad anatomist!" He died of the wound, however, in the course of the day.

In the month of May, 1798, the Irish rebels had taken prisoner the late general the Earl of Ludlow, near Tara, in the county of Meath. His lordship was then an old man; surrounded by an armed, but unrestrained, and unorganized body of men, who threatened every instant to put him to death, he preserved the greatest composure. Amongst other crimes, the rebels reproached him with being an aristocrat, in the words—"Oh, you old tyrant! you do not like liberty!" "I beg your pardon, boys," said his lordship; "there is not one amongst you wishes for liberty more than I do." The rebels understood him, cheered, and suffered him to depart.

To similar preference of mind, it is well known, the Abbe (afterwards Cardinal) Maury owed his life. The sans culottes were dragging him to execution, with cries of "a la lanterne! a la lanterne!" "Well," said the Abbe, "and when I am there, do you think you will see the better for it?"

A few years since, a young Irishman, named George Mansfield, was hanged for robbery. From the moment of his sentence, until that of his death, he displayed the most sincere repentance, unfeigned piety, and resignation; he exhibited, however, at the same time, the most extraordinary playfulness and levity. From a number of instances we select the following:—On the Wednesday previous to his execution, the turnkey gave him a glass of spirits; the weather being intensely cold. He drank it; returned the glass, with thanks, adding, "that was a good glass of gin. I'll take three of them on Saturday, (the day appointed for his execution,) as I have a long journey to go!"

When the good and great Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor of England, laid his head upon the block, he gently turned his flowing beard aside, calmly observing to the sheriff, "This, sir, at all events, has not been guilty of treason."

We have collected together and publish the following articles relative to Capt. Hall and his book, merely to amuse our readers. They furnish some pleasant anecdotes of this acute and excessively well-bred gentleman.

From the New-England Palladium.

CAPT. BASIL HALL.

The scientific reputation of Capt. Hall and his letters of introduction gave him an easy access to the hospitality and the services of the people of the United States. Every one was eager to facilitate his enquiries and designs, for the reason that he had come among us with the avowed intention to acquaint himself with our institutions and resources. His inquisitiveness, though oftentimes trifling and troublesome, was tolerated and gratified, with a patient civility, characteristic with no people so much as of the Americans. Those gentlemen were peculiarly unfortunate, whose lot it was to act the cicerone for this inquiring, peeping, and noting traveller. There is not one of them who will not say that the Capt. was a decided bore. Capt. Hall has now laid before the publick the result of his observations on the United States, in some hundreds of octavo pages; and one of the prominent topics of the work is found to be the vulgar and impertinent civility of Americans. The gallant Captain represents the obliging courtesy which he every where experienced, as impertinent officiousness. It is not our object to retort upon Capt. Hall his churlish taunts—as to his opinions, whether favourable or unfavourable to us, we are totally indifferent, for of the former we should have no reason to be proud, and from the latter we have nothing to apprehend. But we wish to suggest to our countrymen, the policy of discriminating, with more severity than they are accustomed to do, between the characters of the many foreigners who are pressed upon their notice, as men of distinction. We would not wish them to be less civil than they are to strangers, but to bestow their civilities only upon those who have sense and candour for their proper appreciation. Capt. Hall found one individual in the United States who read him, at a glance, and treated his annoying curiosity in the manner which it merited, and which, it seems, Capt. Hall himself indirectly commends. As the anecdote has never been published, we will give it, at the same time expressing the hope, that it will find a place, with suitable comments, in the American edition of Capt. Hall's Travels.

"What stones are these?" said Capt. Hall to a Pavier, who was very busy in laying curb stones on one of the side-walks, leading to the Capitol, at Washington. The Pavier looked up at the inquirer, and deriving an unfavourable impression, as to his character, from the first glance at his features, deliberately determined to quiz him, instead of making a civil and satisfactory reply. What stones are these? repeated Capt. Hall, impatiently. They are such stones, returned the Pavier, as we use for curb stones. Where do you get the stones, said the Capt. At Capt. Folsom's, was the reply. Who is Capt. Folsom? Capt. Folsom is the contractor for furnishing stone. Where, said the Capt. in utter despair, does Capt. Folsom get the stones? Here the fellow, with a sly look of triumph, gravely replied, "that's Capt. Folsom's look out, not mine."

While we are upon this subject, we will relate another anecdote of Capt. Basil Hall which will shew the estimate which the very respectable representative of Great Britain, in the U. States, Mr. Vaughan, puts upon Capt. Hall. At the Columbian Institute Dinner, Capt. Hall sat near the President, Mr. Adams, Mr. Vaughan, and Col. Knapp. Capt. Hall stated, in the course of conversation, that he had learned, from good authority, that there were 1,200,000 paupers in the United States. Mr. Adams expressed his disbelief of the statement, and Capt. Hall repeated that he had learned the fact upon best authority on which he implicitly relied. Mr. Adams appealed to Col. Knapp for his views on the subject, as he had been on a Committee of the Massachusetts Legislature appointed to investigate the subject of pauperism. Col. Knapp, after giving his views, asked Capt. Hall what he understood by paupers. The Capt. replied that he understood by the term, those members of the community who were unable to pay their debts. Then replied Col. Knapp, the King and Royal family of England have been paupers for a century. Mr. Vaughan pinched his countryman, and, in a whisper, begged him not to make a fool of himself by hazarding another remark.

BASIL HALL'S TRAVELS.

It is conjectured that the English nation sent this titled fool to write his travels in this country, that they might be gulled by one having authority, and from the specimens of his book which have fallen under our notice we presume he has distorted fact and dispensed philosophical opinions in a manner perfectly suited to their wishes.

From a running review in the New-York Commercial Advertiser, we extract the following paragraph, for the especial consolation of those ladies who lament their want of influence in society; they must be particularly gratified by the co-operation of this redoubtable romancer who compliments them with a hit at their want of curiosity, which is, by the way, as gross a libel as any in the book.

At Brighton were many objects of curiosity and attention; cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, and men, in great abundance. But he was astonished to find no women there. Four thousand men, and but nine women. This was worse than the cattle show at Stockbridge, where there were more females, but they were all kept on one side of the church. Capt. H. strayed about—no girls romping on the grassy knolls with the boys—no cheerful faces of any sort. No laughing or singing, or halloing. But every body toiled for pleasure, and looked as sober as so many owls about it. At last Capt. Hall heard a fiddle! He started at the sound, and hurried to the place whence it came, when lo! four men were dancing a reel! This was horrible; but when the Captain inquired why the women were not there to enliven the scene, and join in the merry making, he was only laughed at. This subject gives the Captain a text for twenty pages of comment. After a long and patient examination, he came to a deliberate opinion "that the women of the United States do not enjoy that station in society which has been allotted to them elsewhere."

The following extract is from a long article in the New-England Galaxy.

Capt. Hall thinks that we Americans have a great deal of national vanity and boastfulness, and are too much exasperated the opinion about which the British in general and Capt. Hall in particular, may form concerning us. The difference, in this respect, between us and the English, is this; they take it for granted, as a settled point to begin with—a matter conclusively discussed and laid upon the shelf, as Capt. Hall says in another case—that nothing nationally characteristic, in the whole world, is ever to be named or thought of, in comparison with what is British, or rather English—for the Scotch, though they have Scotch national spirit, have, very many of them at least, purely English national pride, as if they, by blending with England, had gained what we, by breaking off, had lost; whereas we think every thing American first rate; but doubting whether others are wholly of this opinion, and being very thoroughly convinced, every man, woman and child of us, they ought to be, are a little officious and sturdy in bringing them to agree with us. These distinct national characteristics, like many others, give rise to not a little ill manners, and make John Bull and Brother Jonathan, somewhat annoying to each other, as well as to third parties. These are rough points which a man of liberal philosophical mind glides by as easily as he can, but with which one of circumscribed sentiments and views is always chafing others or himself.

THE VIRGINIA GAME COCK.

It was in the year 18—, that I was bound for the Havana, in the brig Evening Star, when we had lost sight of the capes, that a large eagle lit upon our yard arm. The sailors seeing him let him remain until after dark, when one of the men, taking a large bag with him, went out upon the yard and succeeded in flinging it over him, so as to prevent his biting, and tying the bag at one end secured him until the following morning, when he was taken from the bag, and his wings clipped, and trimmed in such a manner, as to prevent his escape. He was always fed well by the men in the fore-castle, and at last became quite domesticated, and was a great favourite of the captain. He played a great many tricks to the great annoyance of the pigs on board, for any thing in the pigs' mess he would have if he took a liking to it; he was the terror of his bristly companions to such a degree, that if a pig showed his snout on the quarter deck, he was sure to "go the whole hog" on him—this very much pleased the captain, for when pigs are let loose on board ship, they are very troublesome.

The day after we arrived at Havana, the captain, with several more Americans, visited a cock-pit, to have some sport. The captain bet several times, but invariably lost, at length he offered to bet five hundred dollars, that he had a Virginia game cock on board that would kill any cock on the Island. Of course he was soon taken up, and the day pitched for the fight, which was to be three days after. Accordingly, on leaving the pit, he let his companions into the secret, and proposed to them, to go snacks, and throw in, to make up the bet. The captain also went around to the American captains in the port, and told them of the hoax, advising them to bet on the Virginia game cock, if they wanted to win a stake or two. The captain then returned on board, and had the eagle trimmed as cocks generally are for fight; all his feathers about the neck, which are called the cow-feathers on a chicken, in consequence of their letting them fall when they are beaten, or as it is termed, cowed. He then had a little more trimmed off his wings, and in fine, disfigured him in such a manner that very few could have told it was an eagle. He was then cooped and put upon short allowance, so as to whet his appetite for the coming battle.

The news spread all over the Havana, and many flocked to see the fight between the Virginia and Spanish cocks, and bets were made to a considerable amount. When the day of battle came, the eagle was conveyed to the scene of action in the same bag in which he was caught. The time of pitting the cocks arrived, and two men stepped out, who were selected to pit the cocks, for neither party were permitted to pit their own chicken; the man on the opposite side produced one of the large Spanish breed, and fixed the heels on him. The man who was to pit the captain's cock, was about preparing a large pair of heels, when the captain told him not to trouble himself, for he fought his cock without gaffs. The captain's bird was taken from the sack, and was received with surprise by the beholders, but the Spaniard said his cock would gaff him the first fly. The Spanish cock made a fly at the eagle and picked him with his heels pretty smartly, which raised his ferocity, which was very high before for want of food—he cast a look of disdain on his adversary, and the next fly the game Spaniard made at him, he seized him with his talons, by the breast and wing, and in an instant tore him to pieces. The fame of the Virginia game cock was raised so high, that the captain, before he left the place, sold him for an amount of money equal to the bet.

FRENCH TRICK ON A JEWELLER.

We take the following anecdote from an article in the last No. of the Western Monthly Review, on Manners and Dress in France.

The following is a translation of the narrative. M. E——, a physician, well known for his skill in mental disorders, saw arrive at his gate, one morning, a lady who seemed forty years, although still young and fresh. Madame the Countess de—— was admitted within the gate of the celebrated physician. The Countess introduced herself on the spot, and spoke, as a mother in desolation and despair, in the following terms: "Sir, you see a woman, a prey to the most violent chagrin. I have a son; he is very dear to me, as well as to my husband; he is our only son. * * * Tears, like rain, fell, such as Artemisia shed over the tomb of Mausoleus. "Ah, yes! Y—es, alas, sir! and for some time we have suffered the most horrible fears. He is now at that age when the passions develop. * * * Although we gratify all his wishes, money, liberty, &c. he evidences many signs of complete demerit. The most remarkable is, that he is always talking about jewelry, or of diamonds, which he has sold, or given to some woman, all unintelligible. We suspect that he has become amorous of a woman, no better, perhaps, than she should be, and that he has involved himself in burthensome engagements, to satisfy his desires. This, sir, is but a conjecture. The father and I are lost in sounding the causes of this folly.

Well, Madam, bring your son here. * * Ah, to-morrow, sir! by all means, at noon. That will do. The doctor respectfully conducted the lady to her carriage, not forgetting to scan the coat of arms and the lacqueys.

The next morning the pretended Countess drove to a famous jeweller, and after having a long time cheapened a set of thirty thousand crowns, she finally purchased it. She took it, and negligently drew a purse from her reticule, found there ten thousand francs, in bank notes, and spread them out; but immediately gathering them up, she said to the jeweller, you had better send a person with me. My husband will pay him. I find I have not the entire sum.

The jeweller made a sign to a young man, who, proudly delighted to go in such an equipage, started off with the Countess M. M. She drove to the doctor's door. She whispered the doctor, this is my son, I leave him with you. To the young man she said, my husband is in his study. Walk in. He will pay you. The young man went in. The Countess and the carriage went off at first slow and noiseless; soon after the horses galloped.

Ah, well, young man, said the physician, you understand the business, I suppose. Let us see. How do you feel? what is going on in this young head? What passes in my head, sir! nothing, except settling for the set of diamonds. We understand all that, said the doctor, gently pushing aside the bill. I know, I know. If the gentleman knows the amount, no more remains but to pay the cash. Indeed! Indeed! Be calm. Where did you get your diamonds? What has become of them? Say as much as you will; I will listen patiently. The business is to pay me, sir, ninety thousand francs. Wherefore! How! Wherefore! said the young man, whose eyes began to glisten. Yes, why should I pay you? Because, madam, the Countess, has just purchased the diamonds at our house. Good! there we have you. Who is the Countess? Your wife—and he presented the bill. But, young man, do you know I have the honour to be a physician, and a widower! Here the young man became transported; and the doctor called his domesticks, and bade them seize him by his hands and feet, which raised the transport of the young man to fury. He cried theft! murder! a wilful murder! But at the end of a quarter of an hour he calmed down, explained every thing soberly, and a terrible light began to dawn upon the doctor.

Notwithstanding all the search that could be made, this singular theft, so witty, so original from the scene which took place between the physician and the young man, was never punished. The intrigante had taken good care to conceal every trace of herself. The driver and lacqueys were her accomplices. The carriage was hired; and this history remains a monument in the memoirs of jewellers.

SOLIMAN "THE GREAT."

Here is a specimen of the magnificence with which this historical butcher treated his fellow-creatures:—

Among the many distinctions of Soliman's reign must be noticed the increased diplomatic intercourse with European nations. Three years after the capture of Rhodes, appeared the first French ambassadeur at the Ottoman Porte; he received a robe of honour, a present of two hundred ducats, and, what was more to his purpose, a promise of a campaign in Hungary, which should engage on that side the arms of Charles and his brother, Ferdinand. Soliman kept his promise. At the head of 100,000 men and 300 pieces of artillery, he commenced this memorable campaign. On the fatal field of Mohacks the fate of Hungary was decided in an unequal fight. King Lewis, as he fled from the Turkish sabres, was drowned in a morass. The next day the sultan received in state the compliments of his officers. The heads of 2,000 of the slain, including those of seven bishops and many of the nobility, were piled up as a trophy before his tent. Seven days after the battle, a tumultuous cry arose in the camp to massacre the prisoners and peasants—and in consequence 4,000 men were put to the sword. The keys of Buda were sent to the conqueror, who celebrated the Feast of Bairam in the castle of the Hungarian kings. Fourteen days afterwards he began to retire—bloodshed and devastation marking the course of his army. To Moroth, belonging to the Bishop of Gran, many thousands of the people had retired with their property, relying on the strength of the castle; the Turkish artillery, however, soon levelled it, and the wretched fugitives were indiscriminately butchered. No less than 25,000 fell here; and the whole number of the Hungarians destroyed in the barbarous warfare of this single campaign amounted to at least 200,000 souls.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1829.

§ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

§ Our Title Page and Index, for the 2d volume of the Record, is published to-day.

The Buffalo papers give an account of a gross violation of the laws, in an attempt to impose upon the Court of Sessions in that place, two illegally drawn juries, with the design (we are forced, by the proofs adduced, to believe), to procure indictments and convictions not warranted by evidences of guilt. The circumstances, as stated, are these: The deputy clerk of Erie county, whose duty it was to post the notices required by law, of the time and place of drawing the juries, either wilfully or otherwise, neglected his duty, until several days after the lawful time had elapsed; he then posted a notice for drawing a petit jury, and ante-dated it for the purpose of deceiving the people and concealing his official neglect. Three or four days after this he posted a notice of the drawing of a grand jury, which he also ante-dated, with the same fraudulent intentions. The law says that ten days notice shall be given. The petit jury was drawn after three days notice; and the notice for drawing the grand jury was posted in the night previous to or on the morning of, the day appointed for such drawing. The ante-dating deputy was quite unfortunate, too, in his choice of dates; the first was not old enough by a day, and the second belonged to a Sunday which happened ten days before! The consequence of all this management and double dealing was, the court declared that the juries were illegally drawn, and adjourned without doing any business.

This deputy clerk is a Mr. Harvey Newcomb, an anti-masonick adventurer, who was imported into Erie from Chautauque county, because among all the good people of the former county there was not one capable of filling the important station of deputy clerk! He is also an anti-masonick editor, and ever and anon belches forth something about the dangerous tendency of freemasonry, the necessity of keeping masons out of office, and so forth. We think he has now pretty well illustrated the purifying influence of anti-masonry, and doubt not his actions come as near the truth as his words. When he managed the Jamestown Phoenix he offered an apology to his readers, for having, accidentally, placed confidence in the moral obligations of an oath; and were we to judge from present indications, we should say that he has no intentions of relinquishing his favourite theory. What are the laws worth in the hands of fellows of his description?

ANTI-MASONRY IN VERMONT. The Hon. HEMAN ALLEN, late minister to Chili, has declined the nomination for governor, given to him by the recent anti-masonick convention of the state of Vermont. The Hon. J. C. THOMPSON, of Chittenden county, has also declined the nomination for councillor, and says that his nomination by the anti-masonick convention was made without his knowledge, and that he does not hope or desire to receive the support of his fellow citizens from any other consideration than a conviction on their part of his qualification to serve them as councillor. Hon. SAMUEL CLARK, who was also nominated for councillor, is a Royal Arch Mason, and since his nomination has been stricken from the anti-masonick roll, and another candidate substituted. Mr. Clark is the regular candidate for councillor, of the party friendly to the late President, Mr. Adams.

The following anecdote of the excentrick Lorenzo Dow, who sojourned here for a day or two, and left the city this morning for his residence in Connecticut, is from the Rochester Craftsman of Tuesday last:

LORENZO DOW. We observe that some of the leading anti-masonick papers have turned their battering rams against this man of the longbeard, and appear resolved that he shall not preach, as heretofore, unmolested. We have recently heard a good anecdote of this man, which serves to show that they will find him a hard nut to crack.

Last fall, while on his way to the lodge, in this village, he was followed by a herd of anti-masonick cattle, who were reviling him, and just before he ascended the steps, he turned around to them, and very quaintly observed—"Whither I go, YE cannot come."

The first anniversary of the Albany Horticultural Society was celebrated at Cruttenden's in this city, on Tuesday last. The company was numerous; and the display of shrubs, flowers, and fruits, and the proceedings throughout, were highly creditable to the Society, and gratifying to those who participated in the scenes. An able and pertinent address was delivered by JESSE BUEL Esq.; and at the close of an excellent repast some very good toasts were drunk. The following is the list of officers for the ensuing year: JESSE BUEL, President; ALFRED CONKLING, 1st Vice President; EDWARD C. DELAVAN, 2d Vice President; ISAAC DENNISTON, 3d Vice President; DOUW B. SLINGERLAND, Treasurer; LEWIS C. BECK, Corresponding Secretary; R. M. MEIGS, Recording Secretary.

The Holland Purchase Baptist Association, comprising twenty churches, held their annual meeting in the county of Erie, on the 19th and 20th August. An attempt was made at this meeting to bind the churches to exclude masonry from among them. There was but one vote in favour of the measure.

On the 29th instant Solomon Southwick and Alexander Sheldon are to be "hail fellows well met," in the same court house in which Southwick, was tried in the famous bribery case. Sheldon was the principal witness against Southwick. Anti-masonry is a sort of philosopher's stone.

The "Johnstown Free Press," an anti-masonick paper, under the patronage of Alexander Sheldon and Henry Frey Yates, gave up the ghost on the 20th ult. after much hard struggling, aged fourteen weeks.

ANTI-MASONRY IN FRANCE. The Paris Quotidienne has discovered a plot now forming by the Freemasons, and Knight Templars, for placing the son of Napoleon on the Throne of Spain, that he may the more easily and conveniently reach that of France, and that the Throne of his father is now preparing to receive him at the Thuilleries!

Mr. Burges and Mr. Eddy were opposing candidates for congress at the late election in Rhode Island. Mr. B. having, during the campaign, accused Mr. E. of a want of courage, the latter, who is chief justice of the supreme court in that state, replied, "If he has any curiosity on that subject, he has my consent to gratify it as soon as he pleases."

A new bone to pick. The anti-masonick presses have made the important discovery, that Lorenzo Dow is a Masonick Missionary! and are accordingly belabouring him right lustily. [Batavia Press.]

From the Livingston Journal.

The following braggadocio paragraph, from Ward's Anti-Masonick Review, reminds us of the old proverb,

"Soon ripe, soon rotten."

"We speak with deference our doubt, whether any great moral reformation on earth has advanced so rapidly in three years from its birth, as anti-masonry. We doubt, whether the pure Gospel from heaven, spread wider, or made more converts in the first three years of its promulgation; and we know that the Mahometan imposture did not; neither, did the Protestant Reformation of A. D. 1517."

The comparison of "the great moral reformation," produced by the "Mahometan imposture," to that promised by anti-masonry is probably, as apt and correct a one as any yet made.

From the Little-Falls People's Friend.

BLESSINGS OF ANTI-MASONRY. The following is the precise copy of a letter (except the names,) received by a merchant of this village, in answer to a call for payment of an honest debt, upon a man residing in a county where the Anti-masonick sorceries have extensively prevailed. The man who would not frown indignantly upon the first attempt to introduce such a state of things among us, is a recreant to every principle of honour, patriotism, and religion, and unworthy the name of an American citizen.

August 20th, 1829.

"Sir I received your letter of the fifteenth past of which you informed me you claimed a waggon wick i Purchased of Mr. — and if i Did not Pay you fifty dollars you would prosecute me begin I Dont fear you threads for I am an ANTI-MASON and our sherif and court and Jury and Preests consists of same mettill I shall win the case twright or wrong sue if you dare for I am Ready to meet you at Both ends."

VARIETIES

Longevity of the Land Tortoise. We have lately seen it stated as a remarkable fact, that a Land Tortoise was seen in July last, in Dutchess, N. York, by a man who saw and marked the same 32 years ago. What is still more remarkable, a Tortoise of this kind was found in Rhode Island, in 1804, with the name of one of the finder's progenitors inscribed on the shell, and dated 1702. From the marks of extreme old age by which the Tortoise was distinguished, and from the known fact that the person whose name was cut in the shell was a resident in that section of the state in 1702, the natural conclusion was, that the Tortoise must have been considerably more than 100 years of age.

[Nantucket Enquirer.]

Egyptian beards. The Pacha of Cairo has turned reformer, and ordered all the Mussulmen to cut off their beards. This was a bold measure, and for a time great danger to the publick peace was apprehended. "What shall we do when we want to swear by our beards?" asked the Musselman. "Swear by your chins," said the Pacha. The consent of the Ulemas was at length obtained to his beard-sweeping measure, and the Mussulmen were consoled by the permission given them to deposit their beards in the gaves of the owners of them. As an expedient by which no laughter or ridicule should be indulged against any man who might be shorn of his beard before his neighbours, a particular hour and day were fixed for the bearded Mussulmen to assemble in the open streets and squares. They were ranged in line and column—the shaving executioners were in requisition—and the cherished growth of years was destroyed in a moment.

An association has been formed in the city of New-York having for its object the civilization and improvement of the Indian tribes, within the limits of the United States. The objects of the society, says the New-York Evening Post, embrace the adoption of some measures in relation to the emigration of certain of the indian tribes. Colonel T. L. McKenney, of the Indian Department, delivered an address before the society, on Wednesday, on the subject of our moral and civil relations towards the remnant of the Indian race! [Bost. Pal.]

The Seneca Indians, residing in the state of Ohio, have lately put several of their tribe to death for being witches, or practising what is called the black art. The Indians have full faith in witchcraft; many years since they formally tried and tomahawked a number of Indians, of both sexes, for being witches. And such was their infatuation, that children have become the executioners of their aged parents, conceiving it their duty to destroy them.

[Poughkeepsie Telegraph.]

Temperance of the Jews. A young Jew returning from a London theatre, with a female relation, was maltreated by a watchman. The watchman endeavoured to justify his conduct, by asserting that the Jew was drunk; but the latter found no difficulty in disproving the accusation, the presiding magistrate and principal police officer, united in declaring that they had never known a Jew intemperate in the use of spirituous liquors.

No Free Black is permitted to reside in Ohio, unless he gives bonds, in $500, to behave well, and not to become chargeable to the community. In consequence of this, several thousands are about to leave the state, and seek elsewhere for a spot to live on. Many of them are about to form a colony in Canada.

A shopkeeper in Connecticut, proposes to have a society formed, to be called the Anti-going-a-shopping-more-than-three-times-a-day-without-any-money society. There are probably some hundred shopkeepers in Boston who would be much pleased with the formation of such a society here.

HYMN.

Bounteous Giver of the good
That in plenty we enjoy,
In heartfelt praises now we would
Our grateful tongue employ.
We own the good thy mercy sheds,
On our undeserving heads;
And we now our thoughts would raise
And render Thee our grateful praise.
"Paul may plant, Apollos water,"
Thou must still the increase give;
O, thou assist us, God of nature,
In thy fear that we may live.
And thy bounteous blessings send,
O'er our Earth from end to end;
That every tongue thy praise shall sing,
And every heart devotion bring.
Let the suppliant voice of prayer
Ne'er escape thine Ear,
But deign to watch with zealous care
The man who owns thy fear.
May thy bounteous blessings flow
On us still, while here below,
And may we through thy grace benign
Stand accepted Sons of Thine. FRANCIS.

A MORNING ON THE ANDES.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

Arise the Andes, gorgeous, proud,
Like islands in a sea of cloud,
A glorious burning main;
The dawn of day has coloured o'er
The ocean as a golden floor,
The hills with coral stain.
The mountain seems above its cloud
A giant standing in a shroud,
A frozen wave of earth;
The mists, a silvery curtain, spread
Above a universe of dead,
Just dawning into birth.
The circled sun is sparkling up,
A drop from glory's foaming cup,
A shield of polished gold,
To waste upon a waiting world
The radiance of its wing unfurled,
As from the days of old.
The thunder-anthem peals around
The firm, uplifted rock-ribbed ground,
Like a free earthquake's tone;
And sea and sky re-echo well—
As caverns answer to a bell—
Its wild and swelling moan.
A mountain rock just trembles on
The precipice, as when at dawn
Pousses the mounting sun;
And now it leapeth, and the sound
From shore to shore goes sweeping round—
It never will be done.
It breaks away to distant isles,
It sweeps through consecrated piles,
Through forests old and strong;
Like winds careering in their scorn,
Till every substantial thing is torn—
So passeth this along.
Eagles, with lustre on their wings,
Come up in scorn from earthly things—
In scorn pass they the sun;
And wheel away to the brilliant skies
As spirits melt in paradise—
Their journeying scarce begun.
How small seem human pomp and power,
From where these hoary mountains tower,
These thrones of solid land!
Empire on empire goeth down—
The monarch and his jewelled crown—
But these unshaken stand—
Fit emblems of His power—who step
From glory, while the elements slept
And framed this shining sphere;
Fit emblems of His power, who when

The chosen time shall come again,
Will leave no semblance here.

A CHAPTER ON HEATHEN MYTHOLOGY.

Did you ever look
In Mr. Tooke,
For Homer's gods and goddesses?
The males in the air,
So big and so bare,
And the girls without their bodices.
There was Jupiter Zeus,
Who played the deuce,
A rampant blade and a tough one;
But Denis bold,*
Stole his coat of gold,
And rigged him out in a stuff one.
June, when old,
Was a bit of a scold,
And ruled Jove jure divino;
When he went gallivanting,
His steps she kept haunting,†
And she played, too, the devil with Ino.
Minerva bright
Was a blue-stocking wight,
Who lodged among the Atticks;
And, like Lady V.
From the men did flee,
To study the mathematics.
Great Mars, we're told,
Was a grenadier bold,
Who Vulcan sorely cuckold,
When to Rome he went,
He his children sent
To a she-wolf to be suckled.
Sol, the rat-catcher,‡
Was a great body-snatcher,
And with his bow and arrows
He Burked, through the trees,
Master Niobes,
As though they had been cock sparrows.
Diana, his sister,
When nobody kissed her,
Was a saint, (at least a semi-one,)
Yet the vixen Scandal
Made a terrible handle
Of her friendship for Endymion.
Full many a feat
Did Hercules neat,
The least of credit draws on;
Jesting Momus, so sly,
Said, "'Tis all my eye,"
And he called him Baron Münchhausen.
Fair Bacchus' face
Many signs did grace,
(They were not painted by Zeuxis:)
Of his brewing trade
He a mystery made,||
Like our Calverts and our Mouzes.
There was Mistress Venus,
(I say it between us,)
For virtue cared not a farden:
There never was seen
Such a drabish queen
In the parish of Covent Garden.
Hermes cunning,
Poor Argus funning,
He made him drink like a buffer;
To his great surprise
Sewed up all his eyes,
And stole away his heifer.
A bar-maid's place
Was Herbe's grace,
Till Jupiter did trick her;
He turned her away,
And made Ganymede stay
To pour him out his liquor.
Ceres in life
Was a farmer's wife,

* Not a Catholic agitator, (as some Brunswickers might imagine,) but Dionysius, a very orthodox, tyrant, who lived before Popery was invented. He did not wait for clerical permission to put his enemies to death; and broke his promises as cleverly as if he had a hundred bulls in his pocket. Scriblerus.

Of your favourite gallants
And into cows metamorphose 'em."

But she doubtless kept a jolly house;
For Rumour speaks,
She was had by the Beaks
To swear her son Triptolemus.*

Miss Proserpine,
She thought herself fine,
But when all her plans miscarried,
She the Devil did wed,
And took him to bed,
Sooner than not be married.
But the worst of all gods,
Beyond all odds,
It can not be denied, oh!
Is that first of matchmakers,
That prince of housebreakers,
The urchin Dan Cupido. M.

* There is some difference of opinion concerning this fact; the lady, like so many others in her interesting situation, passed through the adventure under an alias. But that Ceres and Terra were the same, no reasonable person will doubt; and there can be no serious objection to the little trip being thus ascribed to the goddess in question. Scrib.

TO THE DEAD.

I.
It is a hushed and holy spot
Where death has wrought thy dreamless bed,
And bade thee still, all unforget,
Forget that charter of the dead!

II.
At length thy heart is cold; the pain
Which wrings my own thou canst not see,
Nor turn to smiles this sullen strain,
Which soothes—because it breathes of thee!

III.
If once my spirit stole the vow,
But due to love, to waste on fame,
My only wish for laurels now
Would be—to wreath thee round thy name.

IV.
I would not thou shouldst cease to live
While fame its being can bestow,
And to our broken passion give
The deathless memory of our woe.

V.
In life, a widowed lot we bore,
But all my own in death thou art!
The grave, which severs hands the more,
But breaks the barriers from the heart.

VI.
As he who felt a charmed doom,
And saw friends—empires—ages fade,*
I live—a weed that wreathes its bloom
Around the wrecks which time has made!

VII.
Hope's latest link from life is wrenched!
The bird which blest the night, is fled!
The lamp, which lit the tomb, is quenched!
I stand in darkness with the dead!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS.

The following address on the subject of the anti-masonick excitement, was delivered by JONATHAN A. ALLEN, M. D., at a convention of the citizens of Addison county, Vermont, holden in the village of Middlebury, on the 7th of April last. It was published and circulated in a pamphlet form, by order of the convention.

Mr. Chairman—Nothing but a sense of duty to ourselves, our country and our God, could have induced us, members of the masonick fraternity, to appear in this publick place and make this appeal. To this imperious call of duty, we unhesitatingly comply, being fully confident that a generous and enlightened community, who have been accustomed to listen to the mandates of justice and reason, will not refuse to hear the voice of truth, though uttered by proscribed and persecuted citizens. There is probably no principle in our civil code better established, than that which admits to a certain extent the claim which the publick have upon the talents and services of every individual, and on the contrary, that any popular and unjust commotion which deprives the publick of those talents or services is incompatible with the spirit and nature of those civil privileges, which were guaranteed to us by our forefathers, and purchased with their blood. Having therefore "obtained our freedom, our civil and religious rights at such a great price," we feel that it would be a dereliction from duty to remain any longer silent and hear ourselves, and many of the best of men, of this, and of former ages, denounced as "conspirators, murderers and assassins." To this determination, we have deliberately come, notwithstanding we are indeed truly sensible, that most generally, "calumny is a spark which if let alone will soon go out," yet we as firmly believe that it is equally true, that there may be periods in which silence becomes criminal. This is the case when crimes of the most flagrant nature are unjustly ascribed to individuals, and especially, if taciturnity of the accused be assumed as an acknowledgement of the truth of the accusation. Precisely under these latter circumstances now stands arraigned before the publick, the masonick institution.

Freemasonry, which has received the sanction and support of the patriot, the statesman, the philosopher, the philanthropist and the christian, for more than 1600 years, and tradition says, from time immemorial, has been assailed with all the opprobrious epithets which malice, spleen or jealousy can invent. The peace and harmony of society are disordered. The church of God, where peace and love should abound, is filled with commotion and divisions. The whole fraternity of masons have been proscribed as a banditti, undeserving the least trust. We had fondly cherished the hope that these scenes of disturbance, anarchy and confusion, would have ended in the section of country where they began; but we find to our regret that many "busy bodies and contentious persons" are engaged in sowing the seeds of discord and contention amongst us. We would not indeed be uncharitable, for we do really believe that some do sincerely think, as St. Paul did when he persecuted the christians, that "they are doing God's service." To remain inactive under these circumstances we cannot. To do so, would be a violation of our duties as freemen, as masons, and as christians.

Had we been told that masonry is an institution which has its defects, that many of its members are vicious and undeserving; that unworthy persons had been admitted, that in various places it had been prostituted from the high and lofty character it ought to sustain, we should peaceably have remained mute—for over these things we have often cast an eye of regret, and wept, long before the commencement of the present excitement.

But when we are tauntingly told that "the principles of the institution are at war with the bible, that its influence is a curse to society," that "as an institution, it is a liar and an impostor," that "it is a nursery of wickedness and the hot-bed from which has sprung every ruinous and malicious plot for ages past," we feel constrained to state our convictions of the falsity of these charges and some of the reasons from which our deductions are drawn.

The facts that a corrupt fountain will send forth impure water, and on the contrary, that a pure fountain will yield that of a good quality, are in accordance not only with the common belief of mankind, but are consonant with the divine revelation. An institution whose principles are corrupt, can not in the nature of things be supported by good men. Virtuous individuals give by their aid and support of an object or institution, a laudable character to that object or institution.

This is not sophism, but what we daily admit. A conclusion so obvious and so tenable, it is candidly believed, will hardly be objected to by rational and intelligent men. Indeed, so true is the position that pious, virtuous and patriotic men, can no more support a profane, vicious and ruinous society, that we should have considered an apology was demanded for our suspicions of the good sense and candour of the community on this point, had not the infatuation of the present excitement afforded instances of singular and erroneous views in this particular.

Till within a recent period it has most generally been admitted, even by our opposers, that the institution of freemasonry was in conformity with divine revelation and consistent with our free republican and religious rights. This character the institution had obtained by the general course and virtues of many of its members. It was found from long experience to exert an influence of a salutary nature upon society. It had been found too, that masonry flourished most in countries where freedom of conscience and liberty of action were most enjoyed—where christianity with all its benign influence exerted its greatest sway—where the bible was most circulated, and valued, and esteemed. These facts are too notorious and palpable to have passed unnoticed by the most careless and inattentive observer. With what aspect of truth now, comes the loathsome charge that freemasonry is opposed to the bible, a charge serious in its nature, before the tribunal of an impartial publick? Can any candid man be led to believe even by sophistical arguments, that principles and practices so discordant, could be co-existent in the same individuals, for their whole lives? That men who spent their lives in christian virtues should at the same time encourage and patronize a society whose principles aimed a death blow at that religion which they practiced, inculcated, and for which some have died? Did not he "who spake as never man spake," say, "a tree is known by its fruit?" And could he lie?

Till within a recent date too, masonry has generally been regarded, to say the least, as consistent with the rights of freemen. Never, till lately, has it, in this country, been suspected of being capable of corrupting the fountain of justice, nor in the least degree affecting the civil obligations of jurors and witnesses. The practical virtues and patriotism of many of its founders and patrons had been to an unheated publick a sufficient pledge of the purity of its principles. It had long been known that the principal leaders in the grand drama of the American revolution, in the adoption, formation and administration of our most excellent government, had been conspicuous members of the masonick fraternity.

We hardly need refer you, sir, to a Franklin, a Washington, a Hancock, a Green, a Warren, a Hamilton, a Jefferson, a Clinton and many others, well known to the American people; and in this vicinity, we had expected till recently that the worthy names of a Painter, a Miller, a Rich and a Matthews would have been sufficient to silence the cavils of infatuated partizans, and calm the fears of the timid. Ask the most bitter of our opponents whether these men were undeserving of trust, whether they were hostile to the rights of man, and the administration of publick justice, and they will tell you no. But they were masons, active, leading masons, and most of them to testify their belief in the beneficial tendency of freemasonry, with their dying breath requested that the last friendly act paid their memories should be in accordance with the rights and customs of the masonick institution. It cannot be pretended that these men were ignorant of the nature of their masonick obligations or of their influence upon society. Had the masonick institution been dangerous to the publick, would Washington have said as he did, in effect "that masonry is calculated to promote the happiness of mankind?" Or would Painter, one of the founders and patrons of our college, have sanctioned the institution by requesting to be buried in the masonick form? If the principles of freemasonry were dangerous and wicked, a rational man, it could not be suspected, would countenance them when just entering the confines of eternity. Such perversion and degradation of the human character, cannot be admitted by any reflecting man.

It may be said these men were not well informed in all the secrets of the craft, that only the charming exterior was exposed to them while the secret mischief was concealed within. To this sophistical evasion it is sufficient to reply, that our ablest statesmen have been masters of lodges, and besides, we ourselves will not be accused of arrogance, when we assert that many of us possess a knowledge of all the authorized degrees received in this country, and we know of nothing in them inconsistent with our civil duties, nor with the precepts inculcated in the Holy Bible. Indeed, so far from diminishing our ties as citizens, we feel ourselves more strongly bound to adhere, in the most scrupulous manner, to all the obligations enforced upon us by the government and laws of our common country. [See note A.]

We are sensible that it has abusively been said, that we "are sworn to protect a brother, right or wrong, murder and treason not excepted." Were this a true representation of the fact, we sincerely avow that we would unhesitatingly relinquish our masonick obligations. But we know that we have never been bound, nor will we ever be, by such unrighteous bonds; nor do we believe there is such a requirement in any regular established lodge in this country.

Again, we are further accused of being bound to violate our oaths as jurymen, witnesses, or as judges, when a brother's life is in jeopardy in consequence of his crimes. Hence, say the committee on the abduction of William Morgan, in the house of representatives of the state of New-York, that "those deluded men whose hands are probably stained with a brother's blood, though politically and morally wrong, were masonically right." The honourable committee were probably justified in their conclusions from the evidence, literally considered, that was presented them. But we have to remark, that it becomes all dispassionate men, more especially when clothed with authority, carefully to scrutinize every species of evidence offered for their consideration. Every person at all acquainted with legal concerns, must be sensible how difficult it is even for truth itself to satisfy the publick feeling when it is highly excited. Much allowance is to be made in consequence of prejudice and partiality which are unavoidable accompaniments of popular excitements. At least there is much doubt whether such strong evidence as has resulted from the Morgan affair, could have been elicited even from the same individuals in a less heated state of the passions. Under these circumstances, it was hardly to be expected, that testimony, though given with the most scrupulous regard to truth, if it happened to be against the popular prejudice, could receive the publick sanction—as in the opinion of that publick, the guilt of the accused had been pre-established and judgment had passed before the trials were had.

We would by no means justify the abduction of Capt. Wm. Morgan. In common with our fellow citizens, we have ever held in utter detestation and abhorrence, all violence which may have been used towards that individual. We have ever deemed it as equally inconsistent with masonry and christianity. Had he even been guilty of divulging the secrets of the order, we know of no obligation in freemasonry, which would require any violence whatever towards his person. Every masonick obligation of which we have any knowledge, has a tendency to promote brotherly love, peace on earth, and good will towards all mankind. But we ask, if a mason has been even murdered by masons, whether it be right to proscribe the whole fraternity on that account? Have not individual masons before been guilty of the most gross crimes, without impugning the character of the institution?

Till since the abduction and alleged murder of Captain Morgan, who ever thought of denouncing masonry, or proscribing every mason for the misconduct of individuals? But, say our opponents, that masonick obligations can be so construed as to make it duty for one mason, to take the life of another on his transgression. Let us for argument admit that it is so, which we have already disavowed. And does not the same objection rest against the Bible? The Bible, it will readily be admitted, has been so construed as to tolerate proscriptio and murder. Every christian country has experienced the effect of this sad delusion. In the year 883, St. Alban, the first christian martyr of England, commonly called the protomartyr of the English, suffered death, not however for masonry, although he is said to have been an active mason, but for his religion. The history of our own country also furnishes us with a time, when the infatuated bigots drew authority from the Bible to burn Quakers and hang witches. And who at this time, lays the least charge to our most holy religion, because fanatics and knaves have suffered themselves to be led into the most fatal delusions, in their views of divine revelation? Admit the fact that many masons have mistaken or violated their obligations and what does it prove? That the institution is corrupt? By no means. Who will the publick believe, those illustrious individuals who for ages past have been warm patrons of the institution? or a comparatively few, who in a paroxysm of infatuation in the present excitement, commit acts, at which, when time has been given for the feelings to cool, they will undoubtedly look back with shame and contrition? And further, is no weight given to the fact, that men under the governance of masonic obligations are now every where engaged in promoting the publick good? We need not go from our firesides to see masons, equally with other men, promoting the spread of the gospel, and by practical illustrations evincing to the church and to the world the benign influence of the christian religion. That all masons are not thus engaged is no more objection to our position, than that all who believe the Bible do not embrace religion. Is he a husband, a parent, a magistrate or a preacher of the word of God, his duties are as faithfully performed as are those of other men. It may then in all good conscience be asked, why all this uproar? If masonry be what it is pretended, why has it not corrupted more of its members? Cupidity, dominion and a love of domineering, are among the strongest of the natural passions. Artful politicians and designing demagogues may put in action the whole scene, and one half of the most useful members of society may be proscribed, like Aristides the just, to make room for others less virtuous and less deserv'd. What would have been our fate, if the present spirit of proscriptio had commenced with the declaration of our independence? Who would have led our armies or guided our council?

We may be permitted further to ask, in what case has justice been prevented and the publick injured by freemasonry? We are told that evils do exist and operate in various ways, but a candid man should be informed where, before he assents to the hollow assertions of the modern crusader. We are told that most of our publick offices are filled by masons, and that masonic influence has been secretly exerted to accomplish that event, we have to reply, that a large proportion of our most able men are masons, and besides we would point to what has annually passed under our own observation, viz. that masons, on political subjects and at our elections, are known to be as much at variance with each other as other men. Of the correctness of this position every individual who will impartially call to mind past events, must be satisfied. To enlarge upon a subject so obviously correct, in Vermont, we forbear, being fully confident that upon due reflection it will be no longer made a question.

In the rage of infatuation, masonry has been accused of imposition in respect to its antiquity. Our opponents have boastingly said, that it had its origin within 150 years. If this were so, it would prove nothing against it. Has nothing good or useful been originated within the last 150 years? The novelty of a thing does not impair its quality. But those who assert this fact must be either ignorant, or guilty of gross falsehood. At present, we are willing to waive all traditional statements in relation to its having originated with Tubal Cain, or at the building of Solomon's Temple, and we readily admit, too, that originally, it was an association of mechanics. "Mr. W. Preston," says Rees' Cyclopaedia, "who published in 1792 a treatise on masonry, supposes its introduction into England to have been prior to the Roman invasion. Although masonry is said to have been encouraged by Caesar and by many Roman generals who were governors in Britain, we have no existing records of their conventions and lodges till the time of Carausius, (in the 3d Century) when Albanus, the Protomartyr of England, obtained a charter from him to hold a general council, of which he (St. Alban) was President, and in which many new members were admitted. In proof of this fact, Mr. Preston refers to some ancient manuscripts. By the departure of the Romans from Britain, the progress of masonry was checked, and it was afterwards wholly neglected. But it gradually revived again till 873, when it found a zealous protector in Alfred the great. The true re-establishment of masonry in England, is dated from the reign of King Athelstan; and there is still existing a lodge of masons at York, which traces its origin to this period. This lodge was founded in 926, under the patronage of Edwin the King's brother, who obtained a Charter from Athelstan, and was himself elected Grand Master. By virtue of this charter all the masons in the kingdom were assembled, and in their assembly, they established a general or grand Lodge for their future government. Under the patronage of this lodge, it is alleged, that the fraternity very considerably increased; and Kings, Princes and other eminent persons who had been initiated into the mysteries paid due allegiance to the assembly." [See Note B.] From this period till the present, time would fail us to recount the eminent individuals who have been patrons of the masonic institution. St. Austin, Inigo Jones, Sir Christopher Wren, Anthony Sayer, Nicholas Stone, Lord Paisley, and La Fayette, may be cited as a few of the distinguished European individuals who have been eminent as men and as masons. To this host of worthies we might add many on both sides of the Atlantic, who are now engaged in the active scenes of life; but delicacy bids us not proceed. To our history, and our lives, and our conduct we refer; "by our fruits we wish to be known," and we can but believe that an impartial and honest publick, to whom we appeal for decision, will unhesitatingly decide, that the present unaccountable anti-masonic excitement, is unjust, unreasonable, uncharitable, intolerant and scandalous, without the least foundation in truth, or honesty, and if not arrested in its progress, will do more mischief than freemasonry, in its most perverted form, in this country, ever has done or can do. Experience has never shown the dreaded evils of which there is so much complaint. While masons have been engaged in the administration of publick justice, right has been done and all parties have been satisfied. While masons have been members of our churches, leaders of our conferences, and preachers of the gospel, God has blessed their efforts by the pouring out of his holy spirit. If God be for us who can prevail against us? If masonry be what it is pretended by our accusers, let it alone, it must ere long crumble to ruins. If it be of men it will come to nought, if truth be found therein, it will stand. "For truth is great and powerful, and it will prevail."

We have the charity to believe, that many pious individuals, who have engaged in this uncommon warfare, have not duly considered the subject. If the object of good men be to win souls to Christ, it cannot rationally be expected in an excited state of the passions. God is not a God of confusion. By promoting distraction in our churches, will not the holy spirit be grieved therefrom? The influence of revivals, and the promotion of religion have often been interrupted by a spirit of contention and strife. To inculcate a principle of an opposite character from this, Christ has said, "Blessed are the peace makers for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

God has not expressed his abhorrence of freemasonry by withholding his blessing from the churches where there are freemasons; and shall man presume to exercise his powers where He who searches the heart, has bestowed his blessings? The ship which conveyed Jonah, could not proceed till he was cast into the deep; but the church of Christ has for ages been blest, while it contained those individuals by profession whom the present excitement seems determined to thrust out. Is the church more pure than at former times? or has Satan transformed himself and come to sow the seeds of dissension and disturbance among the churches? We believe it becomes the professed followers of our Lord Jesus, carefully and prayerfully to examine this subject, before they suffer themselves to be gullied by such over-heated fanatics.

NOTES.

[A.] The following is an extract from the charge given at the initiation into the first degree of masonry, and it is the basis upon which all true freemasonry is founded.

"Brother,—There are three great duties, which, as a mason, you are charged to inculcate—to G. D., your neighbour, and yourself. To God, in never mentioning his name, but with that reverential awe which is due from a creature to his CREATOR—to implore his aid in all your laudable undertakings, and to esteem him as the chief good—to your neighbour, in acting upon the square, and doing unto him as you wish he should do unto you—and to yourself, in avoiding all irregularity and intemperance, which may impair your faculties, or debase the dignity of your profession. A zealous attachment to these duties will ensure publick and private esteem.

In the state, you are to be a quiet and peaceful subject, true to your government, and just to your country, you are not to countenance disloyalty or rebellion, but patiently submit to legal authority, and conform with cheerfulness to the government in which you live."

[B.] In our attempts to trace the rise and progress of freemasonry, it is nothing singular, that we should be involved in the inextricable labyrinth of uncertainty. The same inconvenience attends our researches in every other subject of great antiquity, except divine records. The absurd and jarring accounts which are given in the most modern books upon freemasonry, of its origin, are to be accounted for, only, from an enthusiasm, operating upon credulity, and a love of the marvellous. The fraternity have suffered more injuries from its inebriate friends, in this particular, than from its avowed enemies.

Although the origin of freemasonry is covered with darkness, and its history is, to a great extent, obscure, we can safely say, "that is the most ancient society in the world;" but what is more in point for us, at this time, is to show that our opponents are wholly in the wrong, in assigning our origin to modern times.

The Knighthood which is universally considered as modern masonry, and as being found-dupon ancient masonry, we have the most authentic records to show, took its origin in the eleventh century. "About A. D. 1048, some Neapolitan merchants founded a church," says Rees' Cyclopaedia, under Article Malta "after the late rite at Jerusalem, giving it the name of Santa Muria della Latina, or St. Mary of the Latins. They also founded a monastery of religious, after the order of St. Bennet, for the reception of pilgrims: and afterwards an hospital near the monastery, to take care of the diseased, under the direction of the master or rector. Besides which, they also built a chapel, in honour of St. John Baptist." After the capture of Jerusalem in 1099, by Godfrey of Bulloign, they received the name "of Hospitaliers, or 'Brothers of St. John of Jerusalem.'" It appears from Rees that the principal object of their association, was to afford aid to poor pilgrims, and diseased persons. In 1308, they took from the Saracens the island of Rhodes, and settled there, and took the name of "Knights," and soon after, "Knights of Rhodes." They retained possession here till 1522, when they were attacked by Solyman II, with an army of 300,000 men, and the island was taken by him, after having been in the possession of the Knights, 213 years.

After this loss, the Grand Master and Knights retired first to the isle Candia, some time after pope Clement VII, gave them Viterbo. Lastly Charles V, in 1525, gave them the island of Malta, which grant was confirmed by the Pope, in 1530; and hence they obtained the appellation of "Knights of Malta;" though their proper name is that of "Knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem." They retained possession and government of Malta, till 1798, when Bonaparte took possession of the island. "By the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the French republick, concluded at Amiens 27th Marc. 1802, it was stipulated that the island of Malta, Gozo, and Cumina, should be restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, to be held on the same conditions, on which it possessed them before the war."

This order of freemasonry, even our opponents have never pretended was composed of operative masons only; but was composed of men of worth and piety of all professions, who had received the degrees of ancient masonry, and in lieu of having originated within 150 years as stated by clamorous anti-masons, it is obvious, that the orders of Knighthood took their rise more than 780 years ago, that their members have been known by the name of "Knights," at least 517 years. We have only to remark, that this disposition to misrepresent and distort facts, we fear, is a predominant trait in the attempts of our opponents, to proscribe, stigmatize, and abuse the masonic fraternity.

NATURAL CURIOSITIES.

From the Boston Medical Intelligencer.

THE SIAMESE BROTHERS.

Our readers have been apprized, through the newspapers, of the arrival in this city, and publick exhibition, of the united boys from Siam. On first viewing them, the attention is arrested by their healthy and happy appearance. They are nearly of the ordinary stature, have heads uncommonly large, and foreheads higher, but less broad, than those of young men generally at their age. Their complexion, features, and countenance, are altogether Chinese, and accord with tolerable exactness. After seeing them often, however, the peculiarities of each become more evident, and they appear scarcely, if any, more resemblant than other twins have appeared when clad in like apparel.

By the plate below, which is that already before the publick, they would appear to be united by a cartilaginous substance of an hour glass shape, passing from the epigastric region of one, and attached to that of the other. This, however, is not the case. The skin is continuous from one boy to the other; and with the exception of a scar in the lower surface, evidently occasioned by the removal of the cord through which they were nourished in the fetal state, it presents no mark, blemish, or discoloration whatever. This scar bears but little resemblance to that usually left by the division of the umbilicus; a fact which may be explained in two ways. It may be owing to some manner of performing this operation among the Siamese, different from that in use among us; or the constant pulling on this connected mass, may have drawn it out, and occasioned the long and even surface which it presents.

On closer examination, the true nature of the union becomes evident. The ensiform cartilages of the sternæ are bent outwards, and united by ligaments at their extremities, forming a kind of a joint which admits of motion in various directions. By the pulling of these ligaments, occasioned by almost every movement, the integuments below have been drawn out, as it were, so that the whole forms a band of union, horizontally about two inches broad, and in thickness, vertically, about four inches. Its length is about half that represented in the plate, and was doubtless originally very small. The whole mass is tough, and capable of being extended very considerably. When loose, that is, when the boys face each other and stand close together, if one hand be placed above this curvature and the other below it, and the latter be then pressed forcibly up, the hands approach each other so nearly, as to convey the impression (doubtless a correct one) that the intervening substance is little more than the ensiform cartilages united by ligaments, and surrounded by the integuments. The concave inner, but in this case under surface of these cartilages, is distinctly felt, but no pulsation whatever is distinguishable.

Although we can not say that the skin which envelopes

this projection was originally endowed with less sensibility than that which covers other parts of body, yet it is evident that such deficiency exist at present. We were obliged to press it forcibly between the fingers before any mark of pain was elicited, and we were informed by their attendant that he had often pinched it during their slumbers without disturbing them.

The precise effect of this physical union, on the intellectual faculties, the moral sentiments, and animal propensities of these boys,—its influence on the functions of the different organs, and how far it would communicate or modify the effects of the morbid or medicinal agents, are subjects on which we shall not enter. No opportunity has yet presented of observing the influence which disease or medicine in one, would exert on the other; but circumstances do not appear to justify the least suspicion of any mental individuality. Whispering in the ear of one, conveyed no sense of sound to the other. Volatile salts applied to the nostrils of one, produced in the other only a curiosity to try the same experiment on himself. Pinching the arm of one, was attended by no sensation in the other. Being desirous of ascertaining if there was any point where both felt, we made an impression with the point of a pin in the exact vertical centre of their connecting link; both said it hurt them. We then made other impressions, extending them very gradually further from this point: the result was, that within the distance of three-fourths of an inch from the centre toward each boy, sensation was communicated to both by a single prick; beyond this it was excited in one only, the other perceiving it in no degree whatever. This experiment was remarkably satisfactory, and we apprehend that farther than here exhibited, the two youths must be considered, whilst in a state of health, as free and independent agents, and the functions of all the other organs as unconnected as those of their brains.

Twins generally resemble each other in intellect and disposition, as well as in person, and this is particularly the case with the boys in question. When to this natural resemblance we add the habit they have contracted of acting simultaneously and in concert, we shall be less surprised than we might at first be; at the facility with which their various movements are performed, and the quickness with which one responds to the inclinations of the other.

In the course of their voyage, they would not only run, we are told, and leap with great agility and without interfering with each other, but climb to the mast-head as fast as any sailor on board the ship. They are seldom observed to converse with each other, and the concert with which they act seems to be almost instinctive. In playing the game of draughts, e. g., which they learnt with great ease, being a people naturally fond of games and gambling, they were observed to decide on their moves almost instantaneously, and to make them with a quickness and air of decision sufficiently characteristic of all their movements. In the course of the game, sometimes the one and sometimes the other would make the move; they appeared to have the same plans, and always acquiesced in the moves of each other. Yet they sometimes play against each other; but so strong is their habit of coacting, that such games go on with less freedom than when opposing a third person. Their alvine evacuations generally occur at the same time; their appetites and tastes are all very much alike; and they appear not only contented but happy, and extremely attached to each other. Capt. Coffin was informed by their mother, that she had borne seventeen children. Once she had three at a birth, and never less than two; though none of her other children were in any way deformed.

The question naturally arises in the mind of every observer, could not this connecting substance be divided without injury to the boys?—We do not pretend to solve this problem, which after all can only be decided by the experiment; but we hesitate not to say that, after several very accurate examinations, our impressions are that such a division would be a detriment only to the very respectable and obliging gentleman who offers them for exhibition. The anatomical structure of this bond of union is apparently simple, and we regard the fact that children so united should have been ushered into the world with safety to themselves and their mother, that they have escaped the ills and early fatality which usually attend such prodigies, that they should have grown up to the age of 18 years in the uniform exercise of mutual good will and a spirit of mutual accommodation, and that they should be so perfectly contented with their lot, and so happy in all the various unpleasant circumstances in which they are placed, as far more remarkable than that such a deformity should have existed. Instances of fetuses united much more closely than are these boys, are by no means rare in the books or cabinets of anatomists. The mode of union is very various, being sometimes at the hips, backs or sides; several cases are related by Parez and Tulpius, in which the connection was at the abdomen. In the Philosophical Transactions is an account of two children thus united, born near Manchester, Eng. in 1752. 1748 Dr. Parsons communicated to the Royal Society an account of a still birth not very unlike the boys now exhibited. The fetuses were united from the umbilicus to the upper part of the sternum, and the single chord by which they were nourished, entered the connecting medium at a central point on its lower surface. Dr. Cotton Mather communicated to a learned friend in England, a similar case of which he was eye-witness, and which occurred in this city in 1713; and a double fetus, born in this country at a much later period, is now preserved, and deposited, if we mistake not, in the anatomical cabinet of a neighbouring medical institution.

Most monsters have been still-born, and of the few who have been living, a very small proportion have survived many days. The most remarkable and as far as our memory goes, the only case on record of such monsters acquiring the adult age, occurred in Hungary more than a century ago. Two females Judith and Helen, born in Szona in 1701, were united at the lower part of the back. They had but one urethra and one passage for the fecal evacuations. Their bodies, abating the deformed part alluded to, were well shaped, and their faces beautiful. They were intelligent, and like the boys of Siam, not only contented, but in the language of their father, "both brisk and merry." Like them, also, these girls "had not their feeling common anywhere but in the place of their conjunction." When one stooped she lifted the other on her back, and when one went forward the other was drawn backward. On would sometimes sleep whilst the other was awake, and though tenderly attached, their inclinations were not always the same. These Hungarian sisters were well educated and well bred; they could speak four different languages, and sing very prettily. They lived to the age of twenty-two years, during which time they were exhibited in different parts of Europe, and both died together in 1723.

THE UNICORN.

On the Existence of the Unicorn as a distinct Animal of our own Times.

"His horns are like the horns of unicorns."—Deut. xxxiii. 17.

It may not be known, even to some of our naturalist readers, that the male camelopard or giraffe is not only furnished with two short horns above the ear and on each side of the upper part of his head, but with a third, rising from the centre of his forehead, and in this respect distinguishing him from every other species of ruminating creature of which the animal kingdom as yet affords us any example. When we combine with this circumstance the no less remarkable fact, that the three horns are distinct bones seated upon the sutures of the skull, it is impossible not to draw inferences of a deep importance towards establishing the veracity of the Scripture and of many ancient records, where they speak of the re'em, raam, monokeros, or unicorn, an animal which the sacred writings celebrate for its strength, noble bearing, and wildness; and Pliny for its ferocity; whilst Asian and Solinus relate that its feet are undivided and like the elephant's; but Vartomannus, on the contrary, that the two specimens he saw at Mecca were footed like a goat, and of the size of a colt. To the testimony of travellers who have reported the existence of this animal in the remote deserts of Africa, or steppick wastes of Asia, and to every attempt at proving that some other known animal was that which the ancients recognised as the unicorn,* the anatomist has always replied, it was inconsistent with any hitherto observable law of nature in her conformation of the horns of animals, that a single horn should rise from the centre or sagittal suture of their forehead. Recent observation, however, has demonstrated, in the instance of the male of the giraffe species, that such a frontal horn is quite within the pale of the laws by which the structure of animals is ordered, and has consequently removed every doubt as to the possible existence of the unicorn. The late discovery of the Addax, which was hitherto supposed to have existed only in the credulous imaginations of Strabo and Pliny, but the description of which they drew, it is now evident, from reports derived from Northern Africa, induces us to anticipate, with something like a confident expectation, that the time is not distant when the perseverance of some enterprising traveller will place the positive existence of the unicorn beyond the cavil of scepticism.

We have another and scarcely less tenable ground for indulging in this expectation. Ruppell, in a letter written during his sojourn in Kordofan, mentions that the unicorn is well known in that country, under the appellation of the nillekma.

* Some affirm it to have been the Indian ox or ass; and others the rhinoceros, oryx, or hippopotamus, which last has grown into a generally received opinion.

"The information which I have acquired," says, he, "in regard to this animal, from individuals of various classes, uniformly agrees in the following particulars: its skin is of a reddish hue; it is of the size of a small horse; its stature is slender as the gazelle's; and the male nillekma has a long, straight, narrow horn protruding from his forehead, which is not the case with the female. Some of my informants reported that it has split or cloven hoofs, others that the hoof is entire. It is an inhabitant of the steppes, which lie to the south of Kordofan, possesses great swiftness, and occasionally strays as far as the mountainous range of the Koldagi, which borders on Kordofan. I have conversed, at different times, with three Arabians, who have themselves seen this animal after it had been killed. One of my own slaves, on seeing the antelopes M. Hey had slain in the desert of Korti, of his own accord described the nillekma in terms which entirely coincided with the information I afterwards obtained: he had eaten of its flesh in his native country, and spoke of it as being a remarkably handsome animal. This slave came from Koldagi, and I have had repeated opportunities of ascertaining the veracity of his assertions; for we always found his previous descriptions of the animals we met with on a subsequent occasion to be extremely correct."

Ruppell had afterwards another opportunity, when in company with Arabians, of hearing mention made of the unicorn, as inhabiting the desert already alluded to. They called it the Anase; and he observes that "the description given by these Arabians, who had seen the unicorn whilst they were engaged on a southerly incursion along the banks of the Buhhar-Abbiad, corresponded with the accounts I had received in Kordofan, as well as from my slave. They asserted positively that its hoofs were cloven."

THE GATHERER.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

A schoolmaster, while surrounded by his scholars at a night school, was one evening engaged writing a copy, listening at the same time to some young men, apprentices, reciting a lesson in the testament, and was favoured by one of them with the following reading of Matt. 23, 21:—"Ye blind guides which strain at a gale and swallow a saw mill." "What's that!" cried the astonished teacher, "how did you spell gate?" "G-u-a-t, sir." "Admirable! well now, sir, if you please, spell saw-mill for us." "C-a, saw, m-e-e-l, mill, saw-mill."

HANDEL.

Some folks eat two or three times as much as others—for instance, the incomparable and inspired composer, Handel, required uncommonly large and frequent supplies of food. Among other stories told of this great musician, it is said that whenever he dined alone at a tavern, he always ordered "dinner for three;" and on receiving an answer to his question—"Is de tinner retty?"—"As soon as the company come." He said, con strepilo, "Den pring up te tinner prestissimo, I am de gompany."

COTTAGE GARDENS.

The comforts and benefits to be derived from a well cultivated garden, by a poor man's family, are almost beyond calculation. What a resource for hours after work, or when trade is dull, and regular work scarce! What a contrast and counteraction is the healthy, manly, employment which a cottage garden affords, to the close, impure, unwholesome air, the beastliness and obscenity, the waste of time, the destruction of morals, the loss of character, money, and health, which are the inmates of too many common ale-houses!

WINE AND WATER.

The same quantity of wine diluted intoxicates sooner than the same quantity drank in the same time without dilution; the wine being applied to a larger surface of the stomach, acts with proportionably greater quickness—though wine diluted sooner intoxicates, its effects are sooner over.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

MADNESS.

BY RICHARD PENN SMITH.

"Mad as the sea and wind, when both contend
Which is the mightier."

Hamlet.

The light of reason has elevated man immeasurably above the rest of God's creatures, and when enjoyed even to the extent allowable, it assumes the aspect of a godlike attribute, and the mind, no longer circumscribed by the narrow limits that imprison the body, threads the universe. It delves the earth to the centre, and the caverns of the ocean are searched. The sun, the moon, and the stars are traversed, and even the sacred vaults of heaven are approached by the mercurial spirit. The mind, framed to enjoy such research, bears within itself an exhaustless fountain of delight. It soars beyond this world, and the realities of life cannot wound it.

Though reason elevates man above the rest of the animal kingdom, yet, when deprived of it, he becomes more abject than the humblest of creatures. There is nothing so powerful calculated to shock our natures as the scene exhibited in a receptacle of maniacs. Death, the end of all things, is not to be compared with it, for that is natural; but to witness the annihilation of mind, while the body still retains its functions, is a sight that cannot be reconciled to our feelings. It is literally death in the midst of life, and death of the better part.

Some years ago I entered a receptacle of this description, to gratify my curiosity, but time has been unable to efface the impression which it made upon me, and the scene stands pictured in my memory as one of the few, fearfully impressive, which occur in the equable life of an ordinary man.

I entered the yard, common to such as were harmless in their aberrations. Each appeared to be absorbed with his own reflections, and the train of thought was indicated by the movements of the body. Here might be seen one whose steps were hurried, and his gesticulation wild; and there another, whose movements were regular and measured; his brows knit, and his head bent to his bosom, over which his arms were folded.

I moved through the crowd until my attention was arrested by a gray-haired man on his knees, making figures in the sand. He was intent in calculation. His visage was small and fox-like. His eyes were deep-set and twinkling; his nose pointed and thin; his chin projected, and his mouth receded. Every line of his countenance denoted avarice. He did not notice our approach until the keeper accosted him.

"Well, Jamieson, what are you about?"

"Casting up the amount of my property," he replied, without raising his head. "A moment and I have done. Ten and eight are eighteen and two are twenty. There it is as clear as daylight. Twenty thousand, every copper of it. And not a sixpence yields me less than twelve per cent. Ha! ha! ha! I may laugh at the world now, I think!"

"And at your heirs, too, Jamieson," said the keeper.

"Hang them for ungrateful hounds," exclaimed the miser, "they would have clapped me in a mad house for having dropped a dollar in the poor-box, after listening to a charity sermon. They pronounced me mad and unfit to take care of my wealth. They wished to become my stewards: the devil thank them. But the dogs had reason. A hard round dollar in the charity-box was a symptom, to be sure, but then look there, twenty thousand at twelve per cent! Could they have done better as the times go, mad as they pronounce me?" He smiled and chuckled in a satisfied tone at the idea of his imaginary possessions, and as I left him, I voluntarily exclaimed, "Wherein does the happiness of this deluded wretch differ from that of the miser who worships a hoard of gold in secret. Their joys are equally imaginary, and he who dreams he is worth thousands, provided the dream be never broken, is in fact as wealthy as he who is possessed of thousands, and spends his life in dreaming over his possessions. How many maniacs of this description do we daily see, who are not only permitted to run at large, but who are pronounced to be in the full possession of their mental faculties!"

My attention was now attracted by a young man reciting Homer in the original. The musical numbers flowed from his tongue with eloquence; his countenance was animated and his gesticulation impassioned. When he concluded the passage he exclaimed, "Well, that is poetry, and will remain so, let them say of my epick what they please."

"Your epick?" I exclaimed.

"Yes; they pronounced me mad for having written a poem that the critics had neither taste to relish nor sense to comprehend. If this is to be the fate of all authors who experience similar condemnation, let them convert the whole world at once into a bedlam,—your prison houses will be too small to hold us. And who is there to draw the line between insanity and reason. If my imagination be so vigorous as to soar beyond the reach of those who cannot dissolve the influence of this grovelling world, which draws them back with magnetick power, must I needs be mad! If their waxen wings fail them in their attempt to follow me through untraveller regions of light and glory, and while I keep on with steady wing and eagle eye, they, for their temerity, share the fate of Icarus—for this may they pronounce me mad! And yet it is so. But who is there to draw the line! Sophocles, in his age, was accused of being insane by his heartless sons, but when before his judges he produced his last tragedy, and asked if a madman could write such verses he was dismissed with fresh honours, and his sons were punished as madmen for making the accusation. Were I now to write an Œdipus Coloneus, such is the revolution that taste in literature has undergone, that the critics would pronounce it conclusive evidence of incurable insanity. The line between madness and reason changes with the age. I have lived a century before my time, and posterity will enjoy the epick that has consigned its author to bedlam." How many authors do we see at large labouring under similar delusion!

At a short distance from the poet was a painter, busily engaged in his art. We approached him, and the keeper inquired of him what he was about.

"Drawing a map of the moon," was the reply.

"And what do you mean by that palace upon which you have bestowed so much care?"

"The residence of the man in the moon to be sure."

"Is the drawing accurate?"

"Ay; even to the smoke that you see ascending from the chimney. Behold, I have laid down with precision, all the rivers, oceans, mountains, and wilderness; and I will stake my reputation that the picture is as faithful as many of the representations of the globe we inhabit! Not being prepared to dispute the point with the maniac, I passed on and he resumed his labour.

He worked with intense earnestness, but in the world we daily see hundreds as busily employed, and to as little purpose.

The next we came to was an astronomer, looking through a telescope. "What, Lawson, will you never have done with you astronomical researches?" said the keeper to him.

"Never, until death puts a period to them. Had I been created at the time that the wondrous fabric was first put in motion, when each sphere rung forth its faint note as it slowly moved on its axle; and had I studied daily until the present hour, still the knowledge I might have acquired, compared with that beyond the grasp of the human mind, would have been as the acorn compared with the towering oak of the forest."

"And what has been the result of your researches?"

"Inexplicable confusion. I perceive that space is illimitable, and that thought alone, is beyond the stretch of the human mind to reconcile with things that are bounded and circumscribed. There is nothing in nature that comes in comparison with this phenomenon. I have thought of it until my brain became as bewildered as that of the tenant of an hospital." The keeper smiled at the comparison, and the maniac proceeded—"I have been told that the planets maintain their position by gravity and attraction; that the atmosphere becomes lighter and more rarified as you recede from earth, and that of consequence, the globes poised in this pure element, must be of lighter consistency than that we inhabit. One visionary tells me, that such an orb is composed of matter as light as water, another orb of weightier consistency, and that the animal kingdom every where is adapted to the planet on which it is created. So that where water prevails the tritons and the mermaids, which in this sphere exist only in the poet's brain, have there the functions of vitality. Other and the most remote of the heavenly bodies are nothing more than dense atmosphere, and these are inhabited by birds; that space is filled by fluctuating nebulae, which are drawn together by attraction, and thus the work of creation is incessantly going on, and will continue until time shall be no more. That the comets are orbs of bituminous matter, which, becoming ignited, burn on for ages, until extinguished for want of fuel; and, as their gravity and attraction undergo constant change, their course is erratic and uncontrolled by the surrounding atmosphere. I have read until I became like a ship in the midst of the ocean, without compass or polar star to guide it, and then the philosophers pronounced me mad, and expelled me from their fraternity. If they were to deal thus with all mad philosophers the number would soon be reduced to a chosen few.

I now directed my steps towards a maniac, who, from an elevation, was addressing about a dozen auditors, who appeared to listen to him with attention. His head was gray and bare, his countenance animated, his gesticulation wild, and he spoke with a degree of vehemence that imparted a corresponding excitement in the minds of his auditors.

"The world is mad. I look abroad, and whatever my eye falls upon goes to establish the truth of my position. Behold yon hoary headed father hoarding his wealth for his thankless child; depriving himself of proper sustenance to add another mite to the mountain that he has already accumulated. A little longer and we shall see tears of joy shed upon the old man's grave; the mountain of wealth levelled with the valley; the stream that formed drop by drop, rush out in torrents. And yet the world pronounces the dotard full of wisdom and prudence."

"The world is mad! the world is mad!" wildly shouted the crowd around him. The preacher continued. "Behold that pallid and emaciated being by the midnight lamp. The sun rises, sets, and rises again, and still we find him in the same position, consuming his life, even as the lamp is consumed that stands beside him. The main object of life is neglected, and the joys that the world presents are spurned as things unworthy of notice. His whole soul is absorbed with one idea, but one wish—that succeeding ages may know that he existed, and to accomplish this, he renders that existence a burthen, heavier than the fabled Atlas has to bear. The world will tell us he is a model of human wisdom; but if this be wisdom, why build walls to confine lunatics? Who is there so frantick among us as to sacrifice every enjoyment of life, with the vain hope of attaining that, which, when attained, he will be insensible to, and incapable of enjoying! The world is mad, since wisdom itself is madness."

"The world is mad, the world is mad!" shouted forth his auditors, and the exclamation was echoed from different parts of the yard.

"Behold that young mother, watching by the cradle that contains her infant child. It is midnight, and not a soul is near her. She bends over him, gazes on his dimpled cheeks, and kisses his ruby lips, while tears of anguish flow from her eyes, languid for want of sleep. It is midnight, and her head is not yet reposed upon her pillow. She has trimmed the lamp to guide the stray one to his home, but it is useless, for the morning sun will rise before he leaves the scene of his heartless debauchery. And yet she clings with the fervency of pure affection to him who has deserted her and her little babe, who has trodden on her heart, and leaves her to want, suffering and shame. It is written—"If thine eye offend thee pluck it out," and though he is dearer to her than her eyes, why tamper with a diseased member, that is incurable, and, if not lopped off, must bring her to an untimely grave. The scene is changed. Behold her now. She is still alone in the chamber. Her face is bent down to her lap and buried in her hands. She is still weeping. What is it that lies stretched on the bed beside her? It is the bud of beauty that lately she sprinkled with her tears, now as pale as the lily of the valley, and as senseless as the clod of the valley too. Weep not, thou stricken one, for no refreshing shower will call the blossom forth again. It is dead, and she mourns her loss in the bitterness of the soul—but wherefore should she weep? The child has gone to bliss; it would have been reared in misery and shame; it has died unspotted and in innocence, and yet she mourns that it was not reserved for a life of pollution and a death of guilt. She is mad, for rather should her lips pour forth the song of rejoicing that the innocent has been removed, before it entered upon the guilty path of its father, or tasted of the bitter cup that its mother has quaffed to the very dregs. But say that fortune had strewed its path with flowers, its course had been as unruffled as the sunny stream, that seeks the waste of waters, and its death, the death of the righteous. What then? Is there any enjoyment in life to compensate for the misery even the most prosperous are doomed to endure; any knowledge that will repay for a knowledge of the human race? Blessed are ye who die in ignorance of your fellow mortals, since the good that flows from the purer sources of the human heart is but as a drop, compared with the streams poured forth by the corrupted fountains; and ye who are saved from this knowledge, are, as the husbandman who enjoys the harvest without having toiled in the sun. And yet, they who have escaped from a scene of selfishness and ingratitude; who are removed from a state of persecution and suffering, whose spirits return to His presence as pure and unspotted as when he formed them, are mourned as though they had lost instead of having gained a world. The world is mad, the world is mad! The preacher ceased, and his auditors shouted forth his last words. They were re-echoed from distant parts of the yard, and even in the cells, amid clanking of chains might be heard the exclamation, "The world is mad! The world is mad!" I hurried away, glad to escape from the wild scene to the bustle of society—a change from one scene of madness to another. I have since often reflected on the words of the maniac, and am more than half inclined to believe that I heard the plain truth spoken within the walls of bedlam.

MISCELLANY.

HINTS ON DRINKING.

Abridged from Mr. Richard's Treatise on Nervous Disorders.

Without any intention of advocating the doctrine, or of commending the reputed practice of the Pythagoreans, ancient or modern, I must be allowed to reprobate the abuse of fermented liquors. Although wine was invented, and its use allowed "to make glad the heart of man," and although a moderate and prudent indulgence in it can never excite reprobation, or cause mischief, still the sin of drunkenness is an extensive and a filthy evil. Not only does it demoralize, debase, and finally destroy its unhappy victim, but it renders him incapable of performing the ordinary duties of his station; constituting him an object of disgust to others, and pitiable misery to himself. It is well to talk of the Bacchanalian orgies of talented men, and to call them hilarity and glee. The flashes of wit "that were wont to set the table in a roar," the brilliancy of genius, that casts a charm even over folly and vice; the rank and fame of the individual, no doubt, increased the fascination of his failings; but however bright and wonderful may be the coruscations of his talent, while under the influence of wine, his frame is debilitated, tottering, and imbecile, when the stimulus of the potation has subsided.

But I do not proscribe indiscriminately all stimulus. Those whose occupations are laborious, and who are much exposed to our variable climate, require an absolute stimulus, over and above what they eat. Dr. Franklin advocated a contrary doctrine, and inculcated the fact, that a twopenny loaf was much better for a man than a quart of beer; and he adduces the horse and other beasts of burden as examples of inefficacy of the use of fermented liquors. But all this is founded upon decidedly erroneous premises. To enable a hard-working horse to go through his toil with spirit, he must have corn, or some other article subject to fermentation. Now, the horse, as well as many other animals, have stomachs very capacious, and probably adapted to the production of this fermentation. So that corn is, in fact, a powerful fermented stimulus to the beast.

Let us then assume, that stimulus in a certain degree is necessary to sustain the strength and invigorate the frame of the toiling man; and the best proof of its good effect is the comfort and energy which it imparts to its consumer; but if this necessary stimulus be exceeded, then it is abused, and every mouthful in addition becomes ultimately poisonous. The first effect which is produced is upon the internal coat of the stomach, as we may learn from the warmth which we feel. The repetition increases the circulation of the blood, which seems, as it were, to dance through the veins; the pulse becomes quick and full, the eyes sparkle, and the imagination is quickened; in short the whole frame is excited, as is evinced by every word, look, and action. If the affair end here, well and good; but we will suppose that the potation goes on, and very speedily a new effect is produced. The brain, oppressed by the load of blood thrown up into it, and irritated through its quick sympathy with the stomach; oppressed, also, by the powerful pulsation of the larger arteries about the head, becomes, in a degree, paralyzed. The tongue moves with difficulty, and loses the power of distinct articulation; the limbs become enfeebled and unsteady; the mind is deranged, being either worked up into fury, or reduced to ridiculous puerility, and if the stimulus be pushed farther than this, absolute insensibility ensues. Such is a brief view of the physical progress of a debauch; and it is needless to point out the effect of all this mischief upon the frame which is subjected to it.

Although we have thus seen that fermented liquors, if taken to excess, become pernicious in their effect, we must not condemn their use, because their abuse is bad. Why should we act and feel as if this bountiful world, brilliant in beauty and overflowing with blessings, was a collection of steel traps and spring guns, set to catch the body and shoot the soul? Is it not much better and wiser to avail ourselves of the many blessings which Providence has placed before us, than to set ourselves to work to detect poison in our drink and God knows what in our meat? It savours of learning, doubtless, to do all this; but cui bono? where is the real utility which it produces? Our grandfathers and their progenitors were well convinced that a good cup of "sherris-sack" comforted the heart, and aided digestion; and why the same opinion should not govern us, I must leave to the dieticians to decide.

The moderate use of wine and of malt liquors is exceedingly grateful to our feelings, and abundantly beneficial to our constitution; but ardent spirits are found to be so pernicious to most constitutions, and especially to those of the inhabitants of crowded towns and cities, that, excepting under peculiar circumstances, it is better to discard them altogether. A glass or two of good wine can never do any harm; neither can a cup of good, genuine, "humming ale." The chemists tell us that the London ale is a horrid and narcotick compound, and so, in truth, by far the largest portion of it is. But there are two or three honest men in the metropolis, who sell genuine Kenner, Nottingham, and Scotch ales, from whom it is very easy to procure it quite pure. If, however, malt liquor does not agree with the stomach, or what is the same thing, is supposed not to agree, it is a very easy matter to substitute wine for it.

THE CHATEAU D'OLIFERNE.

A tradition of the department of the Jura, in France.

On the ridge of a long chain of mountains, which bounds the horizon towards the west, is the celebrated Chateau d'Oliferne; less renowned for the sieges which it underwent in the sixteenth century, than for the fables which the sight of its mouldering walls revives. The approach to it is almost inaccessible; the rocks on which it stands overhang a deep valley; and, looking from its battlements towards the east, the waters of the Ain glitter like a blue girdle fallen into the plain. In the wars of the Conquest, the French, irritated by its long resistance, put to death all the inhabitants, and dismantled the old ramparts,—not leaving a single bastion to be a memorial of the glory of its defenders.

Among the extraordinary incidents in the fabulous chronicles of this place, is one which might advantageously occupy the pen of the romance writer. One day,—and who can describe the dreadful jealousies of which the crime was the result!—three young ladies, rivals in grace and beauty, were doomed by the tyrants of Oliferne to the punishment of Regulus. In a cask lined with sharp nails, they were rolled, from the summit of the rock, into the waters of the Ain; so beautiful, so pure, so like the heaven which they reflected. For a long time the horrible machine floated on the river,—such groans proceeding from it as had never before disturbed the peaceful banks, and which were redoubled whenever the eddies drove it upon the shoals. At length it sunk, and soon after, dashed to pieces by the furious waters, a passage was opened from it for bleeding spectres; who, stopping at the rocks opposite the chateau, seated themselves, and there established their eternal abode. These rocks are Les Aiguilles des trois Dames, which the traveller may still distinguish in the midst of the rude channel. Every night the spectres quit the rock to go and visit their ancient dwelling. Sustained by the air, they gently descend on the banks of the river, lightly bathe their long white robes, mount to the ruins of the old palace, which they rapidly traverse, and then, at sunrise, regain, borne on the morning mists, their silent rocks.

The cruel baron did not remain unpunished. Since his death he has been constantly hunting in the neighbouring mountains. At break of day, when the three ladies retire to rest on their rocks, the lord of Oliferne issues from the great gate of the castle, which his courtiers and his household, followed by a led horse, bloodhounds, greyhounds, pages, and huntsmen; and the echoes resound afar with the bugles of the dreadful band. The bears and the wild-boars are vehemently pursued by this intrepid hunter; and there is not a peasant in the mountain who does not declare that he has witnessed all the prodigies, and who does not retire from the chase when he fancies he hears the howls and barking from the Lord of Oliferne's pack. It is the Freyschütz of the Jura. These old traditions have probably given some repose to the bears of these rocks, and have enabled them to continue their race until the present day; for the mountain of Oliferne is the only mountain of the Jura on which they yet occasionally appear.

ELEPHANT HUNT.

A medical officer, in a recent letter from Ham-bantotti says, I have just returned from beholding a sight, which, even in this country, is of rare occurrence, viz. an elephant hunt, conducted under the orders of government. A minute description (though well worth perusal) would be far too long for a letter; I shall therefore only give you what is usually called a faint idea.

Imagine 2,000 or 3,000 men surrounding a tract of country six or eight miles in circumference, each one armed with different combustibles and moving fires; in the midst suppose 300 elephants, being driven towards the centre by the gradual and regular approach of these fires, till at last they are confined within a circle of about two miles; they are then driven by the same means into a space made by the erection of immense logs of ebony and other strong wood, bound together by cane, and of the shape (in miniature) of the longitudinal section of a funnel, towards which they rush with the greatest fury, amidst the most horrid yells on the approach of fire, of which they stand in the greatest dread. When enclosed they become outrageous, and charge on all sides with great fury, but with out any effect on the strong barricado; they at last gain the narrow path of the enclosure, the extreme end of which is just large enough to admit one elephant, which is immediately prevented breaking out by strong bars laid across. To express their passion, their desperation, when thus confined, is impossible; and still more so, to imagine the facility and admirable contrivance by which they are removed and tamed. Thus it is:—A tame elephant is placed on each side, to whom the wild one is fastened by ropes; he is then allowed to pass out, and immediately on his making the least resistance, the tame ones give him a most tremendous squeeze between their sides, and beat him with their trunks until he submits; they then lead him to a place ready prepared, to which he is strongly fastened, and return to perform the same civility to the next one.

In this way seventy wild elephants were captured for the purpose of government labour. The tame elephants daily take each wild one singly to water and to feed, until they become quite tame and docile. The remaining elephants were shot by the people.

I took possession of a young one, and have got him now tied up near my door; he is quite reconciled, and eats with the greatest confidence out of my hand; he is, however, too expensive to keep long, and I fear I must eventually shoot him. Some idea of the expense may be supposed, when I tell you that in one article alone, milk, his allowance is two gallons per day.

I was at this scene with thirty other officers and their ladies, and we remained in temporary huts for nearly ten days.

From Mr. John Murray's Tour.

GENEVA

Has very little, as a city, to recommend it. It is characterized by much active industry within doors, the savans and mechaniciens being pent up in their closets and ateliers, and very little gaiety pervades the promenades. Some parts of the town are sufficiently picturesque; the overhanging roofs, for which it is remarkable, are, however, too lofty to screen the pedestrian from the rain, especially if accompanied by a high wind, and form no shade from the sun. The pavement of the streets is bad, and their irregularity is a considerable drawback from the internal appearance. The pavement of the inclined plane in the Hotel de Ville, by which we gain the arduous ascent that conducts to the Pass-port office, is a curiosity of its kind, and perhaps unique. The city is tolerably well fenced in with walls within walls, draw and suspension bridges, and gates; while stakes and chains secure from surprise on the part of the lake. The small canton of Geneva, though in the vicinity of the Great Alpine chain and the mountains of the Jura, includes no mountains. The name of the city and canton has been traced by the etymologists to a Celtick origin; Gen, a sally-port or exit, and av, a river, probably because the Rhone here leaves the Leman lake. The eagle on the escutcheon of the city arms indicates its having been an imperial city; and it is believed the key was an adjunct of Pope Martin V., in the year 1418. The motto on the scroll, "Ex tenebris lux," appears to have existed anterior to the light of the Reformation. The number of inhabitants may now be estimated at about 22,000; but it appears, by a census in 1789, to have been 26,148. In this moral city, it is computed that every twelfth birth is illegitimate. The number of people engaged in clock and watch-making and jewellery, may be safely rated at 3,000. In years favourable to these staple manufactures 75,000 ounces of gold are employed, which is almost equally divided between watches and jewellery. The daily supply of silver is about 134 ounces. Pearls form an article of considerable value in the jewellery, and have been rated at no less a sum than 1,200 francs daily. 70,000 watches are annually made, only one-twelfth of which are in silver. More than fifty distinct branches are comprised in the various departments, and each workman, on the average, earns about three shillings a day.

CHARACTER.

CHARACTER OF DR. CHANNING.

We copy the following tribute to the intellectual character of our townsman from the Edinburgh Scotsman, of July 6th. It is encouraging to find, among the sneers and slanders with which allusions in the British journals to our country or any of its distinguished men are generally accompanied, an occasional generous testimonial to the merits of an individual whose genius we have been accustomed to regard with the warmest admiration, and whose worth we are confident, can not be too highly prized.

[Boston Galaxy.]

Dr. Channing is a man whom we venerate "on this side of idolatry." We admire his stupendous intellect, and rejoice to see that it is associated with a purity and loftiness of sentiment, a genuine philanthropy, and a fearless love of truth, which insure its application to wise and noble ends. On all questions connected with the moral nature of man, his destiny and station in the universe, we regard the mind of Dr. Channing as by far the greatest in the world. He is a bold thinker, a severe reasoner, profound in his views, and elevated in his sentiments. His style, which is all nerve, is too condensed for the general reader, but admirably fitted by its austerity and force to be the vehicle of his ideas. We love him for the cheering views he gives us of human nature, and for those consoling anticipations of a brighter and better age, of which his own gifted mind may, we trust, be considered as the precursor. We regard it as a fortunate circumstance that his lot has been cast in a country where the absence of a national establishment removes all inducements to warp his views in the pursuit of religious truth. In England, if his conscience be not stronger than his ambition, he would have run the course of Watson, Horsley, Paley, and Warburton. Instead of taking the Bible and the light of nature for his guides, he would have been tempted by the hope of a mitre to become a grinder of sophisms in defence of an old system, warring in many points with reason—an apologist for dogmas formed in ignorant ages, and which, perhaps, he partly or wholly disbelieved. We do not say that Dr. Channing's views are in all respects sound; but we say that he is travelling in the track that leads to truth, and employing his fine powers as God meant that the human intellect should be employed. Neither do we think that religion is now what it ought to be in America, but we predict that it will ultimately appear there in its highest lustre and purity; and for this simple reason, that she has not an establishment holding out bribes to ambitious men to take a set of opinions to trust themselves, and to argue or clamour down those who call them in question, or seek truth in an honest spirit. We confess that the position of a teacher of theology under an old wealthy Church, if he has any capacity for original thinking, always excites our risibility. He is to "Search the Scriptures," but in the search he must take special care, as he values his emoluments not to discover one single idea which does not exactly square with the notions established as canons of faith, by persons comparatively unenlightened some centuries ago! A Professor of Gymnastics teaching his pupils, with his legs and arms tied, is a perfect image of such an instructor! When we think of Horsley and Warburton, men whose mental vigour was only matched by their arrogance, playing the part of bullies and blusters in defence of a creed extremely different, to say the least of it, from what they would themselves have framed, we turn with fresh delight to Doctor Channing, who is equally great in intellect, superiour in moral temperament, and seeks truth with as much zeal as they sought wealth and power. But mental independence is a grand source of mental strength. There are conceptions in the extracts below which could have emanated, we think, from no other mind in existence but Dr. Channing's, and which would either never have been generated there, or at least never given to the world, had he been fast chained to some old establishment by ambition or avarice. We have little doubt that this gifted man, out of whom, if intellect were divisible, you might cut a whole Bench of Bishops, twice over, is ministering to some congregation for four or five hundred pounds a year. And yet we are told princely revenues are necessary to draw men of talent into the Christian ministry! The Americans may well be proud of producing such a writer; but we doubt if their knowledge is sufficiently advanced to appreciate his merits. In the extracts given, we have greatly exceeded the space we usually devote to such a purpose. This proceeds from no desire to recommend Dr. Channing's Theological opinions; but from our admiration of the discourse as a splendid Essay on Human Nature, and from our belief that very few copies of it are likely to reach Scotland.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1829.

New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

A GREAT AFFAIR. All the anti-masons in the city and county of Albany, and "parts adjacent," yesterday "girded up their loins" and walked forth to terrify the multitude! It was the eleventh of September—the "glorious eleventh," and the third anniversary of the abduction of Morgan and the redemption of hundreds from moral and political damnation. It was a "mighty" occasion, and the mightiest efforts of the antis was necessary to despatch it into eternity with eclat. Thurlow Weed's "central committee" long ago gave orders to have the day observed throughout the anti-masonick dominions; and the deputy managers of particular districts have for months been drumming up their forces for a display on this occasion. Of the success of their vast labours in other places we have heard nothing; of their "interesting" proceedings in this city we shall proceed to tell the reader, who, we have no doubt, is standing upon tip-toe, half devoured by a "whole-hog" sort of curiosity.

The National Observer appeared in the morning, with column rules inverted, and in such a topsy-turvy condition generally, as convinced the wondering world that there was something in embryo, not dreamt of in every one's philosophy. The "committee of arrangements" notified the reader that a procession would be formed at the Connecticut Coffee House, from whence they would march to the United Presbyterian Church, at the corner of Chapel and Fox streets, where Wm. Mayell would read the "declaration" of the Le Roy masons, and Samuel M. Hopkins would deliver an "appropriate" address; after which they would proceed to Daniel Shield's Tavern and eat dinner; all which was to be done "in commemoration of the abduction of Morgan." This was the theory; and notwithstanding the editorial flourish of the would be governor about the "bloody anniversary," the practice proved a little more difficult. After waiting in vain a considerable time in front of the Coffee House, for reinforcements, the "committee of arrangements" and a few hangers-on altogether amounting to twenty-four, "moved" for the church.

"Four and twenty" antis
"All in a row."

And "all in a row" they paraded the streets till they came to the church, as "powerful" and as "dignified" as the same number of boys equipped with wooden swords. On their arrival at the church the doors were locked and a number of the trustees who were there, denied them admittance and informed them that it was not the will of the trustees that the house should be perverted from a christian church into a political forum. But the pious orator and peace-loving "committee of arrangements" did not intend to cut short their ceremonies at this point, and accordingly, in the true spirit of anti-masonick "law and decency," a fellow was despatched into one of the windows, to open a side door which was fastened upon the inside; this being accomplished, in marched 'Squire Hopkins and his posse comitatus, laughing in their sleeves, while the trustees stood at the main door, denying them the use of the church. Having in this truly anti-masonick manner gained possession of the pulpit and pews, the Le Roy "declaration" was read, and the orator commenced his "appropriate" address. He was, however, almost immediately interrupted by a number of the trustees, who walked into the church and demanded of him the authority by which he entered the house; at the same time requesting him and his followers to retire. But the orator was a genuine anti, and was disposed to "go the whole hog;" he therefore told his hearers that he hoped they would not be "disturbed," and the trustees, having done what they conceived, under the circumstances, to be their duty, withdrew from the church, and left the matter, probably, for future adjustment.

Commentary upon such scenes would be useless. It is sufficient to say that none of the trustees are masons, and it can not be supposed that they were influenced by sectarian or unworthy feelings. Leave to use the church had been formally denied by the trustees, and this was known to Mr. Hopkins and the "committee of arrangements." Setting aside their pretensions to christianity their proceedings have been discreditable to them as citizens. Such however is anti-masonry in its best condition. The citizens of Albany have had enough of it. At the last election Sotomon Southwick received about one hundred votes for governor, in this city; now there are left barely the twenty-four "mild" "peace-loving" and "orderly" gentlemen, who were guilty of the acts above alluded to!

Daniel Shields cooked dinner for two hundred and had but twenty-five guests! He sadly mistook the strength of the antis.

A great flourish has recently been made of a great number of names attached to anti-masonick political address in Madison county. Among others was the name of Isaac Shepard, a revolutionary patriot, which last fact was triumphantly attached to his signature to the address. Mr. Shepard has since requested the leaders of anti-masonry in Madison county to strike his name from the list of signers to the address, and in a letter to the editor of an anti-masonick paper in which the address was first published, says "I feel it a duty to myself and the publick, to state how it came there. I was called upon by a stranger, who wished my name as a soldier of the revolution, to which I consented. I did not read the address, nor did I hear it all read at that time. I have since read it, and I cannot consent to lend my name to further the views and the objects of that address. I can never proscribe masons who were brother patriots in the cause of the revolution. By doing this I should disturb the ashes of the immortal Washington, Warren, Montgomery, and many other officers of the revolution who were masons." Mr. Shepard has since signed an address in company with upwards of three hundred electors of the town of Eaton, in Madison county, requesting a meeting of electors, to express their sentiments upon the dangerous principles which are attempted to be established by political and religious anti-masonry.

An extra to the Buffalo Republican, received this morning, says the governor of upper Canada has granted to Mr. William Forsyth permission "to blast off that portion of the Table Rock, which for several years past has threatened destruction to the many visitors who have been daring enough to pass under or upon it," and that "two gentlemen of this town have determined to add something to the effect, by holding out an inducement to the celebrated Sam. Patch, who has several times jumped off the Passiack Falls in New Jersey, and subsequently leapt from the mast-head of a schooner on the Hudson opposite New-York, to give a specimen of his unique skill and daring, at the proposed blasting-off fete at the Falls on the 6th of October next." "The place in contemplation, for Mr. Patch to leap from; is over the eddy, between the two Falls, and can be raised or lowered at the option of the jumping Mr. Patch. The water into which he will fall, is from 50 to 70 feet deep, without an under-tow or local current." Patch is to examine the premises, and if, after having done so, he does not chuse to jump, a staunch schooner is to be sent over the falls on the same day. Should Patch determine to jump we shall not shed many tears for his life if it forsake him in the operation.

THE GRAVE OF ASHMUN. The American Colonization Society at their last annual meeting, ordered a monument to be erected over the grave of Ashmun. This monument has just been finished by Messrs Ritter and son, of New-Haven Connecticut, and bears the following inscription:

On the South side,
ASHMUN,
First Colonial Agent
AT LIBERIA, AFRICA.

On the opposite side,
ASHMUN,
Born at Champlain, N. Y. Ap. 21, 1794,
Landed in Africa, Aug. 8, 1822.
Died at N. H. Aug. 25, 1828.

On the West end,

We are indebted to the politeness of the Argus office for the cut representing the "Siamese Brothers."

VARIETIES

THE SPANISH INVADING EXPEDITION. Capt. Crothers, of the schooner Spatan, at Baltimore, from Havana, informs the editor of the Gazette, that a few days before he sailed, all the transports which had been engaged in conveying the Spanish troops to the Mexican Coast, with the exception of the Bingham, which had been driven into New-Orleans, had returned. Capt. C. conversed with the Captain of the transports, many of whom were Americans, who informed him that the troops had all safely disembarked on the Mexican Coast—one half of the number within the Bar of Tampico, and the rest about six miles below the city, amounting in the whole to 3,300 men. Immediately after the landing of the troops, a body of Mexican Cavalry, to the number of 400, marched down to the shore with the colours of the Republic flying; but upon approaching the encampment, they hoisted the Spanish flag, and joined the invading forces. The Spanish Commander then presented to each soldier a doubloon, and paid the amount of arrears due them by the Mexican Government. Capt. C. also reports that the schooner Hound, formerly of Baltimore, had been chartered by the Spanish authorities, and was to be dispatched to New-Orleans, to transport to Tampico, the crew of the vessel which has put in there. The transports now at Havana had been re-engaged to convey a further supply of troops to the Coast of Mexico.

Weavers' Wages in England. A Carlisle (Eng.) paper estimates that a weaver can earn at the present rate of wages at the utmost five shillings per week, which is less than the necessary expenditure of his family, consisting say of a wife and four children, at the lowest rate which is estimated as follows:—

3 lbs. of bread per day is 21 lbs. at 1½d. per lb.	2	7½
½ stone of oatmeal, at 2s. 6d.	1	3
4 measures of potatoes, at 2½d.	1	2
1 pint of milk per day, 7 pints at 1d.	0	7
½ ounce of tea per day, 1½ ounces, at 4d.	0	7
½ lbs. of sugar,	0	6
Soap per week, 6d. Beer and treacle, 3d.	0	9
Coals and candles, per week,	0	8
Salt, vegetables, water, &c.	0	6
	8	7½

Here is no butcher's meat, no liquors, no butter, nothing for clothing, nothing for incidentals, and not one article of luxury! Here is no more, in fact, than is absolutely necessary to support life; and yet this exceeds the ordinary wages of a weaver, with a wife and four children, by five shillings a week! He is not enabled to procure for himself and family more than half the amount of this very scanty allowance! Less than many a bon vivant consumes in wine, after dinner every day. How true it is that one half the world knows not how the other half lives."

Miss Fanny Wright. It is reported that this oratrix has left in this city her earnings here, amounting to three thousand dollars, to found a school for the propagation of her doctrines. We have not heard who the trustees of her selection are; but though the amount appropriated is probably much exaggerated, we believe there is no doubt that something of the sort is to be done—or at least attempted. We should hardly think, however, that it could come to much. If the trustees or agents are not exactly of her mind the institution will bear a character not altogether consonant with her views;—and if on the contrary, they have received without qualification the doctrine she inculcates,—we take the probability to be, that they will spend the money quietly and say no more about it. [Bost. Galaxy.

Insanity. Dr. Esquirol, the first authority in France upon the subject of insanity, states that in no country is it so frequent as in England, which he attributes to the irregular habits of life; the excesses attending an advanced state of civilization; marriages contracted solely from motives of ambition or interest; anxieties attending speculation; the idleness of riches, and abuse of spirituous liquors. The changes of manners in France within the last year, he says, have been more productive of insanity than all the political turmoils.

DIED,

In Middlebury, Vermont, on the 28th ult. colonel JOHN CHIPMAN, aged 85 years. Colonel Chipman was the first settler in Middlebury—the man who marked the approach of civilization by first felling a tree, in 1767, near the spot where he has spent the greater part of his life. In the revolutionary contest, Mr. Chipman was a lieutenant in the regiment commanded by colonel Seth Warner was engaged in the battles of Hubbardton and Bennington—and subsequently commanded Fort George, which he was compelled to surrender to a superiour force of Tories, Indians and British. During his long life, colonel Chipman has been an active and prominent member in the community—discharging with ability important publick trusts which were repeatedly confided to him, and executing with fidelity the varied and no less important duties of citizen, neighbour and friend. His funeral was attended with masonick honours.

At Schoharie, on the 23d ult. Mr. LEMUEL CUTHBERT, editor of the Schoharie Republican, aged 27 years, after a lingering illness of nearly one year.

In Craftsbury, Vermont, on the 25th ult. Mrs. EUNICE CRAFTS, wife of Hon. Samuel C. Crafts, the present governor of the state of Vermont.

In Shoreham, Vermont, on the 23d ult. Mrs. POLLY DOOLITTLE, aged 48 years, wife of colonel Joel Doolittle, the Jackson candidate for governor of the state of Vermont.

POETRY.

FAME: AN APOLOGUE.

THE THREE BROTHERS.

BY MISS L. E. LANDON.

"The sands of those deserts which lie to the westward of Egypt are encroaching on and narrowing, by a constant and irresistible inroad, the valley of the Nile of Egypt. We see the pyramids gradually diminishing in height, particularly on their western sides; and we read of towns and villages which have been buried in the desert, but which once stood in fertile soils, some of whose minarets were still visible a few years ago, attesting the powers of the invading sand. Advancing, I repeat, to the annihilation of Egypt and all her glories, with the silence, but with the certainty too, of all-devouring time! We have a broad and inextinguishable flood of light breaking in on this death-like gloom."

[Sir Rufane Denkin's Courses, &c. of the Niger.

They dwelt in a valley of sunshine, those Brothers;
Green were the palm-trees that shadowed their dwelling;
Sweet, like low music, the sound of the fountains
That fell from the rocks round their beautiful home;
There the pomegranate blushed like the cheek of the maiden

When she hears in the distance the step of her lover,
And blushes to know it before her young friends.
They dwelt in the valley—their mine was the corn-field
Heavy with gold, and in autumn they gathered
The grapes that hung clustering together like rubies;
Summer was prodigal there of her roses,
And the ringdoves filled every grove with their song.

But those Brothers were weary; for hope like a glory
Lived in each bosom—that hope of the future
Which turns where it kindles the heart to an altar,
And urges to honour and noble achievement:
To this fine spirit our earth owes her greatest;
For the future is purchased by scorning the present,
And life is redeemed from its clay soil by fame.
They leant in the shades of the palm-trees at evening,
When a crimson haze swept down the side of the mountain:
Glorious in power and terrible beauty,
The Spirit that dwelt in the star of their birth
Parted the clouds and stood radiant before them;—
Each felt his destiny hung on that moment;
Each from his hand took futurity's symbol—
One took a sceptre, and one took a sword;
But a little later fell to the share of the youngest,
And his Brothers turned from him and laughed him to scorn.

And the King said, "The earth shall be filled with my glory."

And he built him a temple—each porphyry column
Was the work of a life; and he built him a city—
A hundred gates opened the way to his palace
(Too few for the crowds that there knelt as his slaves,)
And the highest tower saw not the extent of the walls.
The banks of the river were covered with gardens,
And even when sunset was pale in the ocean,
The turrets were shining with taper and lamp,
Which, filled the night-wind, as it passed them with odours.
The angel of death came and summoned the monarch;
But he looked on his city, the fair and the mighty,
And said, "Ye proud temples, I leave ye my fame."

The Conquerer went forth, like the storm over ocean,
His chariot-wheels red with the blood of the vanquished;
Nations grew pale at the sound of his trumpet,
Thousands rose up at the wave of his banners,
And the valleys were white with the bones of the slain.
He stood on a mountain, no foeman was near him,
Heavy and crimson his banner was waving
O'er the plain where his victories were written in blood,
And he welcomed the wound whence his life's tide was flowing;

For death is the seal to the conquerer's fame.

But the youngest went forth with his lute—and the valleys
Were filled with the sweetness that sighed from its strings;
Maidens, whose dark eyes but opened on palaces,
Wept as at twilight they murmured his words.
He sang to the exile the songs of his country,
Till he dreamed for a moment of hope and of home;
He sang to the victor, who loosened his captives;
While the tears of his childhood sprang into his eyes.
He died—and his lute was bequeathed to the cypress,
And his tones to the hearts that loved music and song.

Long ages past, from the dim world of shadows
These Brothers returned to revisit the earth;
They came to revisit the place of their glory,
To hear and rejoice in the sound of their fame.
They looked for the palace—the temple of marble—
The rose-haunted gardens—a desert was there;
The sand, like the sea in its wrath, had swept o'er them,*

* "See in the West, what clouds of sand arise,
Parching the earth, and darkening all the skies!
'Tis he—the giant of the desert, there—
Death on his foot, and in his look despair!
At each fell step—see panting Nature die,
And all deformed beneath the whirlwind lie."

And tradition had even forgotten their names.
The Conqueror stood on the place of his battles,
And his triumph had passed away like a vapour,
And the green grass was waving its growth of wild flowers,
And they, not his banner, gave name to the place.
They past a king's garden, and there sat his daughter,
Singing a sweet song remembered of old,
And the song was caught up, and sent back like an echo,
From a young voice that came from a cottage beside.
Then smiled the Minstrel, "You hear it, my Brothers,
My songs yet are sweet on the lute and the lip."
King, not a vestige remains of your palaces;
Conqueror, forgotten the fame of your battles:
But the Poet yet lives in the sweetness of music—
He appealed to the heart, and that never forgets.

THE WORSHIP OF NATURE.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

"It hath been, as it were especially rendered unto mee and made plaine and legible, to my understanding, that a great worshipp is going on among the thyngs of God."

Graft.

The Ocean looketh up to Heaven,
As 'twere a living thing—
The homage of its waves is given
In ceaseless worshipping.
They kneel upon the sloping sand,
As bends the human knee,—
A beautiful and tireless band,
The priesthood of the sea!
They pour the glittering treasures out,
Which in the deep have birth;
And chant their awful hymns about
The watching hills of Earth.

The green earth sends it nenses up
From every mountain—hills,
From every flower and dewy cu
That greeteth the sunshine.
The mists are lifted from the rills,
Like the white wing of prayer,
They lean above the ancient hills,
As doing homage there.
The forest tops are lowly cast
O'er breezy hill and glen,
As if a prayerful spirit passed
On nature as on men.

The clouds weep o'er the fallen world,
Even as repentant love;
Ere to the blessed brow unfurled
They fade in light above.
The sky is as a temple's arch,
The blue and wavy air
Is glorious with the spirit-march
Of messengers of prayer.
The gentle moon—the kindling sun—
The many stars are given,
As shrines to burn Earth's incense on—
The altar fire of Heaven!

TO A BRIDE.

BY JOHN W. STEBBINS.

Farewell! that seal is set,
In life unbroken;
Thou hast with the heartless stranger met—
With the quivering lip, and eyelid wet,
And blessing spoken—
In the holy scene that haunts me yet.

Farewell! for thou art now
Enshrined forever;
With the bridal chaplet round thy brow,
And thy spirit holier for the vow,
That breaks not ever,
To which thy soul must hopeless bow.

For thee my lonely heart
With passion's sorrow
Will wither as thy guileless steps depart.
And oft the heavy tear will start,
When on the morrow
Thou'rt gone, my life-star as thou art!

Yet is thine image one
That long will linger
In memory's temple, like a melting tone
Of music from a spring bird gone,
Till death's dark finger
Hath written that my hour is run.

My love will to thee cling,
Like thought to morning
Around a vision that hath taken wing
From sleep, or as to flowers of spring,
The bower adorning,
That hath been taken away while blossoming.

Farewell! I keep my sight
When thou art fleeting,
And with a feeling of sad delight,
While darkens around me despair's deep night,
View thee retreating
As if an angel was there in flight.

THE DEAD MAN'S MOAN.

I thot the grave was a sweeter part,
Where ane wud rest in a sounder sleep;
I thot that upon the tender heart
The cauldness wad na lie sae deep.
I used to think when I wot to lie
By the dike side on the mossy brae,
Wi' my een turned on the bonny blue sky,
Where the wee wreathy clouds sae peacefully lay,
When I felt the summer's breath warm on my face,
And o'er me was coming a slumber deep—
That the grave was sic another place,
Where ane wud lie in as sweet a sleep.

But I see nae mair the heaven's gladsome licht,
And nae mair I feel the sweet breath o' the sky;
And black and heavy on my sight
The calm dead air of my dungeon lie;
I forever look on the grave's lonely wa',
Where creeps each earthly and loathsome beast,
And frae which the big draps o' the dead dew fa',
And heavily sink through my wasting breast:
There's nae warm friendly voice to cheer
The darkness and silence sae dismal and drear;
There's nae saft word that comes to speer,
How it is in the lanely house wi' me.

Hark! how aboon my dreary grave,
Weightily splashes the fast fa'ing rain;
Hark! now the sweeping night winds rave,
When stayed in their speed by the big grave stane.
I wish I were up, to straight my banes,
And drive frae my face the cauld dead air;
I wish I were up, that the friendly rains
Micht wash the dark mould frae my tangled hair;
I wish I were up, ance more to drink
The fresh breath o' heaven frae the healthy plain.
An' see the wee stars as they blithsomenly blink,
And hear the sweet voice o' a friend again!

THE NURSERY TALE.

Oh! did you not hear in your nursery,
The tale that the gossips tell,
Of the two young girls that came to drink
At a certain Fairy well?
The words of the Youngest were as sweet
As the smile of her ruby lip,
But the tongue of the Eldest seemed to move
As if venom were on its tip!

At the well a Beggar accosted them,
(A sprite in a mean disguise;)
The Eldest spoke with a scornful brow,
The Youngest with tearful eyes:
Cried the Fairy "Whenever you speak, sweet girl,
Pure gems from your lips shall fall;
"But whenever you utter a word, proud maid,
From your tongue shall a serpent crawl."

And have you not met with these sisters oft,
In the haunts of the old and young?
The first with her pure and unsullied lip?
The last with her serpent tongue?
Yes—the first is GOOD NATURE—diamonds bright
On the darkest theme she throws;
And the last is SLANDER—leaving the slime
Of the snake wherever she goes!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN APPEAL.

We refer our readers (especially the anti-masonick part) to a communication below, signed by forty-two Masons, all but two residing in Eaton. At least ten of the number are Royal Arch Masons—eleven are professors of religion, in good standing. We venture to say that forty men in the town can not be found of better standing in community. Now we would ask—are these men to be believed? or Giddins, Stephen Chapman, & Co.? So far as we know any thing of Masonry, we concur fully with this communication.

[Madison Observer.]

We, the undersigned, have for many years been members of the Masonick Institution, and have witnessed with much regret the many false and slanderous publications which have appeared in the publick journals against the Institution. Masons have remained so long silent, that their silence has been construed into an admission of the charges against them. We do not appear before the publick to defend the principles of the Institution of Masonry; as to us it is of but little consequence whether the Institution is popular or not so. We come before the publick in the defence of our own reputation and characters, as men whose civil and religious rights are in common with the rest of our fellow-citizens. We ask no exclusive privileges, and we wish not to be deprived of those rights guaranteed to us by the Constitution.

Masons are charged with taking upon themselves oaths "to assist a brother whenever they see him in any difficulty, whether he be right or wrong": to "vote for a brother Mason in preference to any other person": to "keep the secrets of a brother Mason, murder and treason not excepted."

We most solemnly affirm, and appeal to Almighty God for the truth of our declaration, that we know of no such obligations in the Institution of Masonry; that the principles of Free Masonry require no duties of its members incompatible with the laws of the land, or contrary to our moral or religious duty to man, our country, or our God.

Masonry has nothing to do with political affairs; we have differed as much in our politics as we have in our religion. In the abduction and probable murder of Wm. Morgan, we had no knowledge, until it was announced in the publick papers.

INTEMPERANCE.

We have seldom seen a more powerful appeal to the understanding and feelings, than is contained in the following extract from an address delivered by the Hon. John Holmes, before the members of Saco (Me.) Lodge.

[Boston Galaxy.]

Temperance is a masonick virtue; and let it be held in everlasting remembrance, that intemperance is a most fatal and destructive vice. The temptations and delusions of this adversary of our peace, the treacherous arts by which it flatters us from the paths of rectitude, and the syren song by which it lures us to its foul embrace, surpass the powers of description. The cursed, fascinating, fatal charm by which it binds the faculties, captivates the heart, and paralyzes the understanding, is matter of the profoundest astonishment. Before the danger is discovered, escape is hopeless, and the willing victim irreparably lost. Floating gently down a smooth and delightful current, towards the brink of tremendous cataracts, he sees no necessity of resisting its force, perceives not its increase, nor reflects that he is approaching the danger. Every moment the power and inclination to resist diminish while the danger is increased. He approaches, perceives the dashing, hears the roaring, and feels the trembling. The current is accelerated, it becomes irresistible, he is swallowed in the vortex and lost forever! Is the charm irresistible? Does the malady admit no cure? Is the calamity inevitable? Can nothing be done by masons to prevent it? Yes. Let them beware that they never countenance or indulge an intemperate brother. Let them administer correction with the hand of friendship. Let the admonition be honest, faithful and seasonable. To provide against possible danger, let them often try the experiment upon themselves, to discover the first symptoms of the contagion.

They will pardon my zeal, for it is in the cause of humanity. I am pleading for the disconsolate mother, the hapless orphan, and the broken-hearted and distracted wife. I come with the tear of disappointed love and the anguish of the wounded heart. I plead in the name and behalf of suffering virtue, neglected and abandoned for revel and riot. I imagine I hear a voice from the dark and dismal mansions of the dead, saying, "O ye sons of dissipation and excess! ye prodigals, who riot and wanton with the gifts of a bounteous Providence! come and behold the companions of your revels, the victims of your folly. See the father's pride and mother's joy, snatched from their embrace and hurried headlong to an untimely tomb. See the flower of youth and beauty shedding its fragrance and displaying its glory; but ere the morning dew has escaped on the breeze, it sickens, withers, dies. Here the object of virtuous affection; there the promise of conjugal bliss; this the hope of his country, and the encouragement and consolation of religion—all poisoned by intemperance, all doomed to a premature and disgraceful death. Look at these and be admonished."

From the Buffalo Journal.

OPINIONS ABROAD.

It will be recollected that a shout ran through the camp of political anti-masonry, a few months since upon the supposed addition to their force of the Cleveland (Ohio) Herald. That paper of Thursday last, contains some remarks upon the subject which really surprise us, for they furnish a far more correct portrait of political anti-masonry, in this state, than we supposed could be sketched by one not upon the spot. The following is extracted from the article in question, and the cut it contains at the hirelings we are certain is too just to be received by them without a frown:

"It was our attention to have reduced the progress of the excitement and its vibrations for the last three or four months, to a sort of summary: but on examining our files, find it impossible from the fact that in Batavia, the place of its birth, in Rochester, the cradle of its infancy, and in Buffalo, Canadaigua, Lewiston and Lockport, the scenes of its first gambols, this promising child has dwindled into a worse than abortion. The original is lost sight of in attempts of the leaders at personal aggrandisement, and its form is hid in the filthy rags of rank invectives, low spleen and calumnious personalities. Things have come to a most detestable pass—the press, which ought and is expected to disseminate truth, can no longer be believed; the opinions of the people are prejudiced by falsehood for mercenary purposes.

"We have looked in vain for articles which might give our readers containing arguments which might enlighten them, or facts which might tend to convince those who doubted. We say in vain, for those papers which call themselves 'anti-masonick' are filled with the abuse of individuals, without any bearing upon the merits of the Order. This is the essence of the excitement in the state of New-York; and it is easily accounted for. A great majority of the anti-masonick presses are established under the influence of men aspiring to office, to attain which they pursue the course which will lead soonest to their object, and having pitched upon anti-masonry they fan it with the darkest surmises and deepest innuendoes to raise a flame sufficient to light the path to office."

We shall probably hear no more anti-masonick paens in honour of the Cleveland Herald, for although it still avows its opposition freemasonry, it will doubtless be speedily denounced as "recreant," for the above portrait, and as no longer issuing from a "free press."

ANTI-ISM IN PENNSYLVANIA.

From the Village Record

With several other communications on various subjects—we have received the following from our old friend Samuel Baldwin, Esq.:

"Please send your demands against me for your Paper up to No. 618, and I will answ. it. Strike my name from your Subscription List. I do not wish to pay for Spurious Paper.

SAMUEL BALDWIN.

Downington, 6th-Mo: 22d, 1829.

To A. & C. MINER."

The old gentleman has been in a state of excitement for several months, as evinced in his first visit to the Record Office, previous to a call of the Anti-Masonick meetings. He wished to know if we would publish extracts from the Anti-Masonick Herald? On being answered that it would depend on the circumstance, whether they were calculated to benefit the publick, and must first be examined, before we could determine; he replied, "Asher, or Friend Miner—I have been at the other Office, and have told Simcoe, that if he declines publishing for us, I shall discontinue his paper." He wished an extract published from a New-York paper which he drew from his pocket, announcing the surrender of the charters (I think.) of certain Masonick Lodges of that State, which was put in type while he remained in town. He also wished to know, whether we would publish the calls of Anti-Masonick Meetings, in Chester County, and was answered in the affirmative; the call and proceedings were offered, and promptly published; not because we took part against Masonry; but because our paper is the Record of the people's will; and no publick proceedings of any meeting on that subject, have been offered, which have not received a ready publication. This statement is here made, because a bitter spirit of persecution is abroad, and because statements have been made, that the Chester County Press has been closed against the Anti-Masons. With respect to this Press, the charge is false, come from what quarter it may.

The writer of this article is neither a Free Mason, nor an Anti-Mason; but he is a FREE MAN; and while he respects the rights of his fellow-men, he will not be made an instrument in the hands of the designing, to denounce a portion of his fellow-citizens—to deprive them of the privileges which he himself enjoys—until they are proved to be unworthy. Nor does he perceive the necessity, in the peaceful and intelligent County of Chester, for an excitement, which shall interfere with social intercourse, and array citizen against citizen—to subserve the interests of men having sinister views. Who has a right in tolerant Pennsylvania, to establish a test, and decree, that all who do not renounce their profession, shall not have the common privileges of other citizens? Those who propose this, take upon themselves great responsibilities.

Will the publick believe, that the resolution offered at the Anti-Masonick meeting at West-Chester, recommending to all Anti-Masons, to withdraw their support from the Village Record and Ind't Journal, was drawn up by the visiting Editor of the Anti-Masonick Herald, and put into the hands of the gentleman who presented it—(which however the good sense of the meeting frowned down.) I say, will the publick believe, that any decent Editor, would have the consummate impudence, to go into a neighbouring county, and propose such a resolution, having no other possible motive, but to rise on the ruins of his competitors? And what interests have those editors in Pennsylvania, that should make them so zealous in the cause? Have they suffered by any outrages committed? Are the rights of any infringed? Let the GUILTY suffer the just punishment for their crimes, and all the good citizens of Pennsylvania will say AMEN:

But let not the designing scatter abroad "firebrands, arrows and death," saying "am I not in sport?"

While A. MINER is interested in the Record Establishment, it will pursue an UPRIGHT, INDEPENDENT COURSE; yielding to the rights and interests of his fellow-citizens, and protecting his own. When this course fails to meet with public approbation, and it is withdrawn, his attention will be devoted to other objects. But the threatening to withdraw a name, when we refuse to submit to the dictation of an individual, never has, and we trust never will, influence our conduct.

THE REPOSITORY.

THE DARDANELLES

Are the four strong castles built on the European and Asiatic coasts of the Hellespont, opposite to each other and commanding that strait, which is about twelve leagues long and called from them the strait of the Dardanelles, so that they are looked upon as the key of Constantinople. Their name is probably derived from their old city of Darbanum. The entrance to the Hellespont is defended by two castles, which are called the new castles, because they were built, (subsequently to the two others called the old castles) in the middle of the 17th century, under Mohammed the 4th, to afford protection to the Turkish fleets against the Venetians. The distance of one from the other is about two miles and a quarter. Four hours sail further to the north lie the old castles, built by Mohammed the 2d, immediately after the conquest of Constantinople, which are now more than 1500 yards apart. Farther on still the channel becomes narrower, and at an hour and a half's sail from the old castles, two promontories appear suddenly about 750 yards distant one from the other, and form that strait rendered famous by Leander's nightly visit to Hero, by Xerxes' bridge and by Solymán's passage upon a bare raft. This is provided with no fortifications. It leads into the sea of Marmora, at the north-eastern end of which lies Constantinople the capitol of the Ottoman Empire, upon another channel, which connects the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora. The late English poet, Lord Byron, in March, 1810, swam from the castle of Sestos, in Europe, to the fort of Abydos, in Asia, in company with Lieut. Ekenhead, an English naval officer, who mentions the feat once or twice in his works with evident satisfaction. The same feat has been repeatedly performed in modern times. The negligent Turks confiding in the celebrity of the castles of the Dardanelles, have taken so little care to keep them in a state of defence, that in 1770 they were completely in ruins, and upon the Asiatic side there was but a single battery standing, and that half filled with rubbish. On the 20th of July of that year, when the squadron of the Russian admiral Elphinstone, consisting of three ships of the line and four frigates, in pursuit of two Turkish ships of the line appeared before the first castles, the Turkish batteries from want of ammunition were obliged to cease firing after one general discharge of their ordnance, and Elphinstone sailed by without receiving more than a single shot. But the other ships not following him, he contented himself with continuing his course, not minding the Turkish batteries and cast anchor in the channel. From hence he returned to his fleet notwithstanding a contrary wind, with drums and trumpets sounding, as much to conceal his own fear, as to deride the weakness of the Ottomans. Warned by this unexpected circumstance, the Port accepted the offer of Baron de Tott, (q. v.) to restore the castles to their former condition, and he rendered them in a short time impregnable. But the Turks were too indolent to preserve them long in this condition, for in 1798, Elton, an Englishman, who was for a considerable time resident in Turkey, in a description of this empire decided that, at that time, a fleet might easily pass the Dardanelles. "These castles (he says) may be beaten down by batteries, erected on shore, or by sea, from situations where the great artillery cannot bear on ships. There are on each side of the water fourteen great guns, which fire granite balls; these guns are of brass, with chambers like mortars, twenty-two English feet long, and twenty-eight inches diameter of the bore. A gentleman who has measured them since I did, says they are only twenty-three inches in diameter; one of us must have made a mistake; they are very near the level of the surface of the water in arched port holes or embrasures with iron doors, which are opened only when they are to be fired; the balls cross the water from side to side as they are a little elevated.

These monstrous cannon are not mounted but lie on the paved floor, with their breech against a wall; they cannot be pointed, and the gunner must wait till the vessel he intends to fire at is opposite the mouth, and they are at least half an hour in loading one of these guns." That this account is accurate there is no doubt, for it is confirmed by Admiral Duckworth, an Englishman, who, on the 19th of February, 1807, with 8 ships of the line and four frigates, with fire ships and gun boats, effected a passage through the Dardanelles without loss, and appeared on the next day before Constantinople, which till then had never seen an enemy's fleet. Their presence was intended to influence the negotiations then in progress, but was of little avail, for the Turks during the course of the discussions, under the direction of the French Ambassador Sebastiani, were zealously employed in fortifying Constantinople, and repairing the castles of the Dardanelles, so that Duckworth, on the 2d of March, could not return without loss, &c. according to his own confession; if he had removed eight days later, his return would have been altogether impossible.

The new castles are much less strong than the old ones, which are generally understood, when the Dardanelles simply are spoken of. The latter are called Chana Kalissi (said to mean pottery castles, from a pottery near them,) or more elegantly Sultanei Kalissi. The new castle on the Asiatic side is called Koum Kale, or castle on the sand, from the character of the shore in that place. In the immediate vicinity of Koum Kale, the ruins of the Troad are, by the common opinion of travellers at the present day, supposed to be found. The castle, on the Asiatic side, is the residence of the Government of the four castles, and at this place there is an ill built but considerable Turkish city called Chana Kalissi. The environs of this town are beautiful, particularly a fine promenade of planetrees, on the banks of the Rhodius, supposed to be one of the nine Homeric rivers which descends from Mount Ida. The old castle on the Asiatic side is poorly defended on the land quarter, and might easily be surprised by a small force disembarked above or below. Large quantities of marble balls, made from the ruins of the city of the Troad, are piled up for use in the courts of the fortress. A ponderous shot of this kind, which struck one of the masts of Admiral Duckworth's ship, was brought home by that officer, and made the pedestal of a table. So firmly persuaded are the Turks that these castles are impregnable, that they believed the Governor was bribed by Admiral Duckworth, and beheaded him accordingly. Commodore Bainbridge, in the American frigate George Washington, passed the Dardanelles under cover of the smoke of a salute in February, 1801. This is the only American ship of war that ever passed this Strait!

From the Boston Gazette.

SELF-TAUGHT MEN.

There is not a more common or vulgar error in New-England, than that which is going about concerning the productions of what are called "self-taught, uneducated men." One would be led to imagine from the ridiculous trumpeting of certain newspapers, that those men had lived half their days in caverns and hovels, far from all human intercourse as well as from books, and that they were compelled to dig their way to paths of light and knowledge, as if learning could not be acquired as well in a ten-footer, as in a college; and as if the pomp and circumstance of one, conferred more honour on the professor, than the rough simplicity of the other. If we would examine into the position, we shall find that the phrase "self-taught," is a complete misnomer. Knowledge is not of necessity driven into a man's head; let him alone, and if he be ambitious, he will find it. The old maxim that, "one may lead a horse to the water, but twenty can not make him drink," is as correctly applied to man as animals. In New-England, where our town schools are open to all, the poor as well as the rich, it must be the fault of the pupil alone if he attain not the first rudiments of learning. Our private schools, and academies, also are prolific sources of knowledge. We have teachers to visit our houses, and we have libraries and atheneums and reading rooms every where attracting our eyes. We have no need of reading "sermons in stones;" we may go to church twice at least in a week and breathe the drowsy influence of a dull essay, and mayhap the eloquent inspiration of some popular preacher.

It was a just remark of one of the best physicians that ever lived in New-England, "that it was of no consequence whether knowledge were acquired in a college or a stable, so long as it were in the mind." What matter if it be there how it came there? If it come at all, it must come unforced, and when attained, can never, until reason loses her seat, be eradicated. We have self-taught orators, self-taught poets, self-taught prose writers, self-taught mechanicks, and as the saying is, self-taught geniuses. They are doubtless all wonderful men, apt scholars, smart fellows, who some time or other may produce an earthquake in the world of letters, in which educated men may be sunk in oblivion, leaving nothing to posterity but their wigs. Your self-taught orator will write an oration in an hour; your poet scribble verses as fast as the evolutions of a spinning wheel, your prose writer, stop the clamour for 'copy' in five minutes, by filling a quire with characters that few can read or fewer understand; your mechanick, build a house out of a single block of wood; and your genius invent a perpetual motion, that will make an eight day clock ashamed to be looked at in the face.

But, cui bono? as the learned say. Are these people entitled to more consideration than the boys at college, who have been whipped into Latin and Greek, cut capers with their tutors, spent half their time in lounging, dissipation, driving gigs, and eating whips and drinking champagne in the metropolis; who indulge a night of wassail, indifferent if they be early enough at college for morning prayers? No, not a whit. They are in no danger of suspension or expulsion. They may read and think for themselves. If they have merit and ambition, they will rise to honour—and no "A. B." or "A. M." can add a laurel to their brows. Hogg, the shepherd, is an example; one day, we find him writing a novel or giving life and verdure to the pages of Blackwood; the next, fattening his flocks. Allan Cunningham is another; he once carried a hod to a stone mason, and afterwards became the head labourer at Chantry's the sculptor; yet the productions of these men have suffered no diminution in raciness, imagination, and beauty. The truth is, that the occupations and pursuits of persons, with reasonable intervals of leisure, have little to do with their writings. Genius is not hereditary. The Colossus of critics, Jeffrey, is by paternal origin a barber; and it is said the old gentlemen used to take his patrons by the nose, at Edinburgh, in a shop not very remote from the garret where the son has been since employed in shaving and puffing authors.

The boy when he first receives a medal at a public school, realizes doubtless the happiest moment of his life. He is flattered by the particular notice of his instructors and guardians, and is perhaps invited to a festival given in honour of the day by the municipal fathers. The man of genius, who for years has been engaged in a counting house or a bank, and who, in the midst of his cares and labours, receives an appointment to deliver a poem before an eminent literary institution, may well be proud of the distinction. Inspired by the task, he will strive hard to ascend the rugged steep of fame—

"For emulation has a thousand sons
Where one but walks abreast."

The bright glow of beauty be mingled from myriads of human faces—and sparkling from innumerable eyes—will encourage him; and the attentive ears of the learned and the wise will accompany him; thousands of hands are raised as he proceeds, and thousands of hearts attend him in his progress. If he do not reach the goal, it must be because he can not; but with the son of genius there is no fear for the event. He rises higher and higher, like an eagle soaring from rock to rock, till at length he gains the summit, and breathes the odour of the everlasting hills. The whole air is balm; and he can not move without treading on flowers. It is a perfect elysium, whereon one would dwell forever.

THE GATHERER.

APHORISMS.

From the new novel of "Deveraux."

It is the excess, and not the nature, of our passions, that is perishable. Like the trees which grew by the tomb of Protesilaus, the passions flourish till they reach a certain height; but, no sooner is that height attained, than they wither away.

The littlest feeling of all is a delight in contemplating the littleness of other people. Nothing is more contemptible than habitual contempt.

Reason is a lamp that sheddeth afar a glorious and general light, but leaveth all that is around it in darkness and in gloom.

We are always clever, with those who imagine we think as they do.

Whenever you cause a laugh, and are praised for your humour, you may be sure that you have said something egregiously silly, or, at best, superlatively ill-natured!

'Tis a pleasure to the littleness of human nature to see great things abused by mimicry:—kings moved by bobkins, and the pomps of the earth personated by Punch.

Emotion, whether of ridicule, anger, or sorrow, is the grandest of levellers. The man who would be always superior, should be always apathetic.

The heart is the most credulous of all fanatics, and its ruling passion the most enduring of all superstitions.

The deadliest foe to love is, not change, nor misfortune, nor jealousy, nor wrath, nor any thing that flows from passion, or emanates from fortune;—the deadliest foe to love is custom.

No man defends another without loving him the better for it.

We never judge of our near kindred with that certainty with which la science du monde enables us to judge of others.

Never tell me of the pang of falsehood to the slandered:—nothing is so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity as the application of a rough truth.

There is nothing in human passion like a good brotherly hatred.

If ever the consciousness of strength is pleasant, it is when we are most weak.

What a prodigy would wisdom be, if it were but blessed with a memory as keen and constant as interest!

Nothing can constitute good breeding that has not good nature for its foundation.

There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world, either to get a good name, or to supply the want of it.

He whom God hath gifted with a love of retirement, possesses, as it were, an extra sense.

Our affections and our pleasures resemble those fabulous trees described by St. Omer: the fruits which they bring forth are no sooner ripened into maturity, than they are transformed into birds and fly away.

CURIOUS ANECDOTE.

A nobleman, in the early part of the reign of Louis XV., having a very vicious horse, which none of the grooms or servants would ride,—several of them having been thrown, and one killed,—asked leave of his majesty to have him turned loose into the menagerie, against one of the largest lions. The king readily consented, and the animal, on a certain day was conducted thither. Soon after the arrival of the horse, the door of the den was drawn up, and the lion, with great state and majesty, marched slowly to the mouth of it, when, seeing his antagonist, he set up a tremendous roar. The horse immediately startled and fell back, his ears were erected, his name was raised, his eyes sparkled, and something like a general convulsion seemed to agitate his whole frame. After the first emotions of fear had subsided, the horse retired to a corner of the menagerie, where, having directed his heels towards the lion, and having reared his head over his left shoulder, he watched with extreme eagerness the motions of his enemy. The lion, who presently quitted the den, sidled about for more than a minute, when, having sufficiently prepared himself for the combat, he made a sudden spring at the horse, which defended itself by striking his adversary a most violent blow on the chest. The lion instantly retreated, groaned, and seemed for several minutes inclined to give up the contest, when, recovering from the painful effects of the blow, he returned to the charge with unabated violence. The mode of preparation for this second attack was the same as the first. He sidled from one side of the menagerie to the other, for a considerable time, seeking a favourable opportunity to seize his prey; during which time the horse still preserved the same posture, and still kept his head erect and turned over his shoulder. The lion at length gave a second spring, with all the strength and velocity he could exercise, when the horse caught him with his hoofs on the under jaw, which he fractured. Having sustained a second and more severe repulse than the former, the lion retreated to his den as well as he was able, apparently in the greatest agony, moaning all the way in a most lamentable manner. The horse was soon obliged to be shot, as no one ever dared to approach the ground where he was kept.

KISSING A WHISKER.

A mistake of rather an awkward description occurred a few evenings since to a couple of youthful lovers, residing not far from Ingatstone. The unfortunate swain, it appears, had incurred the displeasure of his misress's father, who forbade him to enter his house, and laid a strict injunction on his daughter not to "pass the threshold" without leave; this she obeyed to the very letter, but hit upon an expedient to gratify her lover also, by breaking a square of glass in the pantry window, through which many

"A long, long kiss—a kiss of youth and love," had been given. Three times had the square been replaced, and four times had it been broken, when Miss attributing it to the cats, her father concealed himself in the place, in order to watch. About ten o'clock the lover approached, with a "slow and cautious step;" which the master hearing, put his face to the aperture, to ascertain who was coming at that "unhallowed hour," and the swain mistaking it for his "soul's softest treasure," saluted him with the "heart's token." The whiskered face made him start; "by Heavens (thought he) it is not you—it is somebody else; and soon the direful truth flashed upon him, in the shape of the sturdy farmer and an old musket. A parley now ensued; and the mistaken swain agreeing to pay the Glazier's bill, he was allowed to depart.

CRITICISM.

Purity of language, a polished style, or exact criticism in foreign languages—thus I think Greek and Latin may be called, as well as French or Italian—and to spend much time in these, may perhaps serve to set one off in the world, and to give one the reputation of a scholar. But if that be all, methinks it is labouring for an outside; it is at best but a handsome dress of truth or falsehood that one busies one's self about, and makes most of those who lay out their time this way rather as fashionable gentlemen than as wise or useful men. There are so many advantages of speaking one's own language well, and being a master in it, that let a man's calling be what it may, it cannot but be worth our taking some pains in it: but it is by no means to have the first place in our studies; but he that makes good language subservient to a good life and an instrument of virtue, is doubly enabled to do good to others. When I speak against the laying out time and study on criticisms, I mean such as may serve to make us great masters in Pindar and Perseus, Herodotus and Tacitus; and I must always be understood to except all study of languages and critical learning that may aid us in understanding the Scriptures; for they being an eternal foundation of truth, as coming immediately from the fountain of truth, whatever doth help us to understand their true sense, doth well deserve our pains and study.—Locke.

AN IRISH BARGAIN.

The children of Paddy's-land are not less remarkably felicitous than ever for the union of blundering and ingenuity in their intercourse with each other and the rest of the world. A recent and novel incident at Leighlinbridge gives a new testimony to the fact. A maiden resident in that parish—gay and hearty was she, but weary of single blessedness—had the rumour circulated that the lad of her choice could have 10*l.* with her hand. She was comely in person and agreeable in temper—a fortune in herself—as all the country said. A "neighbour's son" was moved with the rumour; he knew Nanny; cottened to her; made his bow and proposals together, and was accepted as her darling. But the lass was, with other good qualities, candid—and hinted, before the Priest was put in requisition, that her fortune had become by 4*l.* the "worse for wear." "Awkward enough," says Pat, "what's to be done?" "Ah"—sighed Nan, laying her dimpled cheek so loving on her swain's—" 'tis a long lane that has no turn; I'll give you my note, love, for the deficiency." "Cushlamachree, that's the cut," replied Pat; and, imprinting a buss upon his Nanny's lips, got the knot fastened that evening.

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN

Start, I beseech you, with a conviction firmly fixed in your mind, that you have no right to live in this world; that, being of a hale body and sound mind, you have no right to any earthly existence without doing work of some sort or other, unless you have ample fortune whereon to live clear of debt; and that, even in that case, you have no right to breed children to be kept by others, or to be exposed to the chance of being so kept. Start with this conviction thoroughly implanted in your mind. To wish to live on the labour of others is, besides the folly of it, to contemplate a fraud at the least, and, under certain circumstances, to meditate oppression and robbery. I suppose you in the middle rank of life. Happiness ought to be your great object, and it is to be found only in independence.—Turn your back on Whitehall and Somerset House; leave the Customs and Excise to the feeble and low-minded; look not for success to favour, to partiality, to friendship, or to what is called interest; write on your heart that you will depend solely on your own merit and your own exertions.—Cobbett.

LATE INSTRUCTION.

Socrates, in his old age, learned to play upon a musical instrument. Cato, aged 80, began to learn Greek; and Plutarch, in his old age, acquired Latin. John Gelida, of Valentia, in Spain, did not begin the study of belles-lettres until he was forty years old. Henry Spelman, having in his youth neglected the sciences, resumed them at the age of fifty, with extraordinary success. Fairfax, after having been the general of the parliamentary army in England, went to Oxford, and took his degrees as Doctor of Laws. Colbert, when minister, and almost 60 years of age, returned to his Latin and his Law, in a situation where the neglect of one, if not both, might have thought excusable; and Mons. Le Tellier, chancellor of France, reverted to the learning of logic, that he might dispute with his grandchildren. Sir John Davies, at the age of 25, produced a poem on "The Immortality of the Soul," and in his 62d year, as Mr. Thomas Campbell facetiously observes, when a judge and a statesman, another on Dancing.

turb this state of corporeal equilibrium, if I may so speak, is calculated to prove injurious to the development of intellect. A boy, therefore, who is fed luxuriously, and whose appetite is pampered, is ill calculated for study; for, independent of the seductive invitations which the pleasures of the table hold out to allure youth from the severity and dryness of elementary studies, the injurious effects of these indulgences on health deprive him of the power of application, and surely we cannot wonder that the inexperience of boyhood, when thus exposed to temptation, should hazard even the blessings of health for the enjoyment of an hour. Such is the result of the gratification of the palate, the most contemptible of human pleasures, on the development of intellect. But it is not luxurious refinement in the quality of the food only which is to be dreaded; much mischief results from over indulgence in respect to quantity; and it has always been a common remark that boys who are gluttons are generally stupid, and to employ a vulgar phrase, remarkably "thick headed."

"Fat paunches have lean pates; and dainty bits
Make rich the ribs, but bankrupt quite the wits."

It is remarkable to see parents indulging this detestible propensity in their children, and supplying the means of gratifying it to excess, in their visits at home from school, as if boys were to be fattened for a Smithfield show. It would indeed be a high exultation to the writer of this essay, if his remarks could induce even a tithe of his readers to impress on the rising generation a contempt for the sensual pleasure of eating—to instil into youth a conviction that the only use of food is to supply the waste of the body and contribute to the support of its strength—and to teach them that nothing is truly desirable which is not calculated to advance intellectual happiness. That such a state of society, however, should ever exist is rather to be desired than expected; for whatever other changes may have taken place within the last century, men in this respect have remained stationary, and the following sentence, written fifty years ago, is applicable to the present moment:—"All assemblies of jollity, and places of publick entertainment, exhibit examples of strength wasted in riot, and beauty withering in irregularity; nor is it easy to enter a house in which a part of the family is not groaning in repentance of past intemperance, and a part admitting disease by negligence, or soliciting it by luxury."

POSTHUMOUS INFLUENCE OF THE WISE AND GOOD.

The relations between man and man cease not with life. The dead leave behind them their example, and the effects of their actions. Their influence still abides with us. Their names and characters dwell in our thoughts and hearts. We live and commune with them in their writings. We enjoy the benefit of their labours. Our institutions have been founded by them. We are surrounded by the works of the dead. Our knowledge and our arts are the fruits of their toil. Our minds have been formed by their instructions. We are most intimately connected with them by a thousand dependencies. Those whom we have loved in life are still objects of our deepest and holiest affections. Their power over us remains. They are with us in our solitary walks; and their voices speak to our hearts in the silence of midnight. Their image is impressed upon our dearest recollections, and our most sacred hopes. They form an essential part of our treasure laid up in heaven. For, above all, we are separated from them but for a little time. We are soon to be united with them. If we follow in the path of those we have loved, we too shall join the innumerable company of the spirits of just men made perfect. Our affections and our hopes are not buried in the dust, to which we commit the poor remains of mortality. The blessed retain their remembrance and their love for us in heaven; and we will cherish our remembrance and our love for them while on earth.

Creatures of imitation and sympathy as we are, we look around us for support and countenance even in our virtues. We recur for them, most securely, to the examples of the dead. There is a degree of insecurity and uncertainty about living worth. The stamp has not yet been upon it, which precludes all change, and seals it up as a just object of admiration for future times. There is no service which a man of commanding intellect can render his fellow-creatures better than that of leaving behind him an unspotted example. If he do not confer upon them this benefit; if he leave a character dark with vices in sight of God, but dazzling qualities in the view of men; it may be all his other services had better have been foreborn, and he had passed inactive and unnoticed through life. It is a dictate of wisdom, therefore as well as feeling, when a man, eminent for his virtues and talents, has been taken away, to collect the riches of his goodness, and add them to the treasury of human improvement. The true christian liveth not for himself, and dieth not for himself: and it is thus, in one respect, that he dieth not for himself.—Norton.

From the Winchester Republican.

IMPUDENCE.

In our intercourse with the world we find two qualities which rival each other in elevating men to fortune and power. One of these is intellect, the other is impudence. By impudence we do not mean that kind of reckless courage which induces a man to continue and deride the customs of society, the laws of God, and the courtesies of men; but we allude to the confidence in one's self, which leads men to attempt the highest paths of honour and eminence, when they know it will require every combination of perseverance to sustain the character at which they aim. The way the world goes, a proper degree of confidence is indispensable to an ambitious man; especially a literary character or politician. Yet we are never more disposed to do a man a service, or to speak well of a writer, than when we know his modesty is equal to his merit. There are so many "loud mouthed" pretenders who either have or would if they could push themselves into notoriety by daring effrontery and vain egotism, that it is now quite a treat to meet a man of genius who appears to be totally ignorant of its possession. It always gratifies us to speak well of a modest man—one whose unpretending character throws a veil over his intellect, which, like that over the features of a woman, adds a zest to, rather than decreases our admiration. However insignificant a man may be, he often wishes to bring himself before the public as one of some importance. Among third rate limbs of the law, (and now-a-days we have some fourth rate,) impudence is better than wisdom; because their sphere of practice is in that meridian where wisdom is not often understood, but frequently counterfeited by impudence.

Although we believe that kind of impudence we have been speaking of is often practised by young lawyers; yet we believe that others, who do not practice the law as a profession, frequently arrogate to themselves more superior knowledge than even lawyers often do. Some men seem to think that to affect knowledge on any subject, is enough to cause great deference to be paid to what they say. Many men who would have us to believe they know a little of every thing, frequently have not intelligence enough to discriminate between knowledge and talent, or between impudence and real genius. Impudence, or an arrogant affectation to knowledge, is not confined to lawyers, physicians, or politicians; but it is discoverable even in others in society, to whom diffidence and modesty would be far more becoming.

These remarks are short, and hastily written; yet they may go to show that there is a difference (whether men see it or not) between impudence and talent; or between real acquired knowledge and an arrogant affectation of it.

THE TRAVELLER.

BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE.

From the Memoirs of General Miller, Second Edition.

In Brazil the slave trade is seen in some of its most revolting aspects; for there the general treatment of negro slaves is barbarous in the extreme. About thirty thousand are annually imported into Rio Janeiro alone, and perhaps an equal number in the other parts of the empire. One of the many abhorrent circumstances attending this nefarious traffick is, that, upon a vessel's arriving near the port, such slaves, as appear to be in an irrecoverable state of disease, are frequently thrown into the sea! This is done merely to evade the payment of the custom-house duty, which is levied upon every slave brought into port. Instances have occurred of their being picked up alive by coasting vessels!

Fourteen or fifteen slave ships, with full cargoes, arrived at Rio Janeiro during the six weeks that Miller remained there. One morning that he happened to breakfast on board a Brazilian frigate, the commander, Captain Sheppard, kindly lent him a boat to visit a slaver of 320 tons, which had come into port the preceding night. The master, supposing him to be in the imperial service, was extremely attentive, and very rapidly answered every inquiry. He said the homeward-bound passage had been tolerably fortunate, only seventy-two deaths having occurred in the cargo; and that, although thirty of the sick were then in an unsaleable plight, the owners might calculate upon sending into the market four hundred sound and well-grown Africans; a number that would yield a handsome profit.

After some further conversation, Miller requested permission to see the 'tween decks, upon which the master accompanied him below, and pointed out the manner of securing his cargo, which was by shackling each negro by one leg to an iron bar running a midships from stem to stern, so as to form a double row, lying feet to feet. The air was so oppressively nauseating, that Miller could not remain below for more than two minutes. There was hardly a slave in the whole number who was free from festering sores, produced by constant friction from lying on the hard and unwashed decks. Some of them were bruised so dreadfully, that it was wonderful that they continued to exist. Their emaciated appearances might have led to the supposition that they had been nearly starved during the passage, did not the varied miseries to which they were subjected, sufficiently account for their desolating forms. A great number of them were now upon deck, and clad in long woollen shirts, in order to be sent to the warehouse on shore. Miller, heartily sick of this disgusting scene, took leave of the master; but, unable to control the indignation he felt, he inveighed with great bitterness against all wretches concerned in so iniquitous a traffick, letting him know at the same time that he was not in the service of the emperor. The master, though at first taken aback by the violence of the general's invectives, soon recovered himself, and retorted in the most insolent terms of defiance, abusing the English for meddling in what he styled the legitimate commerce of Brazil. The state of the vessel was such as cannot be described, and the fetid effluvia, arising from it, offended the senses on approaching her within fifty yards. Although Miller took a warm bath immediately upon getting on shore, the stench of the slave ship haunted his nostrils for many days.

There is a long narrow street in Rio Janeiro exclusively appropriated to the negro stores. It is, in fact, the slave-bazaar. The fronts of the shops are open, and the objects for sale are seated on benches, where, strange to say, they often pass their time in singing. People wishing to become purchasers lounge up and down until they see a subject likely to suit their purpose. Miller one day put on a broad-brimmed straw hat, and walked into several of the stores, as if with a view of making a purchase. The slave venders came forward with eagerness to show off their stock, making their bipeds move about in every way best calculated to display their good points, and in much the same manner that a jokey does in showing off a horse. Those who appeared to be drowsy were made to bite a piece of ginger, or take a pinch of snuff. If these excitements did not prove sufficient to give them an air of briskness, they were wakened up by a pull of the ear, or a slap on the face, which made them look about them. Miller was so inquisitive, and his observations were so unlike those of a bond fide purchaser, that the dealers soon began to suspect he did not intend to be a customer. One of them being in consequence rather pert in his replies, Miller once more allowed his indignation to get the better of his judgment, and he abused the fellow in terms more violent, if possible, than those he had addressed to the master of the slave ship. He had some difficulty to avoid getting into a very serious squabble, as many of the other dealers came out and joined in the yell now raised against him. As he passed along the street, it was like running the gauntlet; for he was saluted by vituperations on all sides, and it was perhaps only by preserving a menacing attitude in his retreat that he prevented something more than a mere war of words. They dwelt with marked emphasis on the officious English, who, instead of attending to their own affairs, would not, they said, allow other people to gain an honest livelihood.

SOUTH AMERICAN MANNERS.

Whether it be the romantick novelty of many places in South America, the salubrity of the climate, the free unrestrained intercourse of the more polished classes, or whether there be some undefinable charm in that state of society which has not passed beyond a certain point of civilization, certain it is that few foreigners have resided for any length of time in Chili, Peru, or in the principal towns of the Pampas, without feeling an ardent desire to revisit them. In this number might be named several European naval officers who have served in the Pacific, and who have expressed these sentiments, although they move in the very highest circles of England and France. Countries which have not reached the utmost pitch of refinement, have their peculiar attractions, as well as the most highly polished nations; but, to the casual resident, the former offers many advantages unattainable in Europe. The virtue of hospitality, exiled by luxury and refinement, exhibits itself in the New World under such noble and endearing forms as would almost tempt the philosopher, as well as the weary traveller, to dread the approach of the factitious civilization that would banish it.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1829.

M. E. Peter Grinnell, of Rhode Island, G. G. Treasurer.

M. E. and Rev. Jonathan Nye, of New-Hampshire, G. G. Chaplain.

M. E. Amos Nourse, of Maine, G. G. Marshall.

A convention of delegates from several masonick bodies in the counties of Madison, Chenango, and Cortland, was held in the village of De Ruyter, on the 7th inst. "for the purpose of taking into consideration the unhappy excitement which now exists against masonry, and to adopt such measures as were deemed most expedient to allay the excitement, and again restore peace and harmony to society." The editor of the Morrisville (Madison) Observer, who is not a mason, attended the convention, and says it was composed of the most respectable citizens, of all political parties, and all denominations of Christians. The convention resolved that "it would be inexpedient to take measures for the surrender of masonick charters, and that we recommend to all masonick bodies the propriety of retaining their charters, with a strict and regular attention on all masonick communications, as the strongest testimonials of their integrity as citizens, and attachment to their inestimable civil and religious privileges."

An address to the people was adopted and signed by all the delegates present, amounting to one hundred and nine. We shall take an early opportunity to lay the whole proceedings before our readers.

Elisha Putnam, as agent for the "managers," has published something which he calls "a statement of facts," intended as an apology for the anti-masonick row, which took place on the 11th inst. He pretends to be unprejudiced, and then puts forth some contemptible stuff about the "miniens of masonry," by way of proof. It is very well known to Mr. Putnam, and to every one else in this city, that masonry had nothing to do with the scenes of the 11th; and that the anti party, notwithstanding it has his consequential personage connected with it, is entirely too impotent to create any fear or jealousy on the part of the masonick fraternity.

The Palmyra Freeman, speaking of the wonderful doings at that place on the 11th, says "Every anti-mason who attended got well paid for his trouble." For "got" read "expects to be," and you will hit the truth. There is an office, or a sugar plum, or something else of the pay kind, continually tickling the imagination of the "patriotick" antis.

The same paper, speaking of the "happiness" of the same class of bipeds on the same "interesting" occasion, says—"nor could they do otherwise than to hail, with unmingled joy, the anniversary of the event," [the abduction of Morgan]. Tolerably candid, by the way, and a little like "letting the cat out of the bag." If there were not a little political consequence in the prospect, to make them "joyful," the antis would care no more for the "abduction of Morgan," than his celestial majesty, the brother of the sun and moon.

Myron Holley, who deserves to be remembered, on the score of certain old matters, preached at Palmyra. Having served an apprenticeship upon the ears of the members of the legislature, he is probably very well qualified to tug those of the multitude. There can be but one opinion respecting his honesty entertained by those who know the history of his "canal policy."

We have received a number of new periodicals, within a week or two; to which we have little more time to devote at present, than will suffice to tell their names.

The Parterre, published at Hartford, Conn. a literary monthly, devoted to original miscellany, of a would-be, and sometimes really, humorous character. It is small and cheap.

The Journal of Health, published semi-monthly at Philadelphia, and conducted by an association of physicians. We recommend it to the publick patronage. The price is one dollar and twenty-five cents a year in advance.

The publication of The Genius of Universal Emancipation has been resumed, at Baltimore, and William L. Garrison, Esq. a spinted writer, associated with Mr. Lundy, in the editorial department. The paper has also been enlarged, and the literary department placed under the superintendence of a lady of education and taste. The terms are three dollars, in advance.

The Pleiades, published weekly, at Charleston, S. C. and devoted to light and miscellaneous literature. The contents are wholly original and well written; but we think the writers are young.

The New-England Galaxy has passed into the hands of Frederick S. Hill, Esq. and been associated with the Boston Mercury, edited by Mr. Kittel.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

Saratoga Springs, Sept. 11, 1829.

We have had a rare exhibition here this day. It was an anti-masonick jubilee; and all the antis, and especially the anti-water-drinkers, came flocking in like sheep without a shepherd—but they soon found shepherds—for here was Southwick, the bell weather, and old Caleb Green, the parson, and that other parson, who, though he may have a strong arm, has a weak head. These were the shepherds of this motley flock. They crowded into the brick church, all eager to hear the great oracle—but daddy Green first got up, and made a genuine anti prayer, as long as an ordinary sermon. He made the sheep believe that orator Southwick had been raised up by God for the divine work of putting down freemasonry; that is, he thanked God very fervently, and they all seemed to ejaculate after him, that he had specially raised up Southwick as the great champion of their cause; as if heaven would smile upon such an unhallowed clan, and such champions as this parson and Southwick, and the Northampton apostate, who, after preaching masonry for years, suddenly deserted it. Green, to give the d—l his due, never was a mason, and has always been opposed to us, but for such apostates as Armstrong, and such daring political adventurers as Southwick, no honest man can have any charity. After Greene had made a fool of himself by announcing Southwick as the chosen of God, and had retired into the back seat, there came forward a smooth faced young man, by the name of Johnson, a printer, who read the Anti-masonick Declaration of Independence, with an air of much modesty, and no little self-complacency. Next came the thunderer, as the antis call him. He began with quoting the scripture, as the devil would on a similar occasion, and then went on with a wild flourish of defiance to his enemies, and the enemies of "the glorious cause." He spoke, I must confess, in thundering style; splashing up and down like a mad bull in a mud-bog, and making the welkin ring with his denunciations, not forgetting the ghost of Morgan, and his dear friend Miller, who seems to be ever uppermost in his thoughts. Mrs. Morgan and her babies were also brought to view, to the great edification, no doubt, of the simpleton herd. In short, if any thing would excite surprise, in these times, it would be the fact, that a thousand human, and ought to be rational beings, could listen three hours to the ravings of this "thundering" dotard. But so it is. Alas, poor human nature! "O flesh, how art thou fishified!" The apostate Armstrong, closed by a hypocritical prayer, and the duped multitude dispersed, wondering at the piety of Greene, and the apostate exulting in the wisdom of Solomon, their crazy leader.

Samuel Miles Hopkins, Esquire, is the very emblem of consistency! With what a smooth face and canting tongue he can inveigh against the secrecy of masonry, while his delicate conscience hops over that of the Phi Beta Kappa without even so much as shuddering at its "wickedness!" We entertain the most profound esteem for the P. B. K. Society, and would not say ought that could be construed into disrespect for its exalted character; but it has secrets, ceremonies, and obligations, as well as masonry; and we confess it puzzles us, to see men crying out against the latter, while they support the former. Those who do this cannot be han-est men; they are mere players with fortune, and not deserving of the respect of the community.

We do not "hope" with our correspondent below, that masons will go to the polls, as masons, upon party grounds. Masonry is not, and will not be, made a party question. Whatever may be the political predilections of one man towards another, they never can be founded upon masonick feelings. The question which now agitates the public mind, is one between virtue and vice; and the friends of the former, whether they be or be not masons, will oppose anti-masonry, as a matter of course.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

Mr. CHILD—I have not taken an active part in the present violent contest between masons and anti-masons. I have stood aloof from the strife, and have considered it as a contest between individuals only. But I find that I have been mistaken. I find that it is a strife between parties, and that it is a contest which every man of principle should oppose, as ruinous to his country and his freedom.

While anti-masonry was managed by such persons as the would-if-he-could-be-governor, SOLOMON SOUTHWICK, I knew, (at least I believed) that every man having common sense, would know that the cause was only a means by which he was to ride into office. But when many men who had been considered talented, but who had hung on the skirts of every party, and had alternately reviled and praised every man—when such men (I say) were joined to it, for a time I feared it might be the means of deceiving many. Their warmth in the cause might be thought to proceed from their love of uprightness, their belief in anti-masonry, and their great desire to have the cause prosper. Ay, it was a desire to see the cause prosper, but so far only as it would promote their own interest. Does any one suppose that the honourable candidate for lieutenant governor, the distinguished Senator, or our worthy Doctor of Laws (who delivered the speech on the 11th inst.) were partisans of anti-masonry because they saw any thing wrong in masonry? No. It was only because they saw "a new way to pay old debts." They thought they saw a new path by which they could attain those offices which it had been their sole aim to reach.

In consideration of this subject, I will ask a few questions which I request any anti-mason to answer.

They say that the institution is a corrupt one, that it has a demoralizing tendency. And this they prove by the confessions of seceders from the masonick lodges.

Why is it that these persons who have been masons till they have become grey, have not till this late day discovered that masonry is a corrupt institution? Did they need the lure of a good office before they could see its corruption?

Again they say that the polls are the only place where the institution can be put down. Can any anti-mason prove that the masons ever voted for a man to fill any office solely on the ground, that he was a mason? If they are determined to go to the polls and put down a harmless institution, masons should come and show that there are more of the latter than the former.

Again—They have the cry of "secret societies"! Hold here, friend Samuel. Are you not a member of a secret society; and not only yourself but many other leaders of the anti-masonick party?—I mean by secret society, the P. B. K.; and where is there a more secret society than that? The anti-masons complain that they fear a dissolution of government, because every thing in masonick societies is done in secrecy. Let Solomon speak of the society P. B. K. which, besides being secret, has none but men of talent. So that, if there is any danger, the greatest will be from the best society. But there is none from that, or any from the former. I hope that if it is necessary masons will come forward and attend the polls; but, I hope it will not be necessary; the excitement will, it must go down. People will see the folly of it, they will see that it is only a hobby, for some ambitious persons to ride into office. Neither Mason nor Anti.

Ms. RECORD—At a time like the present, when the absurd custom of tight lacing is carried to such an extent, it becomes the duty of every one, who would wish to see the ladies satisfied with their waists and not attempting to rectify Nature's mistakes, to make publick for the general good, all accidents which may have occurred from this deleterious practice. Therefore, as one of those friends of reform, I take the liberty of offering you an extract from a letter, received from a gentleman, who witnessed what might have been a serious affair. It took place at a Camp Meeting, in the state of Maryland. Yours, &c. MENTOR.

"One young lady was so zealous as to exhale her whole stock of breath in a violent screech; forgetting, poor soul, that in her worldly vanity, she had that morning laced her corsets till the whalebones met. Now the corsets, like a skillful general, immediately took the advantage; the ground yielded to them, and nothing in the way of struggling could induce them to give it up. So that mademoiselle's, vital spark was on the verge of extinction for want of air; but one of the ministers rendered timely assistance by ripping up the fair penitent's corsets with a carving-knife. They opened with a report like that of a pistol. If the anti-marrying-tightlacing-ladies-society has extended its beneficial influence into your state, it might be advancing the good cause to make some of its members acquainted with the above fact."

Governor Solomon Southwick says the "oration" delivered by him at Saratoga "was written expressly for the occasion!" Wonderful! And being written "expressly for the occasion," the anti-masons have hired him to mount the stump at Westerlo, and "thunder" it over again! As to the great attention which the orator brags of, the Sentinel says, "long before the close, a very considerable part of the audience had cleared out, sick enough of Southwick and political anti-masonry."

The following account of "the great anti-masonick meeting" lately held at Boston, shows how much the matter is worth at home. The anti-masons carry on a "rough and tumble" business in every quarter.

From the New England Galaxy and Boston Mercury.

THE SECOND ANTI-MASONICK MEETING.

Curiosity induced us to attend the meeting at Faneuil Hall on Tuesday evening last, that we might hear with our own ears the arguments produced in favour of getting up an excitement in this commonwealth on the subject of masonry.—and truly the entertainment was as good as a play. When we entered the hall, Mr. Dexter of Michigan was addressing the audience, or at least that part of it who were in the immediate neighbourhood of the platform at the upper end of the apartment. The people lower down, as well as those in the gallery, seemed to be of the locomotive order, and too much given to unrestrained outpouring of their cogitations, to derive great information from the orator. Pressing forward, we with much difficulty came within ear-shot of him, and were amused with his ludicrous description of certain proceedings in inducting a candidate into the Royal Arch Chapter,—though some wag on the floor did maliciously shout out that it was an old story, and somewhat impatiently called for something new. As for Hiram Abiff and Hiram king of Tyre, and Solomon the wise, Mr. D. said that they were generally pretty suitably represented in the lodges,—whereat the multitude gave vent to echinnations long and loud,—and then with patriotic appeals to the audience, he sat down amidst very much such a noise as we should imagine might have been heard when it was grog-time among the builders of Babel after the confusion of tongues. Here the moderator,—Dr. Thompson, of Charlestown,—begged us to remember that we were Bostonians,—that Mr. D. was a stranger among us and entitled to our courtesy,—and that in order to maintain the reputation we had hitherto sustained, we must demean ourselves with that degree of order and decency for which our city had always been noted. This appeal was followed by thunders of applause, intermingled with coarse peals of laughter, and with several rather rude specimens of eloquence from the gallery, such as—"Go it Jerry!" and divers others, the meaning of which we were troubled in spirit to comprehend. A voice now came from the densest part of the crowd, calling upon "Mr. Moderator, Mr. Moderator," who thinking this outcry a device of the enemy, stated that the Rev. Mr. Reid, a seceding mason, had the floor. The voice however persisted in being heard, and gave the name of Loring, as that of the individual who wished to say a few words. The Reverend gentleman attempted to proceed, but it would not do, and the chairman was presently obliged to declare that Col. Loring should be attended to. He began emphatically proclaiming himself a mason, and was proceeding with a violent philippick in opposition to those who had already spoken, when the thread of his discourse was cut short by hootings that baffled all description.

Silence having been obtained for a minute, the chairman informed us that Mr. Greene from Batavia, N. York state, (whence Morgan was kidnapped) wished to address us. The old confusion was renewed, and "amid the peltings of the pitiless storm," for there were but few intermissions of its fury, Mr. G. went on to inform us about Morgan's murder,—but the populace, by the mouth of a fellow with a voice like thunder, swore that on this head they had already been sufficiently enlightened, and that all they cared about knowing in the pre-misses was, whether Morgan was actually seen going over the falls of Niagara in a potash-kettle. Mr. Greene sat down,—and Mr. Reid took his place. "Mr. Reid is a seceding mason," said the moderator—"Pitch him to the d—l then," shrieked one; "It's a foul bird that bewrays his own nest," exclaimed another; "Fair play and no gouging," cried a third; "Your conduct is a disgrace to the city," said a fourth; and so they had it pell-mell, for twenty minutes. Presently an adjournment sine die was called for and seconded. This was the unkindest cut of all,—but the chairman was under the necessity of putting the question, an obsequious was the outcry. It was negatived, and Mr. Reid attempted to proceed. But no—people had made up their minds not to hear him, and hear him they would not,—so Mr. Reid sat down.

After a brief interval, Mr. Dexter read several resolutions,—which implied that the masonick institution was dangerous to the existence of our republic,—that the legislature should be petitioned to pass an act prohibiting the administering of oaths in secret societies,—and that a grand anti-masonic convention should be held at the State House in Boston, some time in December next. It was on the question whether these resolutions should be accepted or not that Mr. Lovell addressed the assembly. He said he was neither a mason or an anti-mason, and was suffered to utter his thoughts unmolested, and listened to by a great portion of the meeting with apparent satisfaction. He said that he doubted whether an association with which such men as George Washington had been willing to unite, could be dangerous to the existence of a free government, and that it might as well be said that religious societies were to be feared for the same reason. The movements of anti-masons, he feared, had too much to do with the proceedings of political demagogues, &c. &c. He concluded his remarks with great approbation, having been the only person permitted to be heard while we were in the hall. Mr. Dexter endeavored to reply to some of the arguments which Mr. Lovell had made use of, but the audience seemed disposed to think that the matter stood well enough as it was, and so after half a dozen fruitless endeavors to lift his voice above the clamorings of the multitude, he stepped down in despair, or disgust. The call for the question was resumed, and the resolutions were passed with a sort of cheerfulness and unanimity which indicated a general delight that the business was drawing to a happy conclusion.

The chairman declared the meeting adjourned, and so the farce ended.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine

TO A BIRD.

SEEN IN AUTUMN.

Even as the flowers thou shalt droop—
 Quiver to earth as faded leaves—
 For thee there is no star of hope—
 No song but that which sorrow weaves.
 Alas! sweet bird even now proclaim
 The sullen winds how short thy stay;
 The wintry blast will chill thy frame,
 And tear thy glorious plumes away.
 Thou poured'st in Spring a lovely song,
 Sweet warbler!—now thy song is done;
 Thou wast the gayest of the throng
 Which into life the spring had won;
 But now thy beauty is despoiled,
 Borne on the autumn's blast away—
 Gone the fresh verdure that beguiled,
 And all that knew thee bright and gay.
 The Summer came—and thou wast still
 A thing of melody and life—
 A thing too fair for time to kill,
 Of song and sweet existence rife;
 But they are gone, and Autumn's breath
 Hath froze the voice in thee impoured,
 And Winter soon will come with death
 And wrap thee with Oblivion's hoard.
 So man in spring-time promise hath
 Of a sweet summer's prime to come;
 But ah! the roses o'er his path
 Lead to a dark and flowerless tomb.
 Autumn comes on—disease and pain;
 And brows are pale and marked with care,
 And Winter comes with death, and men
 Know not the lost ones ever were. VARRO.

TO S. E. M.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

The morning is a blessed one—the distant trees are skaking
 Their tall plumes up against the sky, like warriors awaking;
 The clouds are slowly stealing off—the vapourfolds are with-
 And a path is opening beautiful, for the sun to journey in.
 And gloriously he cometh up—the streams have caught his eye,
 They have given all their robes of mist to the breeze that passeth by,
 They are hurrying from their forest-gaths, where the shade
 is long and cold,
 To dance before his pleasant beam, and flout their robes of gold.
 Dost thou watch this opening glory? Do thy fairy footsteps pass
 Like the wing of some elastick breeze among the stirring grass?
 Does the light wind freshen up thy cheek, and toss the rich, dark curl
 With a playful hand around thy brow—thou loyed and loving girl?
 I have stood beside thee oftentimes, at such an hour as this,
 When nature seemed to image back thy passing loveliness;
 And have knelt in that idolatry, by hearts of passion given
 To woman's shrine of priceless love—the purest out of Heaven!
 Thou hast answered that idolatry with a lip and with an eye
 Uplighted with a love as wild, as passionately high.
 Thou hast given me thy confidence—thou hast given me thy vow,
 And their memory is as sunlight on my spirit's darkness now.
 Thou art far away, fair creature!—do thy thro's come back to me,
 Like the sunny waves that wander from a very distant sea?
 Does the spirit of the dreamy past bend sweetly o'er thy pillow,
 To shape its sleeping visions, as the night-wind shapes the billow?
 God keep thy sun unclouded—thou art very dear to me,
 Even as a green spot "islanded" in a dull and shoreless sea.
 In the spirit's high communion, I greet thee from afar,
 As Nature's untaught worshippers would hail a distant star.

TIME.

—He should know
 That time must conquer; that the loudest blast
 That ever filled renown's obsequious trumpet,
 Fades in the lapse of ages and expires. H. K. White.
 Oh! it is strange how man will dream
 Of coming years, of joy and fame;
 And speak of glory's distant beam
 Encircling with its light his name:
 Or tell of pleasures yet to be,
 Hid in a dim futurity!
 Will while his pleasant hours away
 In useless indolence and ease,
 Still whispering to himself—"A day
 Of brighter joys and hopes than these,
 Upon my life will yet arise,
 And yield what now stern fate denies."
 'Tis wonderful, how oft is shown
 Hope's faithless light's futility;
 The warning record still is thrown
 To darkened eyes, that will not see!
 To ears where adder-deafness dwells,
 In vain's the note Time solemn knells!
 'Tis sad—'tis fearful thus to see
 Age loitering through life's little span,
 And mark the imbecility
 Of God's most perfect creature, man!
 In heedless youth his brightest powers
 Wasting away like summer flowers!
 'Tis worse than sad—for he should know
 Time's fleetest pinion o'er is spread—
 And that the pride, the hope, the woe,
 The joy, which have their influence shed
 Upon his life, and checked its stream,
 Are borne along its course—a dream.
 Ah, he should know, for all things teach
 The moral, startling truth
 The ruined dome—pale floweret—each
 Proclaim departed youth!
 And man should learn from their decay,
 How his own life sands drop away—
 Yes—he should take the lesson home
 By all Creation taught—
 Nor let the daily warning come
 Unmarked by act and thought—
 A little while—how long—alas!
 He knows not—and his time will pass.

"THE WHIP-POOR-WILL."

Above this still and sleeping world
 Of ours, the meditative Night
 Her stary pinions has unfurled,
 And in a wide and shadowed flight,
 From her dark, jewelled throne on high,
 Has flung her star gems to the air;
 And in the deep blue rolling sky,
 Spread out her glorious beauties there.
 The breeze has folded up its wing—
 The weary winds have gone to rest—
 And weeping the willows fling
 Their tresses on the river's breast.
 The songsters of the air have flown,
 To dream the hours of night away,
 And one far voice is heard alone
 To sing a requiem for the day.
 And list—'tis from yon mountain's brow,
 The ever pensive whip-poor-will—
 Her midnight song in music now
 Comes floating o'er the waters still:
 Hushed are the low tones of the flute,
 That erst in sweetness flowed along,
 And all the listening earth is mute,
 As swells that night-bird's lonely song.
 Through all the glaring day, the bird
 Sits musing in the greenwood shades,
 And its clear voice is only heard,
 When twilight in the azure fades:
 'Tis then beside the placid stream,
 That gently winds around a hill,
 I love to sit, and dream,
 And listen to the whip-poor-will.
 How gladly light winged fancy flies,
 To revel in its youthful sky,
 And what dear recollections rise,
 As thus I muse on days gone by;
 I may forget my childhood's friends,
 I may forget my native hill,—
 But not while heaven above me bends,
 The music of the whip-poor-will.

I hear it in the twilight hours.

I hear it in my midnight dreams,
 And when I yield to memory's power,
 An echoed strain of music seems,
 To float around my wandering brain,
 And links together scenes of joy,
 Which, in my musings, once again
 Makes me a happy dreaming boy!

LOVE AND FRIENDSHIP.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

The birds, when winter shades the sky,
 Fly o'er the seas away,
 Where laughing isles in sunshines lie,
 And summer breezes play:
 And thus the friends that flutter near
 While fortune's sun is warm,
 Are startled if a cloud appear,
 And fly before the storm.
 But when from winter's howling plains
 Each other warbler's past,
 The little snow-bird still remains,
 And cherups midst the blast.
 Love, like that bird, when friendship's throng
 With fortune's sun depart,
 Still lingers with its cheerful song,
 And nestless on the heart.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before Constellation Lodge, and the associate Lodges, assembled at Dedham, Massachusetts, to celebrate the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1829.

BY NAHUM CAPEN.

Thence on they pass, where meeting frequent shapes
Of good and evil, cunning phantoms apt
To fire or freeze the breast, with them they join
In dangerous parley; listening oft, and oft,
Gazing with reckless passion, while its garb
The spectre heightens, and its pompous tale
Repents, with some new circumstance to suit,
That early uncture of the hearer's soul

Alcornoide.

Sensible of the responsibility of the station in which I am placed, I cannot but feel a great degree of diffidence in supplying the place which was assigned to my very worthy friend and brother.* His experience, as a man, his knowledge as a mason, and the vigorous and active mind with which he is blessed—all pre-eminently qualify him for a more able and interesting performance of this duty, than you can reasonably expect in one who is young and unaccustomed to the sphere of a public speaker.

It might perhaps be considered presumption in me, and justly so, to attempt any further amplification on the subject before us, so far as the character of the institution, one of whose festivals we this day honour, is involved; since it has already been the province of one, far better qualified, to illustrate the principles, and legitimate objects of the order of freemasonry. But the hallowed office which it is the happy destiny of my revered and eloquent brother to occupy and adorn, has naturally led him to avoid the discussion of some congenial topics, more immediately connected with the secular history of our own times, and with the political or local events which are daily developing themselves around us.

In the fulfilment, therefore, of the peculiar duty assigned to me, the remarks now offered will chiefly relate to those considerations which affect the existing prejudices against freemasons and their influence upon the future prosperity of the community. When selfish and ambitious motives actuated the sovereign rulers of our mother country; when laws were enacted with special reference to the advantage and advancement of privileged nobility and to the wicked oppression of the people; when the consciences of men were chained and denied the influence, properly belonging to their admonitions—our pious forefathers bade an everlasting farewell to their native soil and connexions, and sought a land where they could freely pursue a life of unmolested duty and devotion, agreeably to the dictates of their own sense of their relation to God and to man.

Heaven directed them to the shores of America, and the rock of Plymouth first felt the footsteps of the oppressed pilgrims. They passed through dangers and troubles—multiplied and flourished. The wild savage haunt yielded to the sharpened axe, and the rude wigwags, to neat and domestic villages. Where roved the hunters game, sprang up fruitful vegetation; and where the Indian war whoop was sung and danced, arose school houses and academies. Religion was promulgated, education and free principles advanced, and the happiness of all equally considered and contended for.

But the spirit which drove them from their homes, followed them to their retreat. Assuming an authority to which it could have, in justice, no claim, it prescribed laws, highly destructive to the interest of those on whom they were designed to operate. With christian patience and perseverance, the suffering subjects of the crown, distant from the power which curbed them, remonstrated, and, by every persuasion that either reason or piety could suggest, exhibited the miseries to which they were subjected and the causes that had produced them. But the rights of men were not then to be sustained by justice, much less by argument. What was said by the government, must be enforced by its powers, just or unjust.

* Samuel H. Jente, Esq. was first appointed to deliver the address, but was prevented by business out of the state.

Still retaining those principles, for which they had sacrificed so much, the patriots of the new world awoke from their state of depression, and wading through blood, struck and paralyzed the potent arm of the foe, and procured an acknowledged independence of all foreign power or aid. Then commenced the happy era of this country. Full of wise and virtuous determination; blessed with men whose minds were lowly great, and whose whole aim was the prosperity of their country; the people commenced anew their national career under the most favourable auspices.

Investing power where abuse of its privileges could not pass with impunity, and providing laws that would correct the evils incident to human nature, and secure the equal distribution of justice—the people of the country had flattering evidences that they would realize every reasonable and patriotic hope. Emulated by private considerations of individual competency, domestic enjoyment, and national pride, habits of industry and prudence were cultivated and established; social intercourse promoted, and public good sought out and maintained.

Religion, freed from the shackles of bigotry and superstition, compulsory power and persecution, was left free to exercise its salutary influences for the advancement of virtue and the suppression of vice. Education, divested of its encumbrances and made, of right, the privilege of all, liberalized and expanded the soul and fitted the mind for the intelligent and noble station, which the God of nature originally designed it should fill. Favoured and sustained by such principles and springs of action as these, the country grew and flourished. Cities sprang up and attained a growth with a rapidity hardly credible, and successfully engaged in the great concerns of commerce. States increased and towns multiplied. The ennobling science of agriculture was pursued by the happy yeomanry of the land, and the sublime and rural scenes of nature received the refining aid of art. Where forests frowned in wild barrenness, and the desolate wolf cry was only heard, verdant and flowery fields appeared, loaded with all the fruits and luxuries of nature, brought forward by the industry of man. Here the husband and father, pursuing the business to which he had voluntarily dedicated himself, looked to heaven with a cheerful confidence for its smiles upon his exertions, that he might be able, fully to provide for those dependant upon him. There, “ran to and fro” in playful mood to school, the children of his love, directed by maternal prudence and filling the scene with sounds of innocent prattle, mirth and sport. The songs of the grove, and the bleating of the shepherd's flocks, spoke an universal confidence in the peace and prosperity of the country, and every scene wore an aspect of intelligence, improvement, and content.

Institutions of charity and benevolence, which before had existed under circumstances, restraining in their nature and less favourable to the avowed objects of their humane design, now found a soil, congenial to their character and calculated to give them deep root and rapid growth. The increase of means for doing good to our fellow men, strengthens our disposition to employ them; and where we find most honesty, religion, and morality, we find most happiness and the wisest provisions against the intrusion of evil and its consequences.

Where free inquiry is fully tolerated, and goodness of heart alone is a recommendatory passport in society, institutions, teaching the sacred duties of man, as inculcated in the holy scriptures, will flourish and prosper. It is impossible, in the natural constitution of things, that it should be otherwise. The mind, operated upon by motives of charity and benevolence, naturally seeks to soothe and console the afflicted, and administer to the wants of the destitute.

In such times as those, my brethren, what was wanting to advance the institution of which we are proud to acknowledge our membership? What state or what country, has ever seen or experienced a season so propitious for the good man to do the deeds of charity and spread the kind principles of philanthropy? Where no one looks with an evil eye to the happiness of his neighbour, but studies the means whereby he may best render him service. Where sin is branded with its proper infamy, and where virtue is protected and encouraged. History confirms the truth of the assertion, that in no country has the success of our institution been so eminently realized as in this, and that it makes advancement in every nation, in the same proportion, as they advance in religion and the freedom of opinion.

Happy then are we to be able to boast of advantages like these; advantages so nearly concerning the moral and domestic peace of society, the political interests and religious rights of our country. But hark!—what discordant strains are those borne upon the southern breeze, and echoed from the north, east, and west? What means that dismal cry, disturbing this general harmony of the nation, state, and village? In tones, from howling rage, to whining pity; from the screaming yells of superstition, to the base growl of bigotry, we hear the wo-be-gone name of Morgan—Morgan—Morgan! uttered and re-uttered, echoed and re-echoed through the land. And who is Morgan? Alas! what words can the ingenuity of man seek out, meaning what this name conveys? Meaning not exactly what we would call a man, but a being, that once was, or perhaps is—“a needy, hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch; a living dead man, and with no face, as 'twere, out-facing us!” A being, the texture of whose character breaks at every touch, and stands in eminent need of the mercy of God, and the charity of man.

“But he was murdered! murdered by the masons!” This is a serious charge: a charge made against an institution, dedicated to the care of the All seeing eye of heaven! and moved by the spirit of man, by the love of a brother and the precepts of christianity, it becomes my duty here to consider the charge with candour and plainness of speech.

The very extraordinary circumstances which have, within a few years, disturbed a large portion of a neighbouring state, and are even menacing the peace of our own, as well as other commonwealths, will afford matter of astonishment to succeeding generations, as they do of grief and horror to the enlightened and humane of the present age. The history of the pretensions and sudden disappearance of the individual under consideration, has been too busily and widely circulated to make a recital of its particulars in this place, either desirable or necessary.

As might be expected, the incidents connected with his disappearance, gave rise to suspicions of various and contrary tendencies. Opinions were formed, at war with each other, and continually diverging from points of fact as disputation increased, until at length the advocates of one side of the question, converting surmises into certainties, and drawing from unwarrantable premises the most dangerous deductions, have entered upon a systematic crusade against the masonick institution itself, with the bitterest determination to destroy it, root and branch, from the face of the earth. This is the origin of what is called “the Morgan excitement,” and this the avowed design of those who have transformed a supposed regard for justice into an unhallowed spirit of exterminating vengeance.

That a man, named William Morgan, a member of some masonick society, may have been kidnapped, maltreated, and even murdered, by his associates, is all possible. That he may have voluntarily submitted to be removed into a temporary place of concealment, for purposes connected only with his own private affairs, or plans, is also not only possible, but more than probable; that he is still living and enjoying the fruits of one of the most extensive and deep laid impositions ever practiced upon an intelligent community, is what I cannot undertake to affirm, although, to me, in the gradual unfolding of future events, it would not afford matter of extraordinary astonishment. If the absentee however, has been put to death by masons, as is alleged, and with a view to prevent an exposition of the secrets of the craft, why is not the odium of the deed confined to its fanatical perpetrators, who must have been actuated by an unaccountably diabolical thirst for blood, and misled by motives wholly unauthorized by any principle or doctrine of masonry, and at the same time so grossly ignorant, both of facts and consequences, as to require in those who believe in such murder, the utmost stretch of credulity and unrestrained influence of prejudice and passion! For it is notorious to the world, that the book professedly put forth by Morgan, is but a newly-vamped republication of an old English pamphlet, printed in the infancy of our forefathers, purporting to be a complete exposition of the whole masonick system, both as regarded theory and practice. Of the existence of such a work, and of the analogy between that and the proposed treatise of Morgan, the assassins, if any there were, it cannot be imagined were at all uninformed, however stupid we may suppose them in other respects.

What then in this view of the case, could sufficiently prompt them to the commission of an act so atrocious in itself, so perilous to themselves, and so likely to prove disastrous to any cause to which they felt an attachment.

Men, governed by that ardent love for an institution which, it would fain be made to appear, inspired the slayers of Morgan, do not ordinarily take such methods to manifest their affection. The footpad, in his own estimation, has an incitement in depriving his victim of life. The duellist, who seeks the destruction of an adversary, conceives himself to have suffered a sufficient provocation. The warrior, who marches to the field of battle, to deal wounds and death on the foe, fortifies his conscience with the persuasion that it is for his country, his children, the conservation of his altar and his hearth. The bigot, as he piles high the fagot for the sacrifice, or wrenches asunder the writhing limbs of the agonized and expiring heretic, justifies himself with the consoling reflection that he is conferring obligations upon heaven itself: but can we conceive for a moment, in this enlightened era, that such a degree of fanaticism should arise in the mind, not only of one human being, but in that of several at once, as to induce them for an object so comparatively trifling, to violate their own vows, to set at defiance the laws of the land, to incur the hazard of becoming vagabonds in the earth, of expiating their guilt upon the scaffold, of abandoning all that is valuable in life, fortune, liberty, and reputation, and of entailing upon their families, unspeakable wretchedness, shame, and disgrace!

That the abduction of the person in question, is an occurrence profoundly to be deplored, no freemason surely will deny; that it was attended by circumstances infamous in themselves, whether proceeding from the collusion of Morgan, or from the villainy of his kidnappers, we are also ready to grant. And should he have fallen a sacrifice to the misguided vengeance of a few fanatics, no body of citizens would more zealously aid in bringing the culprits to justice, than the society of freemasons.

To follow the progress of this excitement in detail, through the last two or three years, would be a task requiring scarcely a less period of time. At first it was regarded generally, with how much justice is best known to those who gathered its fruits, as a mere device, for operating upon the credulity of those dupes, who chose to purchase, at the most extravagant and unheard of rates, pamphlets and other petty publications not actually worth a groat. A host of desperate and unprincipled adventurers had conspired, it was fully believed, to retrieve their pecuniary embarrassments by the most iniquitous means. Curiosity, which is never in too deep a slumber, was awakened into the fiercest activity. The alarm, sounded in the western region of New-York, was borne on the cold vapours of the lakes to the cities on the sea-side; from the river to the ends of the earth; and was feebly echoed by a few discontented spirits, in various quarters.

The excitement was resolved on. Morgan's abduction and supposed murder furnished admirable groundwork upon which the grand battering rams against the fabric of masonry were to be planted. Presses were put in requisition, which discharged their volleys of newspapers, handbills, and circulars, with wonderful rapidity and adroitness, and the coffers which whilom were exceedingly hungry, began to be filled with marvellous replenishment. Town, county, and state conventions were got up in rapid succession, and disappointed office seekers, and starving politicians rode upon the whirlwind, directing the baleful contagion. Time-serving parasites and canting hypocrites, hitherto sunk in hopeless obscurity, crawling forth from their concealment, flocked to the standard of anarchy and joined in the general uproar, which has since been echoed from the dungeon walls of the holy inquisition in Portugal and Spain, proclaiming "Death to Freemasonry!"

The family fireside was invaded, wives were incited to protest against their husbands, children to disobey their fathers, and maids to discard the objects of their love. Respect for character was prostrated, social intercourse suspended or destroyed, and disruptions occasioned, that time itself may never heal. The halls of legislation were beset; petitions and memorials, containing the foulest misrepresentations, expressed in menacing and inflammatory language, were poured in upon the astonished lawgivers, incessantly. The temples of justice were marked out for attack, and in several instances, one even having occurred lately in our vicinity, the jury boxes have been subjected to the fiery ordeal of anti-masonry, and the name of every man discarded therefrom, who chanced to be tainted with the original sin of freemasonry, being denounced as no longer entitled to the common rights and privileges which the constitution of our country guarantees to all men, living under its protection.

Not content, however, with disturbing and dividing the family circle—not satisfied with imbuing the business of legislation with the distracting poison of misrule—not even disposed to stay their sweeping career, after having confounded the objects of justice, and perverted the regular proceedings of judicial tribunals, the altar is finally assailed! Pastors, whose flocks had followed them for years with confidence and affection, are threatened expulsion unless they renounce the principles of, and all connexion with masonry! Some, even, with the sword of these miscreants hanging over their heads, have been driven to comply! they have looked with fearful eye upon their helpless progeny, and, rather than see them starve, consented to the infamous alternative! Ay, I repeat it, an infamous alternative! Thanks to the eternal God! whose cause these sacred teachers pretend to espouse, their number is but small.

More fully impressed with their duty to God and man, more fixed in principle, and more just to themselves, there are those with whom these menaces avail nothing. They resist the torrent, and spurn the presumptuous foam, which dashes with unavailing fury against the rock that towers above it. Though at the expense of home, the means of subsistence, and the comforts of life; the tears of a bosom companion, the suffering cries of infants; their determination, faithfully to serve their Lord and Master, is unbending, unmoved.

Influenced by the example of their pastors, and by the bitterest recantations from abroad, others have, from an imaginary impulse of principle, violated their vows, and turned traitors to the institution they once joined, loved, and aided to sustain. Still smarting under the reproving lash of expulsion another class, old in sin, and strangers to morality and religion, totally disregarding the laws of conscience and of heaven, rushes forward with the ghastly smiles of malicious intent, at the prospect of destruction and revenge. Though denounced as unworthy of any participation in a more righteous cause, they are hailed and received into the ranks of anarchy, with a convulsive laugh of joyful madness. Being steered against the stings of conscience, and defying the power of heaven to stay their course, they lead the unrighteous band to action.

With such leaders, what diabolical expedient will they not resort to! With such leaders, under the frown of heaven, what can they effect!

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

AERONAUTICKS.

The idea of inventing a machine, which should enable us to rise in the air, appears to have occupied the human mind even in ancient times, but was never realized till the last century. Henry Cavendish, having discovered, about 1766, the great levity of inflammable air or hydrogen gas, Dr Black, of Edinburgh, was led to the idea that a thin bladder, filled with this gas, must ascend into the air. Cavallo made the experiments in 1782, and found that a bladder was to heavy, and paper not air tight. Soap bubbles, on the contrary, which he filled with inflammable air, rose to the ceiling of the room, where they burst. In the same year, the brothers Stephen and Joseph Montgolfier constructed a machine which ascended by its own power. In Nov. 1782, the elder Montgolfier succeeded, at Avignon, in causing a large bag of fine silk, in the shape of a parallelopiped, and containing 40 cubick feet, to mount rapidly upwards to the ceiling of a chamber, and afterwards, in a garden, to the height of 36 feet, by heating it in the inside with burning paper. The two brothers soon afterwards repeated the experiment at Annonay, where the parallelopiped ascended in the open air 70 feet. A larger machine, containing 650 cubick feet, rose with equal success. They now resolved to make the experiment on a large scale, and prepared a machine of linen, lined with paper, which was 117 feet in circumference, weighed 430 pounds, and carried more than 400 pounds of ballast. This they sent up, June 5, 1783, at Annonay. It rose in ten minutes to a height of 6000 feet, and fell 7668 feet from the place of ascension. The method used to cause it to ascend was, to kindle a straw fire under the aperture of the machine, in which they threw, from time to time, chopped wool. But, though the desired effect was produced, they had no clear nor correct idea of the cause. They did not attribute the ascension of the vessel to the rarefaction of the air enclosed in it by the operation of the heat, but to a peculiar gas, which they supposed to be developed by the burning of the straw and wool. The error of this opinion was not discovered till a later period. These experiments roused the attention of all the philosophers of Paris. It occurred to some of them, that the same effect might be produced by inflammable air. M. Charles, professor of natural philosophy, filled a ball of lute-string, 12 feet in diameter, and coated with a varnish of gum-elastick, with such gas. It weighed 25 pounds, rose 3123 feet in two minutes, disappeared in the clouds, and descended to the earth, after three quarters of an hour, at the village of Gonesse, about 15 miles from Paris. Thus we see two original kinds of balloons; those filled with heated air, and those filled with inflammable air. Meantime, Montgolfier had gone to Paris, and found an assistant in Pilatre de Rozier, the superintendent of the royal museum. They completed, together, in Oct. 1783, a new machine, 74 feet in height and 48 in breadth, in which Rozier ventured for the first time to ascend, though only 50 feet. The balloon was from caution fastened by cords, and soon drawn down. Eventually, the machine, being suffered to move freely, took an oblique course, and at length sunk down gradually about 100 feet from its starting place. By this the world was convinced that a balloon might, with proper management, carry a man through the air; and the first aerial expedition was determined on. Nov. 21, 1783, Pilatre de Rozier and the marquis d'Arlandes ascended from the castle la Muette, in the presence of an innumerable multitude, with a machine containing 6000 cubick feet. The balloon, after having attained a considerable height, came down, in 25 minutes, about 9000 yards from la Muette. But the daring aeronauts had been exposed to considerable danger. The balloon was agitated very violently several times; the fire had burnt holes in it; the place on which they stood was injured, and some cords broken. They perceived that it was necessary to descend without delay; but when they were on the surface of the earth, new difficulties presented themselves. The weak coal fire no longer supported the linen balloon, the whole of which fell into the flame. Rozier, who had not yet succeeded in descending, just escaped being burnt. M. Charles, who had joined with M. Robert, soon after informed the public that they would ascend in a balloon filled with inflammable air. To defray the necessary expense of 10,000 livres, he opened a subscription. The balloon was spherical, 26 feet in diameter, and consisted of silk coated with a varnish of gum-elastick. The car for the aeronauts was attached to several cords, which were fastened to a net, drawn over the upper part of the balloon. A valve was constructed above, which could be opened from the car, by means of cords, and shut by a spring. This served to afford an outlet to the inflammable air, if they wished to descend, or found it necessary to diminish it. The filling lasted several days; and, Dec. 1, the voyage was commenced from the gardens of the Tuileries. The balloon quickly rose to a height of 1800 feet, and disappeared from the eyes of the spectators. The aeronauts diligently observed the barometer, which never stood at less than 26°, threw out gradually the ballast they had taken in to keep the balloon steady, and descended safely at Nesle. But as soon as Robert stepped out, and it was thus lightened of 130 pounds, it rose again with great rapidity about 9000 feet. It expanded itself with such force, that it must have been torn to pieces, had not Charles, with much presence of mind, opened the valve to accommodate the quantity of gas to the rarity of the surrounding atmosphere. After the lapse of half an hour, the balloon sunk down on a plain, about three miles from the place of its second ascent. These successful aerial voyages were soon followed by others. Blanchard had already ascended several times, when he determined to cross the channel between England and France, which is about 23 miles wide, in a balloon filled with inflammable air. He succeeded in this bold attempt, Jan. 7, 1785, accompanied by an American gentleman, Dr. Jeffries. About one o'clock, they left the English coast, and at half past two, were on the French. Pilatre de Rozier, mentioned before as the first aeronaut, attempted, June 14, 1785, in company with Mr. Romain, to pass from the French to the English side; but the attempt was unsuccessful, and the adventurers lost their lives. M. de Rozier had on this occasion united the two kinds of balloons; under one, filled with inflammable air, which did not alone possess sufficient elevating power, was a second, filled by means of a coal fire under it. Rozier had chosen this combination, hoping to unite the advantages of both kinds. By means of the lower balloon, he intended to rise and sink at pleasure, which is not possible with inflammable air; for a balloon filled with this, when once sunk to the earth, can not rise again with the same weight, without being filled anew; while, on the contrary, by increasing or diminishing the fire under a balloon filled with heated air, it can be made to rise and fall alternately. But this experiment caused the death of the projectors. Probably the coals, which were only in a glowing state near the surface of the ground, were suddenly kindled to a light flame as the balloon rose, and set it on fire. The whole machine was soon in flames, and the two aeronauts were precipitated from on high. The condition of their mangled bodies confirms the conjecture that they were killed by the explosion of the gas. This unhappy accident did not deter others; on the contrary, the experiments were by degrees repeated in others countries. However important this invention may be, it has as yet led to no considerable results. Its use has hitherto been confined to observations in the upper regions of the atmosphere. But should we ever learn to guide the balloon at will, it might, perhaps, be employed for purposes of which we now have hardly an idea; possibly the plan of professor Robertson might be accomplished by the construction of a gigantic balloon, which would enable us to perform an aerial circumnavigation of the earth. During the French revolution, an aerostatic institution was founded at Meudon, not far from Paris, for the education of a corps of aeronauts, with the view of introducing balloons into armies as a means of reconnoitring the enemy. But this use of balloons was soon laid aside, for, like every other, it must be attended with great uncertainty, as long as the machine has to obey the wind. Among the French, Blanchard and Garnerin have undertaken the greatest number of aerial voyages; among the Germans, professor Jungius, in Berlin, in 1805 and 1806, made the first. Since that time, professor Reichard and his wife have become known by their aerial excursions. Even in Constantinople, such a voyage was performed, at the wish and expense of the sultan, by two Englishmen, Barly and Devigne. Blanchard has rendered an essential service to aeronauts by the invention of the parachute, which they can use, in case of necessity, to let themselves down without danger. Many attempts have been made to regulate the balloons, by means of oars, wings, &c., but hitherto with little success.

THE REPOSITORY.

NUPTIALS OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

At Susa, Alexander collected all the nobles of the empire, and celebrated the most magnificent nuptials recorded in history. He married Barcine, or Stateira, the daughter of the late king, and thus, in the eyes of his Persian subjects, confirmed his title to the throne. His father, Phillip, was a polygamist in practice, although it would be very difficult to prove that the Macedonians in general were allowed a plurality of wives; but Alexander was now the King of Kings, and is more likely to have been guided by Persian than Greek opinions upon the subject. Eighty of his principal officers followed his example, and were united to the daughters of the chief nobility of Persia.

The marriages, in compliment to the brides, were celebrated after the Persian fashion, and during the vernal equinox. For at no other period, by the ancient laws of Persia, could nuptials be legally celebrated. Such an institution is redolent of the poetry and freshness of the new world, and of an attention to the voice of nature, and the analogies of physical life. The young couple would marry in time to sow their field, to reap the harvest, and gather their stores, before the season of cold and scarcity overtook them. It is difficult to say how far this custom prevailed among primitive nations, but it can scarcely be doubted that we still retain lingering traces of it in the harmless amusements of St. Valentine's day.

On the wedding-day Alexander feasted the eighty bridegrooms in a magnificent hall prepared for the purpose. Eighty separate couches were placed for the guests, and on each a magnificent wedding-robe for every individual. At the conclusion of the banquet, and while the wine and the dessert were on the table, and eighty brides were introduced; Alexander first rose, received the princess, took her by the hand, kissed her, and placed her on the couch close to himself. This example was followed by all, till every lady was seated by her betrothed. This formed the whole of the Persian ceremony—the salute being regarded as the seal of approbation. The Macedonian form was still more simple and symbolical. The bridegroom, dividing a small loaf with his sword, presented one-half to his bride, wine was then poured as a libation on both portions, and the contracting parties tasted of the bread. Cake and wine, as nuptial refreshment, may thus claim a venerable antiquity. In due time the bridegrooms conducted their respective brides to chambers prepared for them within the precincts of the royal palace.

The festivities continued for five days, and all the amusements of the age were put in requisition for the entertainment of the company. Athenæus has quoted from Charas, a list of the chief performers, which I transcribe more for the sake of the performances and of the states where these lighter arts were brought to the greatest perfection, than of the names, which are now unmeaning sounds. Scymnes from Tarentum, Philistides from Syracuse, and Heracleitus from Mytilene, were the greatest jugglers, or as the Greek word intimates, the wonder workers of the day. After this, Alexis, the Tarentine, displayed his excellence as a rhapsodist, or repeater, to appropriate music, of the soul-stirring poetry of Homer. Cratinus the Methymnean, Aristonymus the Athenian, Athenodorus the Teian, played on the harp—without being accompanied by the voice. On the contrary, Heracleitus the Tarentine, and Aristocrates the Theban, accompanied their harps with lyric songs. The performers on wind instruments were divided on a similar, although it could not be on the same principle. Dionysius from Heracleia, and Hyperbolus from Cyzicum, sang to the flute, or some such instrument; while Timotheus, Phrynichus, Scaphisius, Diophantus, and Evius, the Chalcidian, first performed the Pythian overture, and then, accompanied by chorusses, displayed the full power of wind instruments in masterly hands. There was also a peculiar class called eulogists of Bacchus; these acquitted themselves so well on this occasion, applying to Alexander those praises which in their extemporaneous effusions had hitherto been confined to the god, that they acquired the name of Eulogists of Alexander. Nor did their reward fail them. The stage, of course, was not without its representatives:—Thessalus, Athenodorus, Aristocritus, in tragedy—Lycan, Phormion, and Ariston, in comedy—exerted their utmost skill, and contended for the prize of superior excellence. Phasimelus, the dancer was also present.

It is yet undecided whether the Persians admitted their matrons to their public banquets and private parties;—but if we can believe the positive testimony of Herodotus, such was the case; and the summons of Vashti to the annual festival, and the admission of Haman to the queen's table, are facts which support the affirmation of that historian. The doubts upon the subject appear to have arisen from confounding the manners of Assyrians, Medes, and Parthians, with those of the more Scythian tribes of Persia. We read in Xenophon that the Persian women were so well made and beautiful, that their attractions might easily have seduced the affections of the Ten Thousand, and have caused them, like the lotus-eating companions of Ulysses, to forget their native land. Some little hints as to the mode in which their beauty was enhanced and their persons decorated, may be expected in the Life of Alexander, who, victorious over their fathers and brothers, yet submitted to their charms.

The Persian ladies wore the tiara or turban richly adorned with jewels. They wore their hair long, and both plaited and curled it; nor, if the natural failed, did they scruple to use false locks. They pencilled the eyebrows, and tinged the eyelid, with a dye that was supposed to add peculiar brilliancy to the eyes. They were fond of perfumes, and their delightful ottar was the principal favourite. Their tunick and drawers were of fine linen, the robe or gown of silk—the train of this was long, and on state occasions required a supporter. Round the waist they wore a broad zone or cincture, flounced on both edges, and embroidered and jewelled in the centre. They also wore stocking and gloves, but history has not recorded their materials. They used no sandals; a light and ornamented shoe was worn in the house; and for walking they had a kind of coarse half boot. They used shawls and wrappers for the person, and veils for the head; the veil was large and square, and when thrown over the head descended low on all sides. They were fond of glowing colours, especially of purple, scarlet, and light-blue dresses. Their favourite ornaments were pearls; they wreathed these in their hair, wore them as necklaces, ear-drops, armlets, bracelets, anklets, and worked them into conspicuous parts of their dresses. Of the precious stones they preferred emeralds, rubies, and turquoises, which were set in gold and worn like the pearls.

Alexander did not limit his liberality to the wedding festivities, but presented every bride with a handsome marriage portion. He also ordered the names of all the soldiers who had married Asiatick wives to be registered; their number exceeded 10,000; and each received a handsome present, under the name of marriage gift.

THREE ANIMALS NOT IN THE ARK!

The citizens of Florence having expelled the Medici in 1529, and manifested in intention of re-establishing their ancient republican constitution, were attacked and besieged with great vigour by the troops of Charles V., under the orders of the Prince of Orange. An extraordinary degree of political fanaticism animated the spirits of the besieged, and the party who were in favour of the old constitution successfully practised a variety of devices, for the purpose of inducing the multitude to submit patiently to the hardships of a strict and harassing blockade. One of their instruments was Brother Benedict, a monk of Tojano, who mixed up so inveterate a hatred of the house of Medici with his religious enthusiasm, that he not only disgraced his pulpit by the most extravagant displays, but on several occasions actually drove his audience into fits of laughter. Amongst other expedients, he descanted for several successive days on Noah's ark, and each day enclosed certain animals within it. When his menagerie was completed, he courteously bade his hearers attend him again the next morning, as it was then his intention to close the ark. On the appointed morrow, therefore, the church was crammed every nook and corner. Brother Benedict had taken care to make the sacristan his friend, and began his operations by addressing a sermon to the animals confined in the ark. This being concluded, he commanded the servitor to make the minutest search, and report whether any animals were wanting? The search was speedily performed, and the sacristan returned with intelligence that three were deficient, and waiting at the gates; the one being of huge, and the other two of diminutive dimensions. His description of these animals was so bitterly natural and apposite, that the dullest person present could not fail of applying the portrait he had drawn to Clement VII., Cardinal Hyppolitus, and Alessandro de Medici. The sacristan then called out to Brother Benedict, that the three beasts insisted upon being admitted into the ark; whereupon the monk roared out to him, in a voice of thunder, "For Heaven's sake, be quick and bolt the door, for the Lord wills that no mules should set foot within the ark." Roars of laughter followed upon this exclamation, and such a scene of confusion ensued, that the monk was obliged to decamp without finishing his discourse. The gist of the sarcasm consisted in its reference to the illegitimate origin of those three scions of Medicean profligacy; and though its direct effect was to inflame the hostility of the Florentines, its ulterior result was to bring down bitter retribution on the preacher's head. For, upon the capitulation of the Tuscan capital, which was consequently obliged to admit Alexander as its unconditional master, Clement did not forget the public contumely which Brother Benedict had put upon himself and his relatives. He ordered him to be brought away by main force from the monastery of St. Maria Novella, and carried to Rome; where he was thrown into a loathsome dungeon under the Castle of St. Angelo, and a diminution being daily made in the quantity of his victuals, he perished under the horrors of lingering starvation!

Every fool knows how often he has been a rogue, but every rogue does not know how often he has been a fool.

THE DEFORMED GIRL.

Memory—mysterious memory!—holy and blessed as a dream of heaven to the pure in spirit—haunter and accuser of the guilty!—Unescapable presence! lingering through every vicissitude, and calling us back to the past—back to the dim and sepulchred images of departed time—opening anew the deep fountains of early passion—the loves and sympathies of boyhood—the thrilling aspirations of after years! While the present is dark with anguish, and the future gladdened by no sun-how of anticipation, I invoke thy spell of power. Unroll before me the chart of vanished hours; let me gaze once more on their sunlight and shadow!

I am an old man. The friends of my youth are gone from me. Some have perished on the great deep; others on the battle-field, afar off in a land of strangers; and many—very many, have been gathered quietly to the old church-yard of our native village. They have left me alone—even as the last survivor of a fallen forest—the hoary representative of departed generations. The chains which once bound me to existence have been broken—Ambition, Avarice, Pride, even all that wakes into power the intolerable thirst of mind. But there are some milder thoughts—some brighter passages in the dream of my being, yet living at the fountain of memory—thoughts pure as angelic communion; and linked by a thousand tender associations to the Paradise of Love.

There was one—a creature of exalted intellect—a being, whose thoughts went upward like the incense of flowers upon God's natural altars—they were so high and so unlike to earth. Yet she was not proud of her high gift. With the bright capacities of an unbodied spirit, there was something more than woman's meekness in her demeanour. It was the condescension of a seraph intellect—the forgiveness and the tears of conscious purity extended to the erring and passionate of earth.

She was not a being to love with an earthly affection. Her person had no harmony with her mind. It bore no resemblance to those beautiful forms which glide before the eye of romance in the shadowy world of dreams. It was not like the bright realities of being—the wealth of beauty which is sometimes concentrated in the matchless form of woman. It was Deformity—strange, peculiar Deformity, relieved only by the intellectual glory of a dark and soul like eye.

Yet, strange as it may seem, I loved her, deeply, passionately as the young heart can love, when it pours itself out like an oblation to its idol. There were gentle and lovely ones around me—creatures of smiles and blushes; soft tones and melting glances. But their beauty made no lasting impression on my heart. Mine was an intellectual love—a yearning after something invisible and holy—something above the ordinary standard of human desire, set apart and sanctified, as it were, by the mysteries of mind.

Mine was not a love to be revealed in the thronged circle of gaiety and fashion—it was avowed underneath the bending heaven; when the perfect stars were alone gazing upon us. It was rejected; but not in scorn, in pride, nor in anger, by that high-thoughted girl. She would ask my friendship—my sympathy; but she besought me—ay, with tears besought me, to speak no more of Love. I obeyed her. I fled from her presence. I mingled once more in the busy tide of being, and ambition entered into my soul. Wealth came upon me unexpectedly; and the voice of praise became a familiar sound. I returned, at last, with the impress of manhood on my brow, and sought again the being of my dreams.

She was dying. Consumption—pale, ghastly consumption had been taking away her hold on existence. The deformed and unfitting tenement was yielding to the impulses of the soul. Clasp her wasted hand, I bent over her in speechless agony. She raised her eyes to mine, and in those beautiful emblems of her soul, I read the hoarded affection of years—the long smothered emotion of a suffering heart. "Henry," she said, and I bent lower to catch the faltering tones of her sweet voice—"I have loved you long and fervently. I feel that I am dying. I rejoice at it. Earth will cover this wasted and unseemly form, but the soul will return to that promised and better land, where no change or circumstance can mar the communion of spirit. Oh, Henry, had it been permitted—but I will not murmur. You were created with more than manhood's beauty; and I—deformed—wretched as I am, have dared to love you!"

I knelt down and kissed the pale brow of the sufferer. A smile of more than earthly tenderness stole over her features, like an omen of the spirit's happiness. She was dead. And they buried her on the spot which she had herself selected—a delightful place of slumber, curtained by green young willows. I have stood there a thousand times in the quiet moonlight, and fancied that I heard, in every breeze that whispered among the branches, the voice of the beloved slumberer.

Devoted girl! thy beautiful spirit hath never abandoned me in my weary pilgrimage. Gently and soothingly thou comest to watch over my sleeping pillow—to cheer me amidst the trials of humanity—to mingle thy heavenly sympathies with my joys and sorrows, and to make thy mild reprovals known and felt in the darker moments of existence; in the tempest of passion, and the bitterness of crime. Even now, in the awful calm which precedes the last change in my being; in the cold shadow which now stretches from the grave to the presence of the living, I feel that thou art near me—

"Thyself a pure and sainted one, Watching the loved and frail of Earth."

THE DINNER OF THE MONTHS.

BY HENRY NEAL.

Once upon a time, the Months determined to dine together. They were a long time deciding who should have the honour of being the Host on so solemn an occasion; but the lot at length fell on December; for although this old gentleman's manners were found to be rather cold upon first acquaintance, yet it was well known that when once you got under his roof, there was not a merrier, or more hospitable person in existence—The messenger too, Christmas Day, whom he sent round with his cards of invitation, won the hearts of all, although he played several mad pranks, and received many a box in return. February begged to be excused coming to the dinner, as she was in very bad spirits on account of the loss of her youngest child, the twenty ninth, who had lately left her, and was not expected to return for four years. Her objection, however, was overruled; and being seated at table between the smiling May, and that merry old fellow October, she appeared to enjoy the evening's entertainment as much as any of the company.

The dinner was a superb one; all the company having contributed to furnish out the table. January thought for the thirteenth time what he should give, and then determined to send a calf's head. February not being a very productive month, was also a little puzzled, but at length resolved to contribute an enormous cake, which she managed to manufacture in fine style, with the assistance of her servant Valentine, who was an excellent fellow at this sort of ware, but especially at bride cake. March and April agreed to furnish all the fish. May to decorate the dishes with flowers; June to supply plenty of excellent cider; July and August to provide the desert; September a magnificent course of all sorts of game, except pheasants; which exception was supplied by October, as well as a couple of hampers of fine home-brewed ale, and November engaged that there should be plenty of ice. The rest of the eatables, and all the wine were provided by the worthy host himself.

Just before sitting down to table, a slight squabble arose about precedence; some of the company insisted that the first in rank was January, and some that it was March. The host, however, decided in favour of January, whom he placed in the seat of honour, at his right hand. November, a prime, blue-nosed old maid, sat at his left, and June, a pleasant, good tempered fellow, although occasionally rather too warm, sat opposite him at the end of the table.

The dinner was admirably served. Christmas day was the principal waiter; but the host had been obliged to borrow the attendance of some of his high guest's servants, and accordingly Twelfth-night, Shrove Tuesday, and Michaelmas-day officiated in various departments, though Shrove Tuesday was speedily turned out, for making rather too free with a prim, demure servant maid, called Good Friday, while she was toasting some hot-cross buns for the tea table.

A short, squab little fellow, called St. Thomas's-day, stood behind December's chair, and officiated as toast master; and much merriment was excited between the diminutive appearance of this man and the longest day, who stood behind June, at the other end of the table. Master Thomas, however, was a very useful fellow; and beside performing the high official duty, which we have mentioned, he drew the curtains, stirred the fire, lighted and snuffed the candles, and, like all other little men, seemed to think himself of more importance than any body else.

The pretty blushing May was the general toast of the company; and many compliments were passed upon the elegant manner in which she had decorated the dishes. Old January tried to be very sweet upon her, but she received him coldly; as he was known not to be a loyal subject, and to have once stolen a crown and sceptre, and hidden them in a grave; and May, who was loyal to the back-bone, had much trouble in finding out, and restoring them. January at length ceased to persecute her with his attentions, and transferred them to November, who was of the same politicks as himself, although she had not been quite as successful in supporting them. Poor May had scarcely got rid of her venerable lover, before that sentimental swain April, began to tell her that he was absolutely dying for her. This youth was one moment all sunshine and smiles, and rapture; and the next he dissolved in tears, clouds gathered upon his brow, and he looked a fitter suitor for November than for May; who having at last hinted as much to him, he left her in a huff, and entered into close conversation with September, who although much his senior, resembled him in many particulars.

July, who was of a desperately hot temper was every now and then a good deal irritated by March, a dry old fellow, as cool as a cucumber, who was continually passing his jokes upon him. At one time July went so far as to threaten him with prosecution for something he had said; but March, knowing what he was about, always managed to keep on the windy side of the law, and to throw dust into the eyes of his accusers. July, however, contrived to have his revenge; for, being called upon for a song, he gave "The dashing White Sergeant" in great style, and laid a peculiar emphasis upon the words. "March! March; away!" at the same time motioning to his antagonist to leave the room.

April having announced that it was raining hard, January was much perplexed as to how he should get home, as he had not brought his carriage. At one time, when he was looking very anxiously out of the window to discover if there were any stars visible, October, at the suggestion of May, asked him if he thought of borrowing Charles's wain to carry him, as he had done so great a kindness to its proprietor? This put the old fellow into such a passion, that he hastily seized his head-gear, a red cap, sallied out through the rain and would most likely have broken his neck in the dark, had not February sent her footman Candlemas-day, after him, with a lantern, by whom he was guided in safety to his lodgings in Fog alley.

On the retirement of the Ladies—February, May, August, and November—the host proposed their healths, which were drunk with the usual honours; when April, being a soft spoken youth, and ambitious of distinction as an orator, began to return thanks for them in a very flowery speech; but was soon coughed down by December and March; and March, by the by, at length got into such high favour with his old enemy July, that the latter was heard to give him an invitation, saying, that if ever he came over to this side of the Zodiac, he should be most happy to see him. October told the host that, with his leave, he would drink no more wine, but that he should be glad of some good home-brewed, and a pipe. To this December acceded, and said he should be happy to join him, and he thought his friend March would do the same. March having nodded assent, they set to, and a pretty puffing and blowing they made among them. April, however continued to drink Madeira, while June, July and September, stuck, with exemplary constancy, to the Burgundy.

After repeated summons to the drawing-room, they joined the Ladies at the tea-table. November drew herself up, and affected to be quite overpowered by the smell of smoke, which March, October, and December had brought in with them; although it is well known that the old lady herself could blow a cloud as well as any of them. October seated himself by May, and said he hoped that his pipe would not have the same effect upon her, as upon her Aunt; and after having gracefully assured him that she was not at all annoyed by it, he told her, that he would make her exercise her own sweet pipe before the evening was much older; which, instead of annoying, would delight every body. August, a grave stately matron of extraordinary beauty, although perhaps un peu pousse, officiated as tea-maker. Good Friday, who by this time had recovered the fright into which Shrove-Tuesday had thrown her, handed about the toasted buns, and Swithin, a servant of July, was employed to keep the tea-pot supplied with water, which he too often did to overflowing.

Tea being over, the old folks went to cards; and the young ones, including October, who managed to hide his years very successfully, to the Piano-forte. May was the Prima Donna, and delighted every one, especially poor April, who was alternately all smiles and tears, during the whole of her performance. October gave them a hunting song, which caused even the card table to be deserted, and August sang a sweet melancholy Ganzonet which was rapturously encored. April both sang and played most unmercifully; but the company had an ugly trick of yawning over his comick songs, and were ready to expire with laughter at his patheticks.

At length, Candle-mas having returned from seeing old January home, his mistress February took leave of the company. April, who was a little the worse for the wine he had drank, insisted on escorting November; although she had several servants in waiting, and her road was in an opposite direction to his own. May went away in her own carriage, and undertook to set June down, who lived very near her. The road was hilly and steep, but her coachman, Ascension-day, got the horses very well to the top; and July and August both walked home, preceded by a dog-day, with a lighted torch. September and October, who were next door neighbours, went way in the same hackney-coach; and March departed as he came, on the back of a rough Shetland pony.

FROM THE GERMAN OF WIELAND.

Christopher Martin Wieland was born 1733, at Biberach, in Suabia; he died in the year 1813.

THE EMIR.

* * * * * The Emir in his whole life, had never been so dissatisfied with himself, as on this night. The comparison, which he instituted between himself, a hoary old man of two and thirty, and this silver-locked youth of eighty, was more than sufficient to bring him to despair. He bit his lips together, beat himself on his forehead, and cursed in the bitterness of his heart, his Harem, his private physician, his cooks, and the young fools, who had encouraged him, through example and precepts, to dissipate his life so speedily. Exhausted by impotent rage, and stupified by a crowd of tormenting thoughts, that made the sense of his existence a torture to him, he finally fell into a slumber; and when, after some hours, he awoke again, it wanted a little, that he had not held all that had occurred to him since his last sleep, for a mere dream. At least, he applied all his powers to suppress the recollection of the most unpleasant part of his circumstances;—and in the hope, that new impressions would be the most conducive to that purpose, he opened a window, out of which, he beheld the gardens lie before him, which extended themselves round about the house from the eastern side. A pure air, cooled with a thousand refreshing odours, dispersed the gloomy clouds which still hung around his brain; he felt himself strengthened; this feeling rekindled a spark of hope in his bosom; and with the hope the love of life returned. Whilst he was contemplating these gardens, and in spite of his perverted taste for the magnificent and artificial, could not resist finding them beautiful, with all their useful simplicity and seeming wildness, he perceived the old man; who, half concealed by the shrubbery, was busying himself with a little work in the garden, whereof the Emir had not thought it worthy to acquire to himself an idea. The desire to have explained to him, every surprising and wonderful thing which he had seen in this house, induced him to descend into the gardens, in order to enter into a conversation with the old man. After he had thanked him for his kind reception, he began to show him his astonishment thereupon,—that a hoary old man of his years could yet be so erect, so active, so lively and so capable of taking a part in the pleasure of life. If thy silver hairs and thy grey beard did not give evidence of a high age, continued he, one must hold thee for a man of forty. I beg thee, solve me this riddle. What possessest thou as a secret, that can work such miracles?

"I can tell thee my secret in three words," returned the old man, smiling: "Labour, Pleasure and Rest, each in small, just proportion, mixed to equal parts, and alternated according to the hints of nature; work this miracle, as thou art pleased to call it, on the intelligible way of the world. Ah, by no means; disagreeable weakness is the hint, which nature gives us, to interrupt a labour with amusements; and a similar hint reminds us to rest from both. The labour sustains the taste for the pleasures of nature, and the ability to enjoy them;—and he only, for whom their pure, blameless delights have lost all charm, is unhappy enough to seek by artificial ones a satisfaction, which they will not impart to him. Learn of me, worthy stranger, how happy the obedience to nature renders one. She recompenses us for it, with the enjoyment of her best gifts. My whole life has been a long, seldom interrupted chain of agreeable moments; for, the labour itself, a labour adapted to our powers and accompanied by no embittering circumstances, is connected with a kind of gentle delight; the beneficent influences of which, spread themselves over our whole being. But, in order to be happy through nature, one must have preserved uncorrupted, the greatest of her benefits, which is the instrument of all the rest, the feeling; and to feel right, an indispensable condition is to think right."

Could it have been possible, to make you capable of pleasure, without your being also capable of pain, so—would it have been done. But as far as it was possible, she has locked up the avenue to you of pain. As long as you follow her laws, it will seldom interrupt your joys; nay, more, it will sharpen your sensibility for every pleasure, and thereby be a benefit; it will be in your life, what the shadow is in a fine sun-lit landscape; what the dissonance is in a symphony; what the salt is to your food.

All good resolves itself into pleasure, all evil into pain. But the highest pain is the sense of having made one's self unhappy,—(here the Emir fetched a deep sigh) and the highest delight, the serene retrospection upon a well-spent life, stained by no repentance.

Moderation and a voluntary forbearance is the surest preservative against weariness and disgust. Moderation is wisdom; and only to the wise is it granted, to empty, by sipping to the last drop, the cup of pure delight, which nature offers full, to every mortal. The wise man denies himself, sometimes a present pleasure, not because he is an enemy to joy, or out of a foolish fear of any hostile demon, who is angry on that account if men enjoy themselves; but, in order by forbearance, to reserve himself for a so much the more perfect enjoyment of pleasure for the future.

Hear me, ye children of nature! Hear ye the immutable law! Without labour no health of the soul and the life, without this, no felicity is possible. Nature wills, that ye should draw out of her lap the means for the support and sweetening of your existence as fruits of a moderate labour. Nothing but a labour adapted, according to the degree of your powers, will preserve to you the necessary condition of all pleasure, health.

ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE FOOD.

It is amusing to hear a nervous female, whose daily exercise consists in going up and down stairs two or three times a day and shopping once a week, complain that she cannot preserve her strength unless she eats freely of some kind of meat and takes her twice daily potations of strong coffee, to say nothing of porter, or wine sangaree. The same opinion prevails among all classes of our community—A child (in the arms) cannot, it is thought, thrive unless it have a leg of a chicken, or piece of bacon in its fist to suck: a boy or girl going to school must be gorged with the most substantial aliment at dinner and perhaps little less at breakfast and supper. The child is crying and screaming every hour in the day—has, after a while, convulsions,—or obstinate diseases of the skin, or dropsy of the brain. The little personage going to school complains of headach, is fretful and unhappy and becomes pale and feeble. The poor books are now blamed for the fault of the dishes, and school is given up. The doctor is next consulted on the best means of restoring strength to the dear creature, that has lost its appetite, and can eat nothing but a little cake, or custard, or at most some fat froth. Should he tell the fond mother the unpalatable truth; and desire her to suspend the system of stuffing, and allow her child, for sole food, a little bread and milk diluted with water, and daily exercise in the open air, she will be heard exclaiming in a tone of mingled astonishment and reproach, why doctor, would you starve my child!

For the information of all such misguided persons, we would beg leave to state that the large majority of mankind do not eat any animal food, or so sparingly, and at such long intervals that it can not be said to form their nourishment. Millions in Asia are sustained by rice alone, with perhaps a little vegetable oil, for seasoning. In Italy, and southern Europe generally, bread made of the flour of wheat or Indian corn, with lettuce and the like mixed with oil, constitutes the food of the most robust part of its population. The Lazzaroni of Naples, with forms so active and finely proportioned cannot even calculate on this much; coarse bread and potatoes are their chief reliance;—their drink of luxury is a glass of iced water slightly acidulated. Hundreds of thousands, we might say millions, of Irish do not see flesh meat or fish from one week's end to the other. Potatoes and oat meal are their articles of food—if milk can be added it is thought a luxury: yet where shall we find a more healthy and robust population, or one more enduring of bodily fatigue, and exhibiting more mental vivacity? What a contrast between these people and the inhabitants of the extreme north, the timid Laplanders, Esquimaux, Samoideans, whose food is almost entirely animal!

From the same.

INTEMPERANCE—INSANITY.

The bloated face, and trembling hand—indigestion and dropsy—diseased liver and kidneys,—are common and acknowledged effects of intemperance. By this word intemperance, we do not mean merely drunkenness, but the practice of daily stimulating beyond their healthy and regular beats, the heart and blood vessels, by potations of vinous, malt, or distilled liquors. It is not, perhaps, so generally known that the man of intemperate habits is prone to madness, and of course liable to become the inmate of a hospital, or lunatick asylum. The instances of temporary madness in drunkards are very common. After some days they may recover by suitable medical treatment, but if they return to their evil habits, they are exposed to fresh attacks, which finally prove fatal. A wound or a fractured limb which, in common healthy constitutions, would soon heal, will often excite to frenzy the habitual drunkard, and be the immediate cause of his death. The chances of recovery from any disease whatever, are infinitely less for the drunkard than the sober man. When the small pox prevailed so extensively in this city, in 1823-4, we never knew of a drunkard who recovered from an attack of the natural disease, that is, where neither vaccination nor inoculation had been practised. He for the most part died delirious.

But, independent of these instances of temporary and accidental madness, there is a formidable list of the permanent and incurable kind, caused by drunkenness. In a table of 1370 lunatics admitted into the asylum at Cork, Dr. Hallaran says that 160, nearly an eighth of the whole number, were insane from this unhappy indulgence. Though the French are comparatively a sober people, it appears that out of 2507 lunatics admitted into their hospitals, 185 were insane from the same cause. Men are often driven to self destruction by a habit of drunkenness. Out of 218 cases of suicide, published by Professor Casper of Berlin, (in a list of 500) the causes of which were known, 54 were the effects of drunkenness and dissipation.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

A REAL MIRACLE.

The fable of Dr. Southey's Pilgrim of Compostella, is as follows:—

A family set forth from Aquitaine to visit the shrine of St. James, at Compostella, whither, according to the Catholic faith, the decapitated body of the saint was conveyed from Palestine, (miraculously of course,) in a ship of marble. At a certain small town by the way, their son Pierre is tempted by the innkeeper's daughter. Like a second Joseph, he resists the immodest damsel; like Potiphar's wife, she converts her love to hate, and accuses the virtuous youth of a capital crime. Her false oath prevail, and he is condemned to the gallows. Rejoicing in his martyred innocence, he exhorts his parents to pursue their pilgrimage, and pray for the peace of his soul. Sorrowing, they proceed, and returning, find their son hanging by the neck alive, and singing psalms—in no actual pain—but naturally desirous to be freed from his extraordinary state of suspended animation. They repair to the chief magistrate of the town, by whose authority the youth was executed—and find his worship at dinner—relate the wonderful preservation of their son—and request that he may be restored. The magistrate is incredulous, and declares that he would sooner believe that the fowls on which he was dining would rise again in full feather. The miracle is performed. The cock and hen spring from the ocean of their own gravity, clacking and crowing, with all appurtenances of spur, comb, and feather. Pierre, of course, is liberated, and declared innocent. The cock and hen become objects of veneration—live in a state of chastity—and are finally translated—leaving just two eggs, from which arise another immaculate cock and hen. The breed is perhaps still in existence, and time hath been, that a lucrative trade was carried on in their feathers!!!

ANTIQUITY OF ORGANS.

The organ was in use among the Anglo-Saxons. Cassiodorus and Fortunatus mention the word organ as a musical instrument, but it has been thought to have been a collection of tubes blown into by the human breath. Muratori has contended that the art of making organs like ours was known in the eighth century only to the Greeks; that the first organ in Europe was the one sent to Pepin from Greece in 756, and that it was in 826 that a Venetian priest, who had discovered the secret, brought it to France.

A passage in Aldhelm's poem, De Laude Virginum, entirely overthrows these theories; for he, who died in 709, and who never went to Greece, describes them in a manner which shows that he was acquainted with great organs made on the same principles as our own:—

"Listening to the greatest organs with a thousand blasts, the ear is soothed by the windy bellows, while the rest shines in the gilt chests."

Another evidence of the antiquity of organs among the Anglo-Saxons occurs in the works of Bede, contemporary and survivor of Aldhelm. The passage is express, and also shows how they were made:—

"An organum is a kind of tower made with various pipes, from which, by the blowing of bellows, a most copious sound is issued; and that a becoming modulation may accompany this, it is furnished with certain wooden tongues from the interior part, which, the master's fingers skilfully repressing, produce a grand and a most sweet melody."

TOPOGRAPHY.

From the Nashville Republican and Gazette, of August 18.

THE PROVINCE OF TEXAS.

The following interesting communication in relation to the Province of Texas, is from the pen of a gentleman whose knowledge of that country has been acquired by a residence in it. His description of the soil, climate, water courses, general aspect, &c. of the country may, therefore, with safety be relied on.

That delightful portion of the world, known by the name of Texas, varies in width from three to four hundred miles. Its length from the Gulf of Mexico to its Northern limits, is not ascertained. Its most Southern latitude (at the mouth of the Rio Grande) is in twenty-six degrees, and its most Northern, in about thirty-three. Within fifty or sixty miles of the Gulf, the country presents the appearance of a plain, after that it is gently undulating, until, about two hundred miles from the Gulf, we approach hills of moderate magnitude. The general face of the country presents three varieties: 1st, the alluvial lands on the water-courses; 2d, prairies; 3d, the timbered uplands.

The first description of lands is thickly timbered with the different varieties of oak, ash, elm, cedar, box elder, dog-wood, walnut, cotton-wood, and pecan. The soil is equal to any in the world. The prairies are carpeted with a great variety of the most luxuriant grasses. Some of the prairies are literally cane brakes. Many of an inferior quality have been cultivated, and found to produce astonishingly. The third description of lands is also covered with grass, and timbered with post oak, a wood which furnishes the most durable fencing.

This province is adapted to three or four different pursuits, namely, the Southern parts to the growing of cotton, sugar, indigo, &c.; the Northern parts to the growing of wheat, corn, and the different kinds of provisions; and the whole country to grazing and the cultivation of the grape. From the latitude, the character of the soil, and the spontaneous grape, this country will doubtless one day vie with the south of France, and supply the United States with wine.

Let us for a moment run a parallel between this country and Louisiana. The plantations on the Mississippi, and most other parts of Louisiana vary from half a mile to a mile in depth; after that, the country recedes into interminable swamps—the prolific sources of the depopulating diseases of that region. In Texas, the lands, instead of declining, gradually ascend from the banks of the rivers; and instead of falling into swamps, are backed by beautifully rolling prairies and post oak hills, affording in many places plantations varying in depth from three to six miles. There is, properly speaking, no such thing as a swamp in Texas. The prairie nature of the country affording to the sea-breeze an unimpeded circulation, and the absence of swamps, must render it infinitely more healthy than Louisiana. There are no uplands in Louisiana fit for cultivation, with the exception of a portion of the parish of East Feliciana, rendered of little value on account of its hilly situation. In Texas, in addition to the superiour depth of the plantations on the water courses, there are millions upon millions of acres of upland, capable of producing more cotton to the acre, and that of a longer staple and finer texture, than our best land in Tennessee. In the same area, then, we would have a ten times greater amount of fertile land in Texas than in Louisiana.

In relation to navigation, Texas is washed on one side along its whole extent by the Gulf of Mexico, while its interior is diversified by the Sabine, the Natchez, the Trinity, the Brasos, the Bernard, the Colorado, the Rio Grande, and other streams of minor importance. Some of these streams will admit of flat and steam boat navigation for three or four hundred miles, and all of them moderate sized vessels as high as tide water. Salt water and iron ore are abundant. Some mines of the precious metals are already known, and when the country is more fully explored many more will doubtless be discovered. There are any quantities of game here, such as wild horses, mules, and cattle, buffalo, bears, wolves, deer, and turkeys. The water courses abound in fish.

In regard to population, there are from twelve to fifteen hundred Mexicans in Texas, (including the garrisons) nineteen-twentieths of whom are settled in the two villages of St. Antonio and Nacogdoches. The emigrants from the U. States amount to five or six thousand souls, more than half of these are situated in Austin's grant. The remainder principally occupy ungranted lands. From this it will be seen that the losses sustained by Government, in consequence of the numerous squatters who seated themselves upon land to which it was entitled in Louisiana, are not to be apprehended to any extent here. There is a number of Indian tribes in this country, most of which, having removed from other parts of America, within a few years past, make no claim to the soil. The idea that rains are too infrequent here to mature a crop, is entirely unfounded. An experience of seven or eight years has resulted in the production of crops comparable with those of the most highly favoured portions of the globe.

Our correspondent below takes matters more seriously than we think he has reason to. That Southwick may possess the power to addle the pates of a few old grannies and silly individuals, of both sexes, we do not, and never did doubt; but more than this he cannot do. He is a sort of Jemima Wilkinson in breeches—equally shallow, frothy, and fallacious—still more blasphemous—and quite as much despised by every one who has a thimble full of common sense. We should indeed be surprised to learn that a single sober-minded man had become his proselyte, from hearing his angry and windy declamations—we should as soon think that an Indian war-whoop could convert a civilized man into a savage, as that the noisy invectives and fury of Solomon Southwick could make an intelligent man his disciple. That he has and will have followers, we do not doubt; but they have or will become so, for some more winning reasons than any thing set forth in his "thundering" speeches. The hope of political advancement has induced men of better character than himself to make him an instrument for keeping alive the prejudices and evil passions of the community; and to give him a little importance with the gullible multitude, they pretend to listen to his rantings themselves. and by the promise of especial favour in the event of power, induce others to do the same. Secretly, they condemn Southwick as much as the opponents of their cause, and we know their connexion with him is regretted by some of them as a vile necessity, which reflects the greatest discredit upon them personally, but which can not be remedied, unless they relinquish all hope of moulding the passions of the people according to the rule of their own interests. The influence of Southwick is probably as rationally appreciated in this city as in any other place; and at such a low ebb is it, that it would puzzle any one to find half a dozen human beings, men, women, or children, who do not treat it as a mere jest. Even those who a year ago got up the meeting which nominated Southwick for Governor, are so ashamed of that transaction that many of them affect to deny their agency in it, and are so thoroughly disgusted with anti-masonry that they will not even patronize the National Observer! It appears to us, then, that our correspondent's "fears" rest upon slight grounds. A man who is so easily sifted, and so soon neglected and despised as Southwick, is not calculated to exert any great or permanent influence.

As to the number that attended as spectators on this occasion, we have a right to judge, from similar instances heretofore, that a great portion were influenced by a desire to see "the thunderer," without caring a copper for what he might say; and that with the remainder, politics exercised a liberal influence. The "grannies" were probably all Southwickians.

MR. CHILD—You will not be surprised, in these times, to hear that, on Saturday last, the Baptist meeting house in this village was prostituted to the vile use of an anti-masonick pow-wow. The Albany "thunderer," old Southwick, made his appearance in the pulpit—and at this I should not have been surprised, considering his wild enthusiasm; but that such clergymen as Mr. Fort and Mr. Burnitt should have condescended to play a second fiddle to this American Anacharsis Cloots, by praying before and after his oration, is calculated to inspire alarm for the future peace and welfare of the state. It seems to me that the times are indeed really out of joint; for here were no less than six or seven hundred people, and many of them respectable, of both sexes, who, when the "thunderer" told them that his lungs were nearly exhausted, and requested them to retire for awhile, till our modern Jupiter could get a little breath, did all, like so many sheep at the rod of their shepherd, go out quietly as lambs, and after a while all came in again and listen with apparent delight to his fallacious and wicked charges against a venerable and useful institution. What effect his speech had, I cannot say—but I fear it deluded some honest men, although in reality made up of froth. There is, however, something in the old fellow's manner rather imposing. This appearance is somewhat in his favour. He is indeed pretty well calculated "to lead captive silly women," as St. Paul says,—some of the elder grannies declaring that he would make a "handsome" preacher. It is a part of Southwick's vile cunning to make the women believe there is something very wicked and indecent in freemasonry, or they would be admitted as members; whereas every man knows that the reason why they are not admitted is a good one, and such as sensible women themselves would approve of, if it could be fairly explained to them. But fair dealing is not to be expected from Southwick or any of his coadjutors. To pull down masonry, right or wrong, is their principle. But let us rejoice that the vipers "bite a file." Like Benedict Arnold, they will only disgrace themselves.

NOTICE. The publick are respectfully requested to suspend their judgment on the statements in the newspapers of this city, respecting the anti-masonick meeting in the Fox Street church; especially the statement made by Elisha Putnam and others, (which contains several material inaccuracies,) as there will be a legal investigation, when the truth of the facts will appear.

MORGAN CELEBRATION. The anniversary of the abduction of William Morgan, or rather the anniversary of the day which brought into notice a few political demagogues, was celebrated in this village on the 12th inst. From the noise and bustling of the antis, we were prepared to expect an immense concourse of people on this occasion, all panting with patriotic ardour, and fired with virtuous indignation at the event they had assembled to commemorate. The day, however, arrived; and judge of our disappointment, when, after all the exertions of the leaders, urging their followers, in the most patriotic manner, to attend, we saw a thin and meagre body, consisting of precisely sixty-nine persons, wending its way to the Universalist church, led on by that immaculate patriot and worthy citizen, Deacon Joshua Bacon, of sheep memory. Of the exercises in the church we are unable to speak distinctly, not having had the pleasure of witnessing them. We understand, however, that the anti-masonick declaration of independence was read, and an oration delivered by Jeduthun Steele, esq. of Sackett's Harbour, which, like every thing else from the same source, was "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." The vast assemblage then returned to the tavern, and, to the number of about fifty, sat down to a dinner prepared for five hundred, and drowned their sorrow for the fate of Morgan in their devotions to the jolly god. Thus ended this ever memorable day in the annals of political anti-masonry, much to the chagrin of leaders, and the disappointment of our worthy host under the hill. In short it was a complete failure. Every attempt which has thus far been made by the antis, to rally their scattered forces, has only tended to expose their weakness, and excite the ridicule of the honest and intelligent portion of the community. Should they continue to hold their meetings every week until the election arrives, they would hardly be able muster a corporal's guard.

VARIETIES.

The incorrect impression of the effect of the first landing of the Spanish army at Tampico, derived from the first imperfect accounts, have been corrected by later advices. The ragamuffin invaders, consisting of negroes, mulattoes, and Spanish desperadoes, got possession of Tampico, after a brave but unavailing defence by a feeble garrison. All parties have united to destroy the common enemy of Mexico, and preparations are actively making which cannot fail to ensure so desirable a result.

The desertion from the Mexican army was greatly exaggerated, not more than a few hundred having gone over. The inhabitants of Vera Cruz and the neighbourhood exhibit great enthusiasm and the most patriotic devotion to the good cause of freedom. The people of wealth contributed their money, and the healthy their personal service to the defence of their country. A Mexican countess has offered the government all the horses which they may want; another lady gave up government securities to the amount of $2000, and her husband, a retired Colonel, marched to the field as a common soldier. Lander and Santa Anna have under their command about 10,000 men, so that the Spaniards, about 3000 in number, have but a poor chance of escape.

A vein of pure oil, bituminous probably, was lately struck in boring for salt water, in Cumberland county, Kentucky. The oil welled out at intervals of from two to five minutes, pouring out at each flow barrels of oil, perfectly pure, and of a strong, penetrating, disagreeable odour, perceptible at the distance of five or six miles. The well was opened on the bank of a small rill, down which the oil flowed into the Cumberland river, distant from a quarter to half a mile. A boy communicated fire to the oil on the river about two miles below the spot where it first reached it—the spectacle was splendid beyond description—the flame shooting up for miles along the river in one immense wall of flame, reaching from the water to the clouds, and shining over the whole country by night like the conflagration of a great city, starting the whole country as if the flame had burst up from the bottomless abyss.

EXPEDITION TO THE SOUTH SEA. This famous expedition, which was sent to the bottom last session, by the U. S. Senate, is about to be attempted under the auspices of private enterprise. We learn, from the New-Bedford Mercury, that S. N. Reynolds, esq. and Capt. Palmer were in that place last week, "preparing one of the finest vessels ever built in that or any other port, for the expedition." Captain Palmer has already shipped a part of the crew and made other preparations. The brig will sail in a few days for New-York, where she will receive on board the remainder of her outfit, previous to her departure for the South Seas. Capt. Palmer, says the Mercury, is spoken of as one of our most intelligent, enterprising, and successful South Sea navigators, and possessing much practical knowledge of those seas. The New-Bedford merchants have lent their aid to the enterprise.

QUEER ADVENTURE. The Pawtucket Chronicle states that a comical fellow, who is in the habit of ranging the country, recently entered a Magistrate's office in that village, in the absence of the rightful occupant, and began to examine the documents upon the table, among which were a dozen or more writs against persons whom he knew by sight, but who did not know him. He pocketed the instruments, and in about half an hour afterwards was seen coming up the street followed by three or four sorry-looking fellows whom he had arrested, and carrying under each arm a journeyman tailor, who had been inclined to show fight rather than be taken at such short notice. He conveyed them to the place from whence he took the official papers, and, finding the justice still absent, made use of the lock and key to confine them there, as he said, "that they might take their trial at the next sitting of the court."

A singular duel took place recently in a village near Grenoble. Two officers having gone to a house to breakfast, seated themselves near a table where a priest was making a "dejeune maigre," it being Friday. With a view to annoy him, one of them invited him to take a slice of a leg of mutton, which he declined. The officer then held to the priest's nose a slice upon his fork, and urged him to eat it. Upon a second refusal the officer struck the priest a blow on the head, which the latter returned as hastily. A proposition was then made to settle the quarrel with pistols; but the priest chose swords. A duel was fought, and the officer receiving a wound was conveyed to the hospital. The other offering to revenge his comrade, a second duel was fought, in which the priest killed his adversary. He then went and related the whole affair to the Bishop of Grenoble, who ordered him to retire to the seminary.

EFFECTS OF POPULAR FOLLY. A late London paper states that "so intemperate have females in the United States become, that they are obliged to form societies to keep each other sober." This judgment of foreigners is a very natural consequence of the absurdities that have been practiced among us in the so christened "cause of temperance." The females of our country are not surpassed in moral character by any portion of the human race, and yet female temperance societies are kept up among us to burlesque the cause of good morals, and bring ridicule and undeserved disgrace upon the country. Heaven grant our people a speedy return to their senses.

NEW AND VALUABLE STYPTICK, which will stop bleeding even of the largest vessels. Take of brandy or common spirits two ounces, Castile soap two drachms, pearlsh one drachm; scrape the soap fine and dissolve it in brandy, then add the pearl ash; mix it well together and keep it close in a phial; when you apply it let it be warm, and dip pledgets of lint in it, and the blood will immediately congeal. It operates by coagulating the blood a considerable way within the vessel; a few applications may be necessary where the wound is deep, or a limb cut off.

RESTORING THE HAIR. A singular case is mentioned in the last volume of the Medical Journal, of the complete restoration of the hair of the head, in a person who had become quite bald, by the use of a solution of sulphate of copper in French brandy. As the application, when used only once a day, cannot be injurious, it is worth a trial in cases of baldness.

VIVES, governor general of Cuba, is said to have tendered his resignation, in consequence of his disapprobation of the appointment of Barradas to command the expedition against Mexico. It is reported he had been sent to Europe several times by V. as a dangerous man, and always returned with new honours.

SHOOTING A DOVE FOR A PIGEON. A duel was lately fought at Dijon, in France, between an officer of the army and a citizen. They fought with pistols. The citizen fired first and missed his adversary. The officer then discharged his pistol in the air, and shot—not the citizen, but the citizen's wife, who was witnessing the rencontre from a window at some distance.

It is now customary at dinner parties in Paris, where ladies are present, to hand round, just before sitting down to table, a pincushion, that the fair guests may pin up their sleeves, which would otherwise entirely preclude the operations of the table!

THE VILLAGE.

'Tis summer, and o'er Avon's lofty mount
 Refreshing zephyrs sport, and borne along
 On sightless pinions, fill the balmy air,
 With incense wafted from a thousand flowers.
 What though the sun with scorching eye, looks forth,
 And gleams majestic in the mid-day sky;
 What though his fervid beams with glow intense,
 Pour on the distant vale unmitigated?
 Here half his power is lost—the wandering breeze,
 Forever flying and yet never flown,
 Sweeps o'er the fields and through the shady grove,
 Visits the flowing garden, and the bower
 Where beauty loves to dwell, and drives away
 The noxious exhalations from the air.

At morning's early dawn, Aurora fair
 Looks from the chambers of the glowing east,
 With smiling face, diffusing gentle light
 O'er Nature's works, and throws a majick dye
 On hill-side, vale, and cottage low: 'Tis then
 That cheerful Industry, and glowing health,
 Invite to rouse from sleep, and welcome in
 The new born day. Then every nerve's new strung,
 And every sense refreshed: the mental powers
 Seem from the cumbrous clogs of sense half freed.
 Calm Contemplation, with her train of thoughts,
 Soothes every passion, and dispels all grief;
 And Reason, too, oft driven from her throne,
 Resumes her lawful empire o'er the mind,
 Corrects each folly, and reproves each fault.

And evening mild, in this sequestered ville,
 Far from the strife and bustle of the world,
 Displays peculiar charms. The glowing sun,
 His daily course now finished, sinks behind
 The western mountains, while his parting beams,
 As loath to quit so beautiful a scene,
 Struggle a moment through the trees that crown
 Their lofty summits, lingering on each hill,
 And stately tree, and lofty spire.
 Then dusky twilight throws on all the scene
 Her majick mantle, in its increasing shade,
 And casts an air of romance wildly round.

New through the quiet streets in silence hushed,
 The evening stroll of beau and belle is made;
 And many an ardent vow, or burning sigh
 Is thrown and wafted on the idle breeze.

But see! with silver orb the moon pours forth,
 And flings her mellow light on all around;
 She comes to fill with inspiration rapt
 The poet's soul; to light up Fancy's torch,
 Casting its fairy hues on every scene,
 To give retiring pensive Melancholy
 A calmer holier shade, and kindle up
 In every breast, a something sanctified.

What, in the city's pomp, Matilda? what,
 Amid the state and pride that swell the great,
 Or in the splendour that surrounds the rich,
 Can yield the quiet happiness here found?
 Does the lofty dome magnificent contain
 Abodes, more fit receptacles of joy,
 Than the more humble edifice, that's found,
 Amid the loveliness of nature? No.
 Whate'er the proud may say, this truth is clear—
 That not the pomp and gaudy show of wealth,
 Nor Luxury's downy couch, and groaning beard,
 Nor station prominent to the publick eye,
 Yield half the enjoyment to the guileless breast,
 That rural beauty and repose bestow.

THE DELUGE.

BY FREDERICK S. ECKARD.

One last strong effort and he gained
 A refuge on the steep,

The lingering rock which yet remained
 Uplifted from the deep;
 He had invoked Despair,—she gave
 A strength to stem the torrent's wave,
 And whirlwind's iron sweep,
 And now were won, that contest o'er,
 A few dark hours of anguish more.

There was no hope! a frowning sky
 Had veiled the sun in gloom,
 And fearful sounds were rushing by,
 Like wailings for the doom;
 He looked around—the waters lay
 Wild and remorseless o'er their prey,
 An universal tomb;
 Yet from his glance they could not hide
 The frightful secrets of their tide.

There was no hope! and now he stood
 Upon that towering hill,
 Erect and stern and unsubdued,
 And calm 'midst utter ill.
 So long had storm and madness been,
 And vengeance ruled the tortured scene,
 To desolate and kill,
 That with the lightning's lurid glow,
 His thoughts flashed wildly o'er his wo:

"Earth! earth! the doom may be withdrawn,
 The raging wave subside,
 And God's pure day once more may dawn
 In brightness far and wide;
 But yet, though surge and cloud disperse,
 A consciousness of this strange curse,
 By which thy children died,
 Shall, though all future ages, be Like a dim terror laid on thee!"

"Fierce and unnatural is thy crime,
 Darkly thy fate is cast;
 Waning from nature's earlier prime,
 Thy strength for aye has past:
 Thousands of giant mind and form,
 Struggling like angels with the storm,
 Yet overwhelmed at last;
 And all we cherished swept away,
 As things too worthless for the day."

The voice was hushed—a sudden bound,
 A foaming on the wave,
 And the vexed waters closed around
 Their last unquiet grave;
 The same Almighty Power which bade
 Ruin and woe his works invade,
 Relented now to save;
 And slowly, at the strong command,
 Appeared the desolated land.

THE MISER.

The following extract is from the poem, entitled "Curiosity," of Charles Saragusa, Esq. Delivered August 27, 1822, before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, at Cambridge.

The churl, who holds it heresy to think,
 Who loves no music but the dollar's clink,
 Who laughs to scorn the wisdom of the schools,
 And deems the first of poets first of fools,
 Who never found what good from science grew,
 Save the grand truth, that one and one are two,
 And marvels Bowditch o'er a book should pore,
 Unless to make those two turn into four.
 Who, placed where Catskill's forehead greets the sky,
 Grieves that such quarries all unhewn should lie;
 Or, gazing where Niagara's torrents thrill,
 Exclaims, "A monstrous stream—to turn a mill;"
 Who loves to feel the blessed winds of heaven,
 But as his freighted barks are portward driven;
 Even he, across whose brain scarce dares to creep
 Aught but thrift's parent pair—to get, to keep;
 Who never learned life's real bliss to know—
 With Curiosity even he can glow.

Go seek him out on yon dear Gotham's walk,
 Where traffick's venturers meet to trade and talk;
 Where mammon's votaries bend, of each degree,
 The hard-eyed lender, and the pale lendee;
 Where rogues insolvent strut in whitewashed pride,
 And shove the dupes who trusted them aside.
 How through the buzzing crowd he wends his way,
 To catch the flying rumours of the day;
 To learn of changing stocks, of bargains crossed,
 Of breaking merchants, and of cargoes lost:
 The thousand ills that traffick's walks invade,
 And give the heart ache to the sons of trade.
 How cold he hearkens to some bankrupt's woe,
 Nods his wise head, and cries—"I told you so;
 The thriftless fellow lived beyond his means,
 He must buy brants—I make my folks eat beans;"
 What cares he for the knave, the knave's sad wife,
 The blighted prospects of an anxious life;
 The kindly throbs that other men controul,

Ne'er melt the iron of the miser's soul;
 Through life's dark road his sordid way he wends,
 An incarnation of fat dividends;
 But when to death he sinks, ungrieved, unsung,
 Buoyed by the blessing of no mortal tongue;
 No worth rewarded and no want redressed,
 To scatter fragrance round his place of rest,
 What shall that hallowed epitaph supply—
 The universal woe when good men die?
 Cold Curiosity shall linger there,
 To guess the wealth he leaves his tearless heir:
 Perchance to wonder what must be his doom,
 In the far land that lies beyond the tomb;
 Alas! for him, if in its awful plan,
 Heaven deal with him as he hath dealt with man.

HYMN OF THE CALABRIAN SHEPHERDS
TO THE VIRGIN.

BY MISS L. E. LONDON.

A peasant group, whose lips are full of prayer
 And hearts of home affections, such as flow
 So naturally in piety.

Darker and darker fall around
 The shadows from the pine,
 It is the hour with hymn and prayer
 To gather round thy shrine.

Hear us, sweet Mother! thou hast known
 Our earthly toils and fears,
 The bitterness of mortal toil,
 The tenderness of tears.

We pray thee first for absent ones,
 Those who knelt with us here—
 The father, brother, and the son,
 The distant and the dear.

We pray thee for the little bark
 Upon the stormy sea;
 Affection's anxiousness of love,
 Is it not known to thee?

The soldier, he who only sleeps
 His head upon a brand,
 Who only in a dream can see
 His own beloved land.

The wandering minstrel, he who gave
 Thy hymns his earliest tone,
 Who strives to teach a foreign tongue,
 The music of his own.

Kind Mother! let them see again
 Their own Italian shore;
 Back to the home which, wanting them,
 Seems like a home no more.

Madonna, keep the cold north wind
 Amid his native seas,
 So that no withering blight come down
 Upon our olive trees.

And bid the sunshine glad our hills,
 The dew rejoice our vines,
 And bid the healthful sea breeze sweep
 In music through the pines.

Pray for us, that our hearts and homes
 Be kept in fear and love;
 Love for all things around our path,
 And fear for those above.

Thy soft blue eyes are filled with tears,
 Oh! let them wash away
 The soil of our unworthiness,—
 Pray for us, mother, pray!

We know how vain the fleeting flowers,
 Around thine altar hung;
 We know how humble is thy hymn
 Before thine image hung.

But wilt thou not accept the wreath
 And sanctify the lay;
 We trust to thee our hopes and fears,—
 Pray for us, Mother, pray!

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before Constellation Lodge, and the associate Lodges, assembled at Dedham, Massachusetts, to celebrate the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1829.

BY NAHUM CAPEN.

Concluded.

To be convinced of the weakness and malicious spirit of the anti-masonick party, we have only to look into their publications. There, men professing an entire want, even of the alphabetical knowledge of masonry, learnedly decant upon the nature of its language, and the bad tendency of its secrets. Sage opinions are advanced by persons of no acknowledged merit, or judgement; and base insinuations are indulged in by others as destitute of moral principle.

Language of the most abusive and reviling character is by them esteemed of the highest value; once put in type, it travels through the land and is forced into the remotest recesses of society. Whether it be true or false, just or unjust, is a question of no concern with them. Is it against the interest of the masonick institution? if so, their conscientious scruples are quieted; it is sanctioned, passed and published.

That their cause is desperate, and blessed with but a single imperfect gleam of hope, may be inferred from the eagerness with which they devour, and the industry with which they circulate a letter, recently from the pen of a gentleman of respectable standing in New-York.

That there should be a difference of opinion, upon the policy of any institution, is not strange, nor by any means a proper subject of wonder; indeed, our best experience teaches us to expect it. But because there happens to be one found, who, some fifteen or twenty years ago, was active in masonry, although imbibing none of its true spirit, who, from natural frame of mind, is opposed to its forms and ceremonies, and even advised his son not to enter its ranks, and is of opinion, "that a man who would eschew all evil, should not be a freemason," are hundreds, nay, thousands, of men as high in character as he is, even higher; the wisest and the best of the earth, to bow in faint submission to the cold principles of constitutional indifference, and denounce the cultivation of the mild and softening principles of charity and benevolence! Reason would weep at the demand, and judgment, in mercy to the maddened brain of man, would stay the sentence, the presumptuous sin deserved.

The writer, unable to make any charges against the institution, but what had been retailed and returned, and dealt out again, adopts a very singular mode of reasoning, to answer his ends, by ifs and suppositions. Thus:

"If masonry separates the members of the craft from their fellow citizens; if masons are led to believe that their duty toward each other is different from what it is to the members of the community not connected with them; if a mason is bound to shield another from the general operation of the laws, or if he be subjected to any penalties beyond those denounced by the legislature; if even a feeble minded man is made to believe that by becoming a mason, he enlists in an isolated corps, the members of which may claim privileges through their brethren, and must perform duties which do not belong to other citizens; if masonry is arrogant and impious in her pretensions, and delusive in her promises; if she claims to be coeval with the world, and to be of divine origin, when in truth it is but of yesterday; if lodges may be converted into secret political clubs"—and if, why did he not say, at once, the masonick institution is a wicked one—"it cannot be a fit institution in our country, where no man, in the discharge of his duties to the community, should act from fear, favour, or affection."

To avoid a monotony truly tedious, and being heartily ashamed of the frequent sound of if, he comes to suppositions.

"That we may be in no danger," he continues, "of violating the secrets of masonry, of having our judgement, biased by the antiquity it claims, or by respect for the many great and good men whose names are on the lists of its votaries, let us for a moment put it out of view, and suppose that it were now proposed to establish a society, which, with awful solemnities, and dreadful denunciations, should impose secrecy on its members; that they should separate themselves from the rest of mankind, and establish an intelligence by which they could, under any circumstances, make themselves known to each other; that the duties of the members, in regard to themselves, should be incompatible with the general order of society; that when a member of the association should make himself known to another, he might look to that other for special favour, whether it was to be dispensed at the polls of an election, from the jury box, or from the bench. Suppose that the members of this association were bound to screen each other, as far as in their power, from all evil by concealment or by more active exertions, to relieve them from all dangers and difficulties, however they might arise from demerit; suppose that all these obligations were to be imposed with awful religious ceremonies, and with sanguinary and horrible penalties, of which each member should consider himself pledged to be the executor; suppose this institution to have many grades, and that, at every advance, there are new ceremonies, new oaths, and new penalties, the highest differing from the lowest only in grossness of absurdity, and impiety of imprecation; and suppose, that the members of this new institution, decorated themselves with the trappings of royalty, and bestowed on each, sacerdotal, aristocratic, and even royal titles; who would hesitate to say that it would be profane and inconsistent with our religious, moral, and political institutions."

This ungenerous and cowardly mode of accusation, slandering by the aid of ifs and suppositions what he cannot and dare not directly attack, is unworthy the reputation of the author. I would rather be a traitor, and lie boldly, in a manner becoming treason, than to affect the christian and act the knave.

What he would fain imply by this language of indirect import, and what others, not belonging to the institution, would naturally infer, injurious to its character, I pronounce, and I pronounce it before heaven! to be false and unmerited.

The obligations of masonry do not interfere with any existing duty either to God, our country, or to man. So far from exercising an influence, incompatible with our best interests as citizens and christians, they demand the strictest observance of the laws of our country, and a constant adherence to the principles of divine revelation.

If you would have the testimony of another, upon this important truth, hear the words of one who is known to be eminent for his christian virtue and piety, and who has been engaged for many years in the sacred cause of religion. I mean the Rev. Amos Dewey of West Rutland, Vermont.

"I am willing," says Mr. Dewey, "to say openly and publicly that I do esteem the principles of masonry as worthy the attention of any man; and there is nothing in the obligations of the institution, nor in the ceremonies, which is inconsistent with the christian and ministerial character. And while I have for years absented myself almost wholly from the communications of the fraternity, on purpose to ease the feelings of those whose minds were prejudiced against it, I do still feel myself bound to assert, that I regard the anti-masonick excitement which is now agitating many portions of the civil and christian community, as one of the greatest curses which ever visited our land!"

I have yet to notice another portion of this letter, which is no less remarkable for its absurdity than for its impudence.

"I have known many persons," he writes, "whose brains have been turned by their elevation from humble occupations to royal titles and imaginary thrones. Indeed, I have never known a very great mason who was not a very great fool. I beg to be understood, I do not mean by very great masons, those who have stood highest in the estimation of the craft, and who have attained the highest masonick honours. I do not forget the names of Washington, Warren, Lafayette, Franklin, Robert R. Livingston, Jackson and Marshall, are justly the boast of the fraternity; no is it possible that I should ever forget that I have seen many venerated clergymen, sanctifying by their presence and their prayers, the labours, as well as the refreshments of a lodge. But I mean by great masons, those who are proud of their pompous titles; who are fond of decorations; who persuade themselves that the affairs of the world turn upon masonry; that without it, society could hardly exist, or if it did, would be deprived of its fairest ornament, and most beneficial arrangement."

Amounting to just this,—that if a fool happens to be made a mason, he necessarily makes a very great one. And the greatest fool he denominates the most distinguished member, saying, at the same time, he did not mean what he said, for remembering (blessed memory) the names of WASHINGTON, LAFAYETTE, and others, and being admonished by the fact, that our greatest men had been our greatest masons, he simply intended to say, that he never knew a very "great fool," who was a mason, who was not in masonry, as in every thing else, a very great fool. He is guilty, either of this profound logic, or of calling Washington, Franklin, and Lafayette, "very great fools."

But why was it necessary to pervert the meaning of words in order to convey to the world his opinion of the members of the institution, unless it were to bring his character into disrepute, by excepting men whom he dare not call fools, to gain the apparent privilege of employing the sweeping expression "that a very great mason is a very great fool."

Anti-masonick writers pretend to remember with feelings of respect and veneration, the distinguished members of our institution. They "do not forget that Washington was of our order," they do not forget that Franklin, Warren, Lafayette, Gridley, and Clinton were of our order—good heaven! what evidence is there that they "do not forget?" Do they not revile what Washington considered was designed "to promote the happiness of the human race," and encouraged, by establishing lodges in the tented field? Do they not ridicule that institution in which our illustrious Franklin was actively engaged, and according to the records of the Grand Lodge, was the most constant and punctual member ever known in this country? Do they not cry "murder" and "treason" against that institution of which Lafayette said "from its harmony and respectability throughout this country, it might well be regarded as affording an important pillar of support and union to its free institutions, and happy form of government?"

Having these examples, and many others of the same character and weight constantly before them, of what avail are these exceptions? Is he less a murderer, who speaks with a smile, before he stabs? If they honour so much these men, whose names they utter with such profound respect, heaven grant they may also soon be brought to honour their principles.

Claiming that candour which is due from one man to another, and the exercise of that reason which is naturally dictated by self respect, I appeal to those who are not of our order.

Do you object to the principles of masonry? they are the principles contained in the book of God. Do you object to masonick obligations? they are but vows to heaven, that we will faithfully answer the requirements of justice, charity, and benevolence. Do you dislike our forms and ceremonies? we are bound to preserve them unchanged, for the security of our privileges as masons, and against the intrusion of impostors. Do you object to our badges and jewels? they are but the keys to our treasures, and masonick emblems of duty. Do you object to the elegance of our halls, or the richness of our dresses? operating upon the associating principle of the mind, they have a tendency to give a pleasing character to the exercise of the christian virtues. Do you object against the secrets of the institution? first, know the secrets and their use, and then you would see the importance of preserving them. Do you object to its charity being confined to its members? Would you have us, by engaging to do too much, be able to do nothing? Is it not sufficient to silence this objection forever, that there is not on the face of the habitable globe, an institution (save that of christianity) dispensing one hundredth part so much for the relief and happiness of man? And aside from this, are not your masonick neighbours as liberal to the contribution box as you are? Shame, shame on this unfortunate disposition to envy! And, "though last, not least," do our fairer friends complain that they are debarred the privileges? the duties, peculiar to every station to which you are liable to be called, render it inexpedient for yourselves and the institution. Be assured, however, could you but know the masonic provision for your protection, reputation, and happiness, your characteristic perseverance would induce your fathers, brothers, husbands, and friends to entitle themselves to the knowledge of masonry, to study its principles, and practice them.

In the language of another, "I would ask you, my auditors, for I address those capable of judging, whether it is not in your opinion more probable that these enemies of masonry who are now so furious, in this moment of excitement, are wrong, absolutely wrong, in their conjectures, suspicions and denunciations, than that so many great and good men, patriots, christians, philosophers, statesmen, and scholars, should have attempted to deceive the world through so many ages and nations, and that too, without any possible object? Could saints and cardinals, kings, bishops, philosophers, republicans, philanthropists, and men of good, strong common sense in every walk of life, from the humblest to the most elevated, be wrong, be wicked, traitorous, and murderous, and the sagacious never yet have found it out, until within two years past. And then the discovery be made by those who never were known for having discovered any thing else?"

That the tyrant should condemn masonry, for its equalizing power; that the bigot should decry it heresy and treason, for its liberal influence; that the bad should revile it for its moral corrections and restraints; that the superstitious should fear it, from a perverted construction of its mysteries, is not strange, as they are all actuated by motives of selfishness, and governed by prejudice and passion. But, that honest and good men, men who before have been respected for their charitable and benevolent designs and deeds, men who have been justly esteemed candid and reasonable in their opinions and judgements, should declare hostility to an institution, whose grand object is the best good and happiness of the human race, is to me, truly strange and unaccountable.

That they should renounce all connexion with a neighbour, a friend, a brother, or a father, with whom they have passed their days of infancy, shared their sports and privileges, and entered upon the labours and cares of manhood, because he is a member of the oldest and one of the most respectable institutions in the world! To be willing to slander and detract from its merits; to persecute and stigmatize its members, because a few individuals of malicious character, and self-condemned perjurers, have set the example!

Could you but see the good mason treading his round of duty, "dispensing charity, protecting chastity, and facing the proud in defence of the humble; kindly sustaining the feeble, guiding the blind; feeding the hungry and clothing the naked; raising up the trodden down, and being a father to the orphan; refreshing and informing the stranger, guarding the altar, protecting the government, encouraging wisdom, loving man, and adoring God!"—your sad delusion would be seen, and the tongue, that now gives utterance to malice and reproach, would speak in tones of admiring approbation.

Brethren and companions, now that the enemies of our order are in motion against us, the eye of the world is turned upon our conduct. Be firm and steadfast; act in accordance with the masonic principles of charity and forbearance, and remember the worthy example of the venerable Molay, who, before he would turn traitor against an innocent institution of which he was a distinguished member, submitted to death with all its horrors by fire.

If the son of God, holy, pure, and free from all reproach, found traitors to his cause, is it strange that we, full of imperfections and errors, should find men untrue!

What though the storms of passion and the poisoned breath of slander assail us, we remain unmoved; storms and darkness may for a while obscure the face of day, but,

"The sun brighter bursts from the cloud,
When the tempest is swept from the sky."

Be true to yourselves, be faithful to your institution, and you will sustain the principles of justice, and fulfil the commandments of heaven.

EXPULSION.

To the Masters and Wardens of Lodges, and the Masonick Fraternity at large, throughout the state of Alabama—At a regular communication of Marengo Lodge, No. 27, held at Whitehall, in the county of Marengo, on the 16th day of May last, Benjamin Glover, a Master Mason and formerly a member of said lodge, was arraigned before it on charges of ungentlemanly and gross immoral and unmasonic conduct; and the charges against him being fully established, he was expelled from all the rights, benefits and privileges of ancient freemasonry for ever. You will take notice thereof, &c. JOHN G. AIKIN, G. Sec'y G. L. A. Tuscaloosa, Aug. 14, 1829.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the Charleston Courier.

RICE.

The Northern Editors who have noticed the remarks upon cooking Rice, will do still more good by extending the important information, that for the actual uses of life, the low priced Rice is equally as good as that which is termed prime. In fancy articles, appearances go a great way—but it is strange, that in an article of food, so great a mistake should still prevail. Prices depend very much upon the wholeness of the grains of Rice; a matter wholly indifferent for all useful purposes. It is almost ludicrous to see a Merchant squinting at a barrel of Rice, and shaking his head, with the remark—"it looks very well, but it is too much broken"—when the European consumer will put it into a mortar and reduce it to flour, before he makes his pudding. In Europe, Rice is generally pounded before it is cooked; and even where it is plain boiled, the breaking does not in the least deteriorate, either its appearance or taste. In fact if every broken particle were separated, those of us who know Rice by the eating, would prefer the broken. The small Rice, if properly cooked, is the sweetest—and for hospitals, for gruel, &c. is better than the Whole Rice—being, in truth, the eye of the kernel. The way to judge of Rice is this—select a parcel which is of a pearl colour, and partially transparent, you then can not err. A little more or less of flour, or breakage, is of slight consequence. The flour washes off in cleaning. Avoid yellow grain, green and coloured. The yellow is mow-burned, or heated in the stack—the green and black grains are but partially ripened, or bird sucked. But all pearly Rice is equally good for use. The great variety in prices, arises from the ignorance of the consumers; to suit their prejudices, Merchants will give twenty to fifty cents more, by the hundred, for whole grains, when not a jot of difference exists in its taste, nutriment, or any thing else. If the cook bought the Rice, no such difference would exist. The flour ought, in the first instance, to be cleaned off tolerably well, to avoid heating. But Rice stored in Charleston two years, during the last war, was skreened over, and was sold in Europe at the highest prices. It is the peculiar excellence of Rice, if insects eat it, they destroy only the softer parts—and the rest when washed and cooked, is as good as ever. If our own local Institutions used small and broken Rice, and they were more generally consumed at the Infirmary at the North, it would help the consumption. Let the large manufacturing companies send on Cloth and exchange it for Rice at a fair price, and they would do more to introduce the consumption of their goods, than in any other way; and their work people would rejoice in the introduction of an excellent vegetable. Both the rules for cooking Rice, require a little explanation. The Rice, it is true, need not actually boil, but it should be at about boiling heat, and then "soaked," which means any thing but soaking; it is a drying process, by which the Rice is equally softened, by permitting the water to pass through it in the form of steam. The real difference in Rice, lies in the cooking. All pearly Rice, well cooked, is white—the grains swollen and separate, yet perfectly done. We shall be glad to see the North and South shake hands upon this subject.

WACCAMAW.

* The cleaning, or scouring previous to putting it in the pot, is all important, it cleanses it, and prepares it for boiling.

RICE READ.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce recommends the mixture of rice flour with wheat flour in making bread. It greatly improves the quality. "My family" he says, "reside in the country, and I took an early opportunity to send a quarter of rice to mill to be ground, in the same manner as corn, without bolting. We made an experiment with a pound of wheat flour and a pound of rice flour in the first place; the rice flour having been swollen, or scalded before it was mixed, by placing it in a clean vessel, with water, wet in the usual way, with milk in the evening. It was found in the morning, so soft, that it was necessary to stir into it four pounds more wheat flour, to give it the consistency of bread. With this addition the loaves were made, and the result gave us ten pounds of the finest bread I ever saw. It was of showy whiteness—tender and delicious to the taste, and remained fresh much longer than bread prepared from flour alone. Subsequent trials have satisfied us that one quarter part of rice flour may be profitably used in making bread; that the weight is greatly increased, and the quality improved beyond calculation. If the publication of this fact shall tend to unite the interests of the south, to the north, by an additional link, I shall be happy to see it circulated from one end of our land to the other. The trial of it is easy. The result can not fail to be satisfactory to all who make it."

THE COSMOPOLITE.

DIET OF VARIOUS NATIONS.

To the artist, the amateur, the traveller, and man of taste in general, the following gleanings respecting the diet of various nations, are cordially inscribed. The breakfast of the Icelanders consists of skyr, a kind of sour, coagulated milk, sometimes mixed with fresh milk or cream, and flavoured with the juice of certain berries; their usual dinner is dried fish, skyr, and rancid butter; and skyr, cheese, or porridge, made of Iceland moss, forms their supper; bread is rarely tasted by many of the Icelanders, but appears as a dainty at their rural feasts with mutton, and milk-porridge. They commonly drink a kind of whey mixed with water. As the cattle of this people are frequently, during winter, reduced to the miserable necessity of subsisting on dried fish, we can scarcely conceive their fresh meat to be so great a luxury as it is there esteemed. The poor of Sweden live on hard bread, salted or dried fish, water-gruel, and beer. The Norwegian nobility and merchants fare sumptuously, but the lower classes chiefly subsist on the following articles:—oatmeal-bread, made in thin cakes (strongly resembling the haver-bread of Scotland) and baked only twice a-year. The oatmeal for this bread is, in times of scarcity, which in Norway frequently occur, mixed with the bark of elm or fir tree, ground, after boiling and drying, into a sort of flour; sometimes in the vicinity of fisheries, the roes of cod kneaded with the meal of oats or barley, are made into a kind of hasty-pudding, and soup, which is enriched with a pickled herring or mackerel. The flesh of the shark, and thin slices of meat salted and dried in the wind, are much esteemed. Fresh fish are plentiful on the coasts, but for lack of conveyances, unknown in the interior; the deficiency, however, is there amply supplied by an abundance of game. The flesh of cattle pickled, smoked, or dry-salted, is laid by for winter store; and after making cheese, the sour whey is converted into a liquor called syre, which, mixed with water, constitutes the ordinary beverage of the Norwegians; but for festive occasions they brew strong beer, and with it intoxicate themselves, as also with brandy, when procurable. The maritime Laplanners feed on fish of every description, even to that of sea-dog, fish-livers, and train-oil, and of these obtaining but a scanty provision; they are even aspiring to the rank of the interior inhabitants, whose nutriment is of a more delicate description, being the flesh of all kinds of wild animals, herbaceous and carnivorous, and birds of prey; but bear's flesh is their greatest dainty. Rein-deer flesh is commonly boiled in a large iron kettle, and when done, torn to pieces by the fingers of the major domo, and by him portioned out to his family and friends; the broth remaining in the kettle is boiled into soup with rye or oat-meal, and sometimes seasoned with salt. Rein-deer blood is also a viand with these people, and being boiled, either by itself or mixed with wild berries, in the stomach of the animal from whence it was taken, forms a kind of black-pudding. The beverage of the Laplanders is milk and water, broths, and fish-soups; brandy, of which they are extremely fond, is a great rarity, and a glass of it will warm their hearts towards the weary sojourner, who, but for the precious gift, might ask hospitality at their huts in vain. The diet of the Samoides, resembles that of the Laplanders, save that they devour raw the flesh of fish and rein-deer. For this people, all animals taken in the chase, and even those found dead, afford food, with the exception of dogs, cats, ermines, and squirrels. They have no regular time for meals, but the members of a family help themselves when they please from the boiler which always hangs over the fire. It is scarcely possible to name the variety of diet to be found among the Russian tribes; but even in cities, and at the tables of the opulent and civilized, late accounts mention the appearance of several strange and disgusting dishes, compounded of pastry, grain, pulse, vinegar, honey, fish, flesh, fruits, &c., not at all creditable to Russian gastronomick science. The diet of the Polish peasantry is meagre in the extreme; they seldom taste animal food, and both sexes swallow a prodigious quantity of schnaps, an ardent spirit resembling whiskey. The Dutch of all ranks are fond of butter, and seldom is a journey taken without a butter-box in the pocket. The boors feed on roots, pulse, herbs, sour milk, and water-souchie, a kind of fish-broth. In England, the edible produce of the world appears at the table of the nobility, gentry, and opulent commercial classes; and upon comparison with that of other nations, it will be seen that the diet of English artisans, peasantry, and even paupers, is far superior in variety and nourishment; bread, (white and brown) vegetables, meat, broth, soup, fish, fruit, roots, herbs, cheese, milk, butter, and, not rarely, sugar and tea, with fermented liquors and ardent spirits, are all, or most of them, procured as articles of daily subsistence by the English inferior classes. In Scotland, the higher ranks, live abstemiously, save on festive occasions; but animal food and wheaten bread is seldom tasted by the lower orders, who chiefly subsist on rye, barley, and oatmeal, prepared in bread, thin cakes, and porridge; this last termed stirabout, is simply oatmeal mixed with water and boiled (being stirred about with a wooden skether or spoon when on the fire) to the consistency of flour-paste, not very stiff; this, eaten with milk, forms the chief diet of the Scottish artisans and peasantry, and, indeed, many of superior stations prefer it for breakfast to bread of the finest flour which can be procured. Both high and low are partial to the following national dishes. The haggis, a kind of pudding, made of the offals or interior of a sheep, and boiled in the integument of its stomach; this dish, both in odour and flavour, is usually excessively offensive to the stranger; the singed sheep's head, water-souchie, Scotch soup, (an olla podrida of meats and vegetables,) chicken broth and sowens. Laver, a sauce made from a peculiar kind of sea-weed, and caviar, introduced from Russia, appear at the tables of the opulent, and by many are much esteemed. The diet of the higher ranks of Irish varies but little from that of the same classes in England and Scotland. Amongst national dishes appear the staggering bob, a calf only two days old, delicately dressed; hodge-podge, a soup answering to that of Scotland; colcannon, a mixture of potatoes and greens, seasoned with onions, salt, and pepper, finely braided together after boiling; and a sea-weed sauce, either laver or some other, the name of which we do not happen to remember. Potatoes, fish, (fresh and salted) eggs, milk, and butter-milk, form the principal support of the inferior class, of Irish; and whiskey the national ardent spirit of Ireland and Scotland, is but too often, as is gin in England, the sole support of a host of besotted beings, who drop into untimely graves, from the habit of intoxication.

To be continued.

THE GATHERER.

THE MOCKING BIRD.

In an article on American song-birds, in the "Magazine of Natural History," is an interesting account of the mocking-bird, which seems to be the prince of all song-birds, being altogether unrivalled in the extent and variety of his vocal powers; and besides the fulness and melody of his original notes, he has the faculty of imitating the notes of all other birds, from the clear mellow notes of the wood-thrush to the savage scream of the bald eagle. In measure and accent he faithfully follows his originals, while in force and sweetness of expression he greatly improves upon them. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond limits. They consist of short expressions of two, three, or at most five or six syllables, generally expressed with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued with undiminished ardour for half an hour or an hour at a time. While singing he expands his wings and his tail, glistening with white, keeping time to his own musick, and the buoyant gaily of his action is no less fascinating than his song. He often deceives the sportsman, and even the birds themselves are sometimes imposed upon by this admirable mimic. In confinement he loses little of the power or energy of his song. He whistles for the dog; Cæsar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to meet his master. He cries like a hurt chicken, and the hen hurries about, with feathers on end, to protect her injured brood. His imitations of the brown thrush are often interrupted by the crowing of cocks; and his exquisite warblings after the blue bird are mingled with the screaming of swallows or the cackling of hens. During moonlight; both in the wild and tame state, he sings the whole night long. The hunters, in their night excursions, know that the moon is rising the instant they begin to hear his delightful solo. His natural notes partake of a character similar to those of the brown thrush, but they are more sweet, more expressive, more varied, and uttered with greater rapidity. [Monthly Mag.]

THE "GOOD BOY" LOVER.

"When I was a lad," said a facetious gentleman to the recorder of the anecdote, "I was, or rather fancied myself to be, desperately in love with a very charming young lady. Dining at her parent's house one day, I was unfortunately helped to the gizzard of a chicken, attached to one of the wings. Aware, like most 'good boys' that it was extremely ungenteel to leave any thing upon my plate, and being over anxious to act with etiquette and circumspection in this interesting circle, I, as a 'good boy' wished strictly to conform myself to the rules of good breeding. But the gizzard of a fowl! Alas! it was impossible! how unfortunate! I abhorred it! No, I could not either for love or money have swallowed such a thing! So, after blushing, played with the annoyance, and casting many a side-long glance to see if I was observed, I contrived at length to roll it from my plate into my mouchoir, which I had placed on my knees purposely for its reception; the next minute all was safely lodged in my pocket. Conversing with the object of my affections, during the evening, in a state of nervous forgetfulness, I drew forth my handkerchief, and in a superb flourish, out flew the GIZZARD! Good heavens! my fair one stared, coloured, laughed; I was petrified; away flew my ecstatic dreams; and out of the house I flung myself without one 'au revoir,' but with a consciousness of the truth of that delectable ballad which proclaims, that 'Love has EYES!' I thought no more of love in that quarter, believe me!"

THE CHAMELEON.

"I had a chameleon which lived for three months, another for two months, and several which I gave away after keeping ten days or a fortnight. Of all the irascible little animals in the world, there are none so choleric as the chameleon: I trained two large ones to fight, and could, at any time, by knocking the tails against one another, ensure a combat, during which their change of colour was most conspicuous: this is only affected by paroxysm of rage, when the dark gall of the animal is transmitted to the blood, and is visible enough under its pelucid skin. The gall, as it enters and leaves the circulation, afford the three various shades of green which are observable in its colours—the story of the chameleon assuming whatever colour is near it, is, like that of its living upon air, a fable. It is extremely voracious. I had one so tame that I could place it on a stick opposite to a window, and in the course of ten minutes I have seen it devour half a dozen flies; its mode of catching them is very singular; the tongue is a thin cartilaginous dart, anchor shaped; this is thrust forth with great velocity, and never fails to catch his prey. The mechanisms of the eyes of the chameleon is extremely curious; it has the power of projecting the eye a considerable distance from the socket, and can make it revolve in all directions. One of them, which I kept for some months, deposited thirteen eggs in a corner of the room; each was about the size of a large coriander seed; the animal never sat on them. I took them away to try the effects of the sun; but from that period she declined daily in vivacity, and soon after died." [Madden's Travels.]

TROPICAL COUNTRIES.

Nature has, in tropical countries been prodigal of her favours. Man luxuriates in the profusion of her gifts, and roves through an Elysian paradise. They were intended as the residence of simplicity and innocence, and not as the abodes of profligacy and vice. In Jamaica, Nature has scattered her beauties in a manner wild, but harmonious—irregular, but delightful. She has opened her bosom to the nourishment of man, and desired him to live without toil if he would live without ambition. Is he hungry? He has but to extend his arm and the luxurious banana or exquisite plantain is ready to be received. Is he thirsty? The babbling brook or murmuring cascades rolls before him. Is he exhausted by heat? The spacious and out-spreading fig tree extends its impenetrable branches to afford him shelter and protection.

"—not that kind for fruit renown'd;
But such as at this day to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan, spreads her arms,
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree, a pillar'd shade,
High overarch'd, and echoing walks between."

Milton.

Is he luxurious? the milk and butter of the coconut will gratify his appetite. Yet this country, so favoured by nature, man has converted into a market-house. This country, in which the simplicity of the golden age might have existed forever, civilized man has deluged with the blood of innocence and filled with the groans of suffering humanity. [Washington Chronicle.]

In former days there was a professor in one of our New-England colleges, who was remarkable for moderation in all that he said or did. One of the quizzical students, in order to caricature this characteristic, so far as words can caricature, told the following story. The professor walked one day very deliberately from his house to the president's, a distance of some thirty rods. He there knocked, as was customary, at the president's study door, was bidden to come in; went in, shutting the door after him. The usual salutations passed alternately between the president and professor, such as, "how do you do, sir, how does your family, sir?" with the usual replies, "pretty well, I thank you; much as usual, I thank you," &c. Then, says the President, "please to take a chair, Mr. Professor." "I thank you sir, I cannot conveniently stay to be seated; I called to inform you that my house is on fire, and it is expected you will let me have the key, which opens the door which leads to the water engine for extinguishing the fire."

A young female help, so called in these days of refinement, in former days denominated a maid servant, was fond of using sonorous words, though her articulation was not very distinct. Hearing one remark on a pleasant day, that the weather was salubrious; she remarked on the next pleasant day that occurred that the weather was quite slobberous.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Western Monthly Review, for September.

ATTACK OF BRYANT'S STATION.

I know of no place nearer than the sources of the Mississippi, or the Rocky Mountains, where the refuge of a "Station" is now necessary. The last one in the west will soon have mouldered; and history and the lexicon will be the only depositories of the knowledge, what the term imports. Of the million readers in the United States, it is, probably, a large allowance, that five thousand of the first settlers of the west, or as we call them, the "old residents," have a distinct idea in their minds of the aspect and intent of the establishment. I have been in a number, that were erected on our north-western and southern frontiers, during the late war with Great Britain. I will endeavour to transfer to my readers the distinct picture, which was thus impressed upon my own mind.

The first immigrants, that fixed themselves in the fair valleys of Kentucky and Tennessee, came in companies and societies. A hundred neighbours, friends, connexions, old and young, mother and daughter, sire and infant, the house dog and the domestic animals, all set forth on the patriarchal wilderness trooping, as on a frolick. No disruption of the tender natal and moral ties, no revulsions of the reciprocities of kindness, friendship and love took place. The cement and the panoply of reciprocal affection and good will was in their hearts, and on their breasts, as they came over the mountains to the wide domain of the red men, and the wild howlers of the desert. Like the gregarious tribes, and the vernal emigrations of the sea-fowl to the interior lakes, they brought all their charities, their true home with them. Their state of isolation concentrated these kindly feelings. It has been found, that the current of human affections flows more full and strong, in proportion, as it is less divided, and diverted into numerous channels. This community, coming to survey new aspects of a nature, measured only by the imagination, new dangers, a new world, and in some sense a new existence, were bound to each other by a sacrament, as old as the human heart. I have a hundred times heard the remains of this race of the golden age deplore the distance and coldness of the measured, jealous and proud intercourse of the present generation, in comparison of the simple kindness, the frank and domestic relations of those primeval days, reminding me of the affecting accounts of the mutual love of Christians in the early periods of the church.

Another circumstance of the picture ought to be redeemed from oblivion. I suspect, that the general impression of fine ladies and gentlemen of the present day is, that the puritans of Plymouth, the episcopalians of Jamestown and the back-woodsmen of Kentucky and Tennessee were persons of an aspect, garb, beard, address, and toute ensemble, very little tending to tempt unregulated movements of the heart; in other words, precise, ugly, and natural dampers of love. Truth is, they were just the reverse of all this. Only mark, how careful the ruling elders and godly men of New England were, that the women should veil and conceal their charms. It is notorious, that a woman was churched there, for cutting off the ends of the fingers of her gloves, and exposing the tips of her dainty and delicate fingers to the manifest annoyance and disruption of the spiritual chain of thoughts in the bosom of the worshipping beholders. What other fact in all history bears, I had almost said, such sublime testimony to the charms of the charmers of that day? It stands, in fact, in the history of the triumphs of beauty, like the famed text quoted by Longinus in relation to sublimity. What fine fellows the Virginians must have been, to have melted down the stern hearts of the red women at the first glance, as in the case of Pocahontas!

However it may have been with the Atlantick progenitors, I have no doubt that the first settlers of Kentucky and Tennessee were a race of a beauty as rare, as their courage and virtues. I have conversed with some hundreds of these people; and they are the finest looking ancients, male and female, that I have seen, noble square forms, open chests, bright, clear and truth telling eyes. The ladies, I admit, had a little more of the amazonian, than comports with our modern notions of a pretty, square-rigged insect, made pale by strong tea, late hours, dissipation, brag, vinegar and chalk. But I can easily believe, what these venerable patriarchs affirm, that these people were, for the most part, perfect Apollos and Venuses. I have seen their sons and daughters; and I believe, that children are apt to inherit the physical and mental likeness of their parents; and it is my clear conviction, that there is, no where on our globe, a finer looking race of young men and women, than in these states. Nevertheless, love has softened down, even there, to a malady of slight fevers and chills, compared with the continued and ardent fever, which rioted in the veins of their fathers and mothers.

As I said, these emigrant societies brought all their charities with them. These feelings received even an accession of energy and intenseness from those peculiar circumstances, which render a similar sojourn in an Indian wilderness the strongest cement of neighbourly affections. The air, before the forests were levelled, was generally remarkable for its salubrity. The chase yielded the most salutary viands, and immeasurable appetite and digestion corresponding. To these denizens of the flowering wilderness life was the sensation of high health, Herculean vigour and redundant joy. It was invigorating to hear the exhalatory interjection, the safety-valve respiration, as they struck their well tempered axe into the enormous trunk of the tree, they were about to fall. These were the men, who were parents of the pionies and roses, that now bloom there; and of the men of square form, unblenching cheek, and sure rifle shot; the players with thunder-bolts, the swimmers of the Mississippi, and the challengers of a battle with a whole menagerie of panthers and wild-cats, with a supernumerary zebra to kick withal.

When the social band had planted their feet on the virgin soil, the first object was, to fix on a spot central to one of the most extensive upland alluvions of gentle swell and declivity, where paw-paw, cane and wild clover marked exuberant fertility; and where the woods were so open, that the hunter could ride in any direction at half speed. The curse of party feuds, and political asperity had not yet smitten the soil with sterility; and it yielded, almost without other cultivation, than planting, from eighty to a hundred bushels of maize to the acre; and all other desirable products in proportion. Game was so abundant, that two hunters would often kill enough in two days, to last a station of a hundred souls a month; and these robust young swains and damsels were not of your rice cake and wafer eaters neither. They walked, played, danced, hunted and loved in strength and gladness; and their consumption of tender venison was in proportion.

The next thing, after finding the central point of this hunter's paradise, was to build a "Station," which now remains to be described. It was desirable that it should be near a flush limestone spring; and if a salt lick and prodigious sugar maple orchard were close at hand, so much the better. The next preliminary step was, to clear a considerable area, so as that nothing should be left to screen an enemy from view and a shot. If a spring could be enclosed, or a good well dug in the enclosure, they were considered important elements; but as an Indian siege seldom extended beyond one or two days, and as water enough to last through the emergency, could always be stored in a reservoir; it was deemed still more important, that the position should be on a rising ground, as much as possible overlooking the adjoining forest. The form was a perfect parallelogram, including from a half to a full acre. A trench was then dug, four or five feet deep, and contiguous pickets planted in it, so as to form a compact wall ten or twelve feet above the ground. The pickets were of hard and durable timber, nearly a foot in diameter; and formed a rampart beyond the power of man either to leap, or overthrow, by the exercise of individual and unaided physical power. At the angles were small projecting squares, of still stronger material and planting, technically called flankers, with oblique port holes; so that the sentinel within could rake the external front of the station without being exposed to a shot without. Two folding gates, in the front and rear, swinging on prodigious wooden hinges, gave ingress and egress to the men and teams in time of security. At other times, a trusty sentinel on the roof of an interior building, was stationed so as to be able to descry at a distance every suspicious object. The gates were always firmly barred by night; and sentinels through its silent watches relieved each other in turn. Nothing can be imagined more effectual for its purposes, than this simple contrivance in the line of fortification. True these walls would not have stood against the battering ram of Josephus, or the balls of a six pounder. But they were proof against Indian strength and patience and rifle shot. The only expedient was, to undermine them; or destroy them with fire; and this could not be easily done, without exposing them to the rifle of the flankers. Of course there are a few recorded instances, where they were taken, when skilfully and resolutely defended. Their regular forms, in the central wilderness, their aspect of security, their social city show rendered them delightful objects to an immigrant, who had come two hundred leagues, without seeing a human habitation. Around the interior of these walls, the buildings of the little community arose, with a central clean esplanade for dancing and wrestling, and the other primeval amusements of the olden days. It is questionable, if heartier and happier eating and sleeping, wrestling and dancing, loving and marrying fall to the lot of their descendants, who ride in coaches, and dwell in spacious mansions. Venison and wild turkeys, sweet potatoes and pies smoked on the table; and persimon and maple beer quaffed as well, at least for health, as Madeira or nectar. The community spent their merry evenings together; and while their fires blazed bright within the little and secure square, the far howl of wolves, or even the solitary war-whoop of an Indian sounded in the ear of the happy and reckless indwellers, like the driving storm, pouring on the sheltering roof, above the head of the traveller, safely nested in his clean and quiet bed; that is, brought the contrast of comfort and security in more home felt emphasis to the bosom.

Such a Station was Bryant's in 1782. It was the nucleus of the settlements of that delightful and rich country, of which Lexington is the present centre. There were at this time but two others north of the Kentucky river. It was more open to attack than any other in the country. The Miami on the north, and the Licking on the south of the Ohio, were long canals, which led from the northern hive of the savages between the lakes and the Ohio directly to it. In the summer of this year, a grand assemblage convened at Chillicothe. The Cherokees, Wyandots, Tawas, Pottowattomies, and most of the tribes bordering on the lakes were represented in it. Besides their chiefs, and some Canadians, they were aided by the counsels of the two Girtys and M'Kee, renegade whites. I have made diligent enquiry, touching the biography of these men, particularly Simon Girty, a wretch whose name is of more notoriety in the instigation of the wars and massacres of these Indians, than any other in our records. No tortured captive escaped from them in those times, who could not tell the share which Simon Girty had in his sufferings; no burnings and murders, in which he assisted not either with his presence or his counsels. I have gained no specific information, except that they were supposed to be refugees from Pennsylvania. They added the calculating and combining powers of the whites to the instinctive cunning and ferocity of the savages. They had their warlike propensities, without their magnanimity; and their appetite for blood without their active or passive courage. They had the bad properties of the whites and Indians, unmixed with the good of either. The cruelty of the Indians had some show of palliating circumstances. But theirs was gratuitous, cold-blooded, and without visible motive. Yet Simon Girty, like the people, among whom he dwelt, sometimes took the freak of kindness, no reason could be assigned wherefore; and once or twice saved an unhappy victim from being roasted alive. This renegade lived in plenty; and smoked his pipe, and drank off his whiskey in his log palace, consulted by the Indians, as an oracle.

He was seen clad in a ruffled shirt, a soldier's coat, pantaloons and garters, belted with pistols and dirks; and wore a watch with an enormous length of chain and tassel of ornaments; all, probably, the spoils of murder; and as he had a strong affectation of wisdom, there is no doubt, but in these days he would have worn green spectacles. So habited, he swelled in the view of the unhappy Indian captives, like the peacock spreading his morning plumage. There is little doubt, that those saved by his interposition, were spared, that he might have white admirers, and display to them his grandeur and the extent of his influence among the Indians.

The great assemblage to which I have referred, gathered round the shrine of Simon Girty for counsel, touching the point, which it was expedient to assail. He painted to them the delights of the land of cane, clover, deer, and buffaloes; and the fair vallies of the Kentuckee, for which so much blood had been shed. He described the gradual encroachments of the whites; and the necessity of a determined effort, if they would ever regain possession of their rich and rightful domain. He warned them, if the present order of things continued, that the whites would soon leave them no hunting grounds worth retaining; and no means of procuring rum, with which to warm and cheer their desolate hearts, or blankets to clothe their naked backs. They were advised to descend the Miami, cross the Ohio, ascend the Licking and paddle their canoes to the very contiguity of Bryant's Station. The speech was received with yells of enthusiastic applause.

Away marched this cohort of biped wolves, howling through the forest to their canoes on the Miami. Girty, in his ruffled shirt and soldier coat, stalked at their head, silently feeding upon his own grandeur. The Station, against which they were destined, enclosed forty cabins. They arrived before it, August 15, 1782, in the night. In the morning the inhabitants were warned of their presence, by being fired upon, as they opened their doors. The time of their arrival was providential. In two hours most of the efficient males of the Station were to have marched to the two other Stations, which were reported to have been attacked. The place would thus have been left completely defenceless. The garrison found means to dispatch one of their number to Lexington, to announce the assault, and crave aid. Sixteen mounted men and thirty one on foot were immediately marched off to their aid.

MISCELLANY.

From the Journal of Health.

HEALTH.

Health was personified, in the mythology of the ancients, by the goddess Hygeia. With equal nature and poetry, they indicated as her favourite abodes, spots most remarkable for sylvan beauty—the mountain side with its shady grove, or the undulations of hill and dale with the clear meandering stream, while over the whole expanse blew the light western and southern breeze. She received no sacrifices of blood or oriental perfumes: her altar was strewn with flowers; her festivals were kept with the music of the shepherd's pipe, and the dance of the rustic maidens. Temples were erected to her in the cities; but she was most appropriately invoked in the sports of the gymnasium and palestra. Here the youth were trained to endurance of fatigue, and acquired that strength of body and contempt of danger, which made them the terror of their enemies. As at once relaxation from the severer exercises, and a means of renovating their vigour, they had frequent recourse to bathing. At Rome, the combatants in racing and wrestling, pitching the quoit and throwing the javelin—while yet warm and panting, would plunge into the Tiber. To this the poet of the Seasons alludes, when he says—

"Hence the limbs
Kneel into force; and the same Roman arm
That rose victorious o'er the conquered earth,
First learned, while tender, to subdue the wave."

Hygeia is ever the companion of true liberty, not less than of orderly habits and pure morals. The periods of the greatest degradation of the human species, from misrule and vice, have been also those of the most destructive pestilence; and hence it has been truly said, that general health is inconsistent with extreme servitude. The fourteenth century, in which the night of ignorance and barbarism was darkest in Europe, was also the age of the most numerous and almost universal plagues. With freedom and equal rights are associated diligence and success in the culture of the soil, and consequently greater purity of the air; dwellings are raised with a view not merely to temporary convenience, but permanent comfort; food is abundant and nutritious; and the free man is not afraid of tempting the cupidity of tyrannical superiors by a display of attire, either called for by his wants, or dictated by his taste.

Greece, with the loss of her liberty and the ruin of her cities, has an altered climate; and the country surrounding Rome, which could in ancient times boast of its hundred cities, is now a waste, tenanted by a scattered peasantry, who wear on their countenances the hue of disease and the imprint of slavery. Contrasted with this picture is the reverse change brought about by the free and frugal Hollanders, who converted dreary swamps into green and fertile fields, and built numerous and flourishing cities, on spots where the foot of man could not once have trodden with safety.

In every code of laws framed with an eye to the general good, there have been incorporated in it precepts for the preservation of health, and prevention of disease. Climate has been productive of the most remarkable differences in this branch of legislation. Without bearing this in mind, we should consider as absurd many of the injunctions of Moses and Mahomet, which were rendered of imperative necessity by the peculiar situation of the inhabitants of warm latitudes. In legislation like our own, which fluctuates with the wants and wishes of the people, it is very evident that a knowledge of rational precepts for the preservation of health, or, as they are technically called, the laws of Hygeine, must be of paramount value to guide to the enactment of good laws. This is a question of high interest to every citizen, whether he regard his individual welfare, or the flourishing condition of the body politick.

DECLINE OF EMPIRES.

From Memoirs of the Affairs of Europe from the Peace of Utrecht.

BY LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

The rise and decline of empires is a subject equally fitted to strike the fancy of the poet, to employ the labour of the historian, and to occupy the thought of the philosopher. Some of the most affecting and sublime passages of human eloquence have been called forth by a theme, which, on the one side, presents us with all that man has performed most glorious and most ennobling; while, on the other, it gives us a melancholy picture of the vanity of his greatest works. Cities and towers fall to the ground; a dominion which forms the pride of one generation excites the pity of another. But ours is a more sober task. Generally speaking, a state or country is seen to flourish when its members are moved by passions which require a common effort, and are directed to the common benefit. Freedom, commerce, conquest, love of glory, dominion of the seas, planting of colonies,—such are the most usual objects of rising and prosperous states. Each has one or more of these objects peculiar to itself, which form, as it were, its principle of life. Thus the spirit of Rome was formed of love of freedom and love of conquest; the spirit of Holland, of love of freedom and of commerce. So long as this spirit continues unabated, and has room to gratify itself, the state flourishes. It may exist in an absolute monarchy, as well as in a free state, but seldom endures; because the law of hereditary succession may change the spirit of the nation, at any moment, from activity to indolence, from conquest to pusillanimity. The decline of a state takes place in a similar manner when a passion tending to a common purpose, is exchanged for others aiming solely at the enjoyment of the individual, to be advanced by individual and selfish means. Thus when, owing to the corruption of their manners and institutions, the Romans grew to love their villas and their feasts better than war, their luxury (revenging the conquered world,) prepared the fall of the empire. Other causes of decline may be found in laws or institutions which check national energy; for instance, the Inquisition of Spain. Or, lastly a state may be outgrown by its neighbours. We often see, in a plantation, that a quick-growing tree for a time overtops and shades its fellows; but when it has reached its maturity, a plant of loftier nature equals, surpasses, and at length carries away from it sun and moisture. Like to this is the figure which we see made in history by countries which owe to the early maturity of their laws a superiority they can not finally preserve. Sparta and Athens commanded the civilized world, till Philip united his Macedonians under a compact and orderly government. In modern times, the states of Italy once maintained larger regular armies, and had more copious treasures, than England or France; but when the government of these kingdoms became settled, the small Italian republics fell into insignificance. In the course of the seventeenth century, all the nations of Europe, except Italy and Spain, made great progress in the arts of government and civil life; consequently new states sprung up, and the balance of power was altered by the decline of some countries and the rise and progress of others.

"UNWRITTEN" COUNTENANCES.

How little does he know of humanity, who looks to the countenance as an index of the "inner man," and how slight and shallow is that man's acquaintance with the workings of human feeling, who believes every one happy that wears a smile upon his lip! "Flavius is a happy fellow, for you never meet him but you find that comical countenance of his, lit up in the sunshine of its own whimsicality; and he never opens his mouth but to utter one of his own peculiar queerities. He lives upon his humour, and it is not possible that aught save fun, and wit and fancy ever occupies his mind. He is living a life of unembittered mirth, and travelling over the rugged pathway of humanity with griefless tread;—threading the sinuosities of life with light mind and untroubled footstep." This is a language that we have but too often heard used, and used too, to a being, himself the victim of the most intense sensibility, and who while he was listening to the convivial merriment around him—perhaps contributing his fall quota to it, was at the same moment writhing under the agonies of mental distress. Depend upon it, there is no judging of any man's feelings, by his looks, or by his language. He may be setting a table into a full roar of laughter, or he may be making you forget every thing but hilarity and the philosophy of old Democritus, in reading his pages, while his bosom is throbbing under the visitations of its own misery! We have known more than one such man. We have seen him imparting the liveliest feelings to those about him; we have seen every ear prepared to hear something witty from his lips, and every countenance holding itself in readiness to "stretch forth" to its utmost elongation of laughter, at what he should utter; and we never knew him to disappoint the expected luxury. But while we have witnessed this, we have known full well that he who ministered to the mirth of others, knew nought but sorrow himself! Apparent cheerfulness very often covers concealed woe, and a bright countenance is but too frequently the false flag which the desperate unfurl, when they would commit piracy upon human discernment!

CAMEL FIGHTS.

At particular seasons of the year, camel fights are common at Smyrna and at Aleppo. Such exhibitions are the disgrace of the vulgar (be they the high or low vulgar) of all countries; and the lion fights of the savage Romans, the bull fights of Spain, the bull and badger baitings and cock fights of England, and the camel fights of Asia Minor, are equally indications of a barbarian spirit, which can only be eradicated by knowledge and true religion. Of these, however, the camel fights appear the least objectionable. The camels of Smyrna are led out to a large plain, filled with eager crowds. They are muzzled, to prevent their being seriously injured, for their bite is tremendous, always bringing the piece out. A couple being let loose, they run at each other with great fury. Mr. Mac Farlane thus describes to us this curious scene: "One of the favourite holiday amusements of the Turks of Asia Minor is furnished by the camel combats. An inclosure is made, and two camels, previously muzzled so that they can not hurt each other much, are driven in, and incited to fight with each other. Their mode of combat is curious: they knock their heads together (laterally,) twist their long necks, wrestle with their fore legs, almost like bipeds, and seem to direct their principal attention to the throwing down of the adversary. During this combat, the Turks, deeply interested, will back, some one camel, and some the other; and they will clap their hands and cry out the names of their respective favourites, just as our amateurs do with their dogs, or as the Spaniards, at their more splendid and more bloody bull fights, will echo the name of the hardy bull or the gallant matador. The Pasha of Smyrna used frequently to regale the people with these spectacles in an inclosed square before his palace; and I saw them besides, once, at a Turkish wedding, at the village of Bournabah, near Smyrna, and another time on some other festive occasion, at Magnesia. I once, however, chanced to see a less innocent contest, which I have noticed in my volume of travels. This was on the plain between Mounts Sipylus and Tartalec and the town of Smyrna. It was a fight in downright earnest. Two huge rivals broke away from the string, and set to in spite of their drivers. They bit each other furiously, and it was with great difficulty the devidgis succeeded in separating these (at other times) affectionate and docile animals." [Menagaries.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

At a period when the operations of Russia attract the whole attention of the political world, it may be instructing—it certainly is curious, to recall the strides towards mighty empire which that power has been making during the last three hundred years. In the year 1476, Ivan the third, the last Grand Duke of Moscow, succeeded to patrimonial estates of—

	Geog. sq. miles.	Population.
In 1505, he died bequeathing	18,208	with 6,000,000
1535, died the 1st Czar, Vassili IV.	24,238	10,000,000
1584, died Ivan IV.	144,040	12,000,000
1598, died Feodor I.	150,414
1645, died Michael Romanof	237,933	12,000,000
1676, died Alexis	267,116
1689, succeeded Peter I.	271,371	15,000,000
1725, died Peter the Great	280,379	20,000,000
1740, died the Empress Anne	325,567
1762, succeeded Catherine II.	325,609	25,000,000
1725, died Catherine	335,646	26,000,000

1825, died Alexander, bequeathing to his successor, Nicholas I. a territory of 5,879,900 superficial square miles, and a population of 58,000,000 of souls! constituting an addition to the latter (in a short career of conquest, begun and ended within little more than one quarter of a century,) of twenty-two millions! We may throw in another two millions at least for the natural increase of the Russian population, conjointly with the forced increase of subjects pilfered from the Persian crown, during the three years of modest pretensions preferred by the present autocrat.

To this plain statement we may add Balbi's recent estimate of the Muscovite empire:—

Superfices in square miles	5,912,900
Population	60,000,000
Revenue	16,000,000
National Debt	52,000,000
Army and Navy	1,039,000
Ships of war	130

Though it may not altogether comport with the subject mooted in the foregoing details, it is at least germane to the popular excitement of the present hour, that we should show how very different is the relation in which Turkey now stands to Russia, to that in which she stood when the Muscovite first sought the honour of her acquaintance. Tempora mutatur cum illis! Anno 1490. The year in which Columbus discovered America was the year during which a species of distant acquaintance began between the Russian and Ottoman. At this time Ivan the Third employed Girai, to make the first overtures to Sultan Bajazet, by whom they were met with this laconic remark,—"If the prince of Moscow be thy brother, of course he is mine also!" A short time after came an autograph from Ivan to the Sultan, vindicating his friend, Girai, from certain calumnies. Anno 1514. The Czar Vassili sent Alexejew, one of his officers, with assurance of amity to Selim the First; and commanded him to say, "Our fathers lived on terms of brotherly unity, what reason is there that we, their sons, should not do likewise?" He was also directed not to throw himself upon the floor, but to keep his hands crossed upon his breast, to deliver the presents intrusted to him, and to ask after the Sultan's health; but not unless the latter should have previously made a similar inquiry as to that of the grand duke. This was the Selim, in whose time it grew into a common term of malediction. "Heaven grant you may be sultan Selim's grand vizier!" Because, says Aali, his historian, Selim's viziers were oftentimes limited to month's sway, and then delivered over to the executioner; for which reason it was customary for all the viziers appointed during his reign to carry their last will in their bosoms; and they deemed themselves new horn creatures, whenever they brought their heads upon their shoulders after they had had an audience!" It may be interesting to our readers to know, that the census of 1821 states the population of St. Petersburg at 422,166; of which 297,445 were males, and 124,721 females.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT MADE TOLERABLE,

OR PRISON DISCIPLINE IMPROVED.

To be able to accommodate ourselves to the circumstances of place, is one of the happiest qualities of our nature. We are indebted more largely to this composition in the mind for our enjoyment than almost any other. It prepares us for the changes and vicissitudes of life and however difficult it may seem at first to become familiar with new faces, new things, and new habits, examples are not wanting to satisfy us that they can be approached and conformed to without any very great diminution of our happiness. Cardinal de Retz once said that the happiest man he ever saw was a fellow shut up in one of the prisons in Holland. He did nothing but laugh at his fellow prisoners and occasionally looked through the grates of his cell and ridiculed those who were looking at him as a curiosity. He spent his whole time in laughing at the ridiculous things he saw, and finally, to satisfy the world that he was as well contented in one place as another, he gravely set about writing the life of his gaoler. Here was a philosopher whose submission to the shafts of misfortune and the ills of life is worthy of talking about. All he wanted to make him happy was to be in sight of man, he being, in his opinion, the most laughable object in creation.

But the best story we have seen connected with prison comforts, is one told in a Natchez paper. It seems that in the course of justice, two persons were brought before the court, both strangers to each other, the one a beautiful young lady of the age of nineteen, and the other a young man of twenty two. They had been arrested on separate charges, and had never seen each other until they were placed in the bar together, to plead to the indictments found against them. Both were convicted and each sentenced to one week's solitary confinement. But while their trials were going on, the rogue cocked a side long look at the fair prisoner and actually made love to her; and no sooner had the Court pronounced the sentence than he moved for permission to call with the lady on his return to prison at the office of a Justice of the Peace and be married, saying that they had agreed upon matrimony as probably the best way to mitigate the "miseries of confinement." The Court having considered of the matter, readily consented to the request of the prisoner, and they went off with light hearts and sunny smiles to receive execution of the sentence in the same cell; making true what the facetious Butler long ago said;

Quoth Hudibras, This thing call'd Pain,
Is (as the learned Stoick's maintain)
No! bad simplifier, nor good,
But merely as 'tis understood.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

A FRAGMENT.

Few men suspect, perhaps no man comprehends, the extent of the support given by religion to every virtue. No man, perhaps, is aware how much our moral and social sentiments are led from this fountain; how powerless a conscience would become without the belief of a God, how palsied would be human benevolence, were there not the sense of a higher benevolence, to quicken and sustain it; how suddenly the whole social fabric would quake, and with a fearful crash, sink into hopeless ruin, were the ideas of a Supreme Being, of accountableness, and of a future life, to be utterly erased from every mind. Once let men thoroughly believe that they are the work and sport of chance; that no superiour intelligence concerns itself in human affairs; that all the improvements perish forever at death; that the weak have no guardian, and the poor no avenger; that an oath is unheard in heaven; that secret crimes have no witness but the perpetrator; that human existence has no purpose, and human virtue no unfailing friend; that this brief life is every thing to us, and death is total, everlasting extinction; once let men thoroughly abandon religion, and who can conceive or describe the extent of the desolation which would follow! We hope, perhaps, that human laws and natural sympathy would hold society together. As reasonably might we believe that were the sun quenched in the heavens, our torches would illuminate, and our fires quicken and fertilize the creation. What is there in human nature to awaken respect and tenderness, if man is the unprotected insect of the day? And what is he more, if Atheism be true? Erase all thoughts and fear of God from a community, and selfishness and sensuality would absorb the whole man. Appetite, knowing restraint, and poverty and suffering having no solace or hope, would trample in scorn on the restraints of human laws. Virtue, duty, and principle, would be mocked and spurned as unmeaning sounds. A sordid self interest would supplant every other feeling; and man would become, in fact, what the theory of Atheism declares him to be—a companion of brutes.

PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

Seventy-five years ago, Gen. (then Major) Washington, made an excursion into the Western wilderness, and descending the Monongahela river in a canoe to its confluence with the Alleghany, wrote to Gov. Dinwiddie, that he considered "the land in the fork" (the present site of Pittsburg) as "extremely suited for a fort, as it had the absolute command of both rivers." The "land in the fork," which Washington examined with a soldier's eye, and on which he recommended the erection of a little military post to overawe the marauding savages of the neighbourhood, is now the largest inland town in the United States, containing about 20,000 inhabitants, the depot of a populous country, and possessing a manufacturing capital, of many million of dollars. The amount of merchandise which passed yearly through the warehouses of the city so long ago as 1815, was estimated at $20,000,000.

NEAPOLITAN SUPERSTITION.

The Neapolitan sailors never go to sea without a box of small images or puppets, some of which are patron saints, inherited from their progenitors, while others are more modern, but of tried efficacy in the hour of peril. When a storm overtakes the vessel, the sailors leave her to her fate, and bring upon deck the box of saints, one of which is held up, and loudly prayed to for assistance. The storm, however, increases, and the obstinate or powerless saint is vehemently abused, and thrown upon the deck. Others are held up, prayed to, abused, and thrown in succession, until the heavens become more propitious. The storm abates, all dangers disappears, the saint last prayed to acquires the reputation of miraculous efficacy, and, after their return to Naples, is honoured with prayers.

The Rochester anties and the famous "central committee" are beginning to reap the rewards of their honesty and patriotism. It will doubtless be recollected by our readers that before the election last fall, a handbill was issued, signed by a number of the anti-masonick managers in Rochester, charging certain individuals who supported general Jackson, with having negotiated a note for $1500, for the purpose of corrupting the electors of Monroe county. A suit was brought against a number of those who signed this libellous handbill, so as to enable them if possible to give it a little better support than their own words. This the honest gentlemen have declined, and in order to obtain a discontinuance of the prosecution, have published a card confessing that their accusation was false, and have paid the costs of prosecution, amounting to between five and six hundred dollars! The names of the "order and decency" men who have thus "suffered for their country's good," are Harvey Ely, E. M. Parsons, James W. Smith, John Merchant, and S. G. Andrews. We doubt not their patriotism is cooled a little now, and we would not wonder if it should take a Rip Van Winkle nap.

At a late term of the circuit court, at Rochester, Fredrick Whittlesey, the anti-masonick District Attorney of Monroe county, delegate to the famous anti-masonick convention of this state, Secretary to the "Morgan committee", and missionary from the same to the Harrisburgh convention, &c. &c., was fined one hundred dollars for an assault and battery committed upon a brother lawyer, while drinking with him in a bar-room. This gentleman and the libellers have given a very good illustration of anti-masonick respect for "truth" and "the law;" they would not however be alone in their sufferings if all who are equally deserving were treated in a similar manner.

The lodges of the province of New Brunswick contemplate forming themselves into a Grand Lodge, "independent of that of England or any other place." We have received from Saint John, a copy of a circular, setting forth the reasons for desiring the adoption of this measure; and upon a perusal of it, we think that, under the circumstances, the proposed Grand Lodge would materially benefit the interests of the fraternity, and contribute to the advancement of its benevolent purposes.

"We are credibly informed that several anti-masons were so disgusted with Southwick's performance here on the 11th, that they have openly abandoned the party."

The above is from the Saratoga Sentinel, and the disgust that it mentions may be taken as a fair specimen of the effect of Southwick's orations. His impudence, impiety, vanity, and insane zeal, carry death to the hopes of his party, wherever he goes. For this reason we regret that he has been, the present week, prevented by one of his creditors from making a display in Montgomery county.

We copy the following literary morsel from the Genius of Universal Emancipation. If the editors are under the necessity of driving logic into the heads and feeling into the hearts of such fellows, they will need to realize the Spanish blessing and "live a thousand years." Some of the anti-masons in this state are fair matches for Mr. Rouse—all their intelligence and feeling is in their purses and hides.

March of Mind. The following advertisement was seen on a store door, not long since, in one of the eastern counties of North Carolina, and was copied verbatim by a traveller:—

Joshua Rouse

From the Saratoga Sentinel.

The virtuous anti-masonick convention on the 11th inst. at this place, resolved to disconnect themselves entirely with the two old political parties. The chastity of the honourable chairman, and of the leading delegate from Waterford, and the incorruption of their orator, who immortalized himself on the Bank of America question, make it very natural for them to shrink from all contact with two parties old enough to understand them. They could have done this without a formal resolution. The same meeting, by Mr. John Metcalf, and others of their committee, denounced the masonick and Tummany societies. These sensitive plants (the anti-masons) become more and more susceptible as the season advances; and it is to be hoped that by another meeting Mr. Metcalf will be prepared to shrink from the Washington Benevolent Society, of which he was so conspicuous a member during the late war. If he will develop the hidden political mysteries of that institution, the mock and religious cant which he has transfused into his address, and resolutions may pass off with a better grace. This, I suppose, though, was done in compliment to the "man of sin," who made the political prayer for the day. Such a chaste combination must lead to something extraordinary. Who would be surprised if our friends of the feminine gender should hold meetings, and resolve, with some of their sisters at the west, to marry no man except he is an anti-mason? PORCUPINE.

FIRST BATTLE BETWEEN THE MEXICANS AND THE SPANIARDS. By an arrival at Baltimore, intelligence has been received in that city from Tampico to the 1st of Sept. inclusive. The town was still in possession of the invaders. Their number was variously stated from 3000 to 5000 troops. Gen. Santa Anna, with the Mexican army, was encamped near the place. A short time before the sailing of the vessel that brings the intelligence, gen. Barradas marched 20 miles into the interior, leaving 250 men in Tampico. During his absence, the Mexicans, numbering about 1700, attacked the latter, but were repulsed, with a loss of 60 or 70 killed and wounded. During the engagement Barradas re-entered the town. The Mexican troops were throwing up fortifications, and had given notice to the foreigners, that they intended to bombard the place on the 30th Aug. In consequence, the foreign merchants left their houses, and went on board of the American sloop of war Hornet, lying outside the bar. The bombardment did not take place, probably owing to the works not being finished. The Spanish troops conducted with great propriety towards the inhabitants, and no outrages had been committed. About 600 were sick. So confident were they of ultimate success, that there was not a single Spanish ship of war or transport on the coast. "They intended to make further efforts to induce the desertion of the Mexican soldiers, not one of whom had as yet joined the invaders. The arrival of the troops who were driven into New Orleans in the ship Bingham, and of fresh troops from Havana, was daily expected. American vessels and property were much respected. The officers of the Hornet had gone on shore and visited the Mexican commander, and returned through the Spanish forces without hindrance or molestation." The above particulars are principally abridged from the account given by the Baltimore American. The Baltimore Gazette, from the office of which paper we have also been favoured with a slip, contains a letter from a correspondent, in which it is stated that the attack of the Mexicans would have been completely successful, but for the speedy and unexpected return of Barradas, who had gone to Altamira to surprise gen. La Garza expecting to capture the old general and all under his command without loss on his part. "At 2 o'clock on the morning of the 22d ult. the fight commenced in the streets and from the tops of the houses and continued until 10 o'clock, when the Spaniards called a parley and agreed to surrender to Santa Anna; but gen. Barradas who was glad to get back from his visit to Altamira, arriving at the time with his forces, changed the fortune of the day. Santa Anna re-surrendered the town and retired with his troops unmolested to his former position at the old town of Tampico, where he now remains augmenting his forces, which he does with great facility, every Mexican in that neighbourhood from the age of 16 to 80 joining him." [N. Y. Eve. Post.

FROM BUENOS AYRES. Intelligence has been received at Baltimore from Buenos Ayres, by the arrival at that place of the Schooner Virginia, which sailed on the 14th August. General Lavalle continued at the head of the government, and affairs remained in pretty much the same posture as they were at the sailing of the Two Marys, which brought the last previous accounts. The perturbation of the public mind, however, seemed in a great measure allayed; and the papers state that the recurrence of a civil war is no longer dreaded. A proclamation of governor Lavalle, dated August 12, contains assurances to the same effect. An extract of a letter in a slip of the Baltimore American says—"public confidence is much restored, business is gradually improving, and we expect to see it shortly resume its former activity."

General Lavalle had provided himself with a new ministry, whose appointments he officially announced on the 7th of August, as follows: Manuel J. Garcia, to be secretary of the treasury; Thomas Guido, to be secretary of state and foreign relations; Manuel Escalada, to be secretary of war and marine; J. A. Gelli, to be minister of police.

An aboriginal burying ground was recently discovered in Salem, Mass., while levelling a piece of ground. The bodies, mostly adults, were interred in groups of three and four, lying parallel to each other. The bodies, or bones rather, lay on the right side, the faces towards the rising sun. The bones of animals, deposited probably for provision, were found in the several graves. It is supposed from the manner of interment that this burial ground was used at the time of the sweeping plague of 1617. [Conn. Jour.

Mexico. The Mexican general St. Anna has been repulsed in his first attack on the Spanish invaders at Tampico. But petty victories are almost as fatal to an invading force as defeats. Such force is wasted away, and finally annihilated, by a protracted war against the whole population of a country. [Bost. Palladium.

The three legislatures of Mexico petitioned the General Congress for the expulsion of Mr. Poinsett, the U. S. ambassador, which was negatived—yeas 19, nays 23. Mr. P. has published an answer to the petition. The treatment which Mr. P. has received is another proof of the folly of revolutionary jealousy. [Id.

Dr. Pascalis of New-York, has written an account of the Siamese Boys—"Homo Duplex"—to the Medical Society of Paris. A brick manufactory is established in the city of New-York, which makes 25,000 bricks a day. The clay is taken from the bank, thrown into a hopper, broken and pressed into moulds by a machine, and immediately placed in the kiln for burning; the bricks are said to be good, and to sell from five to eight dollars per thousand. A letter from Manchester, August 5, gives a most gloomy account of the diminution of business. It is not, says the writer, owing to a temporary cause, but seems a gradual declining of affairs, that leaves no promise for the future.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

TO ———.

You remember the days of the olden time,
When the summer of youth was in its prime;
When the light heart leaped in the bosom gay,
And the eye was illumed with the smiles of May;
When the bounding breast rose high with joy,
And pleasures seemed blooming that ne'er would cloy.

Oh! those were the moments of joy and ruth,
And that was the season of open truth;
The thoughts that sprung from the guileless breast
Were bright as the hill where the sunbeams rest,
And the sorrows that shaded the lovely scene
Passed off like the sun-kissed dews of e'en.

And true were the friends of that early day,
And sure was the faith that would truest repay,
And the heart that opened its portals too,
Met with confidence equally frank and true:
Like the sky unstained by a summer cloud,
Not a shade of doubt did that faith enshroud.

And don't you remember the evening stroll
In the witching twilight, when Fancies roll
Like flitting spirits across the mind,
And the rising soul from its clogs unbind,
And send it away through the mellow air
To the orbs that are shining in splendour there?

At such rapt moments, the wandering breeze,
That stirred not, rustled the quiet trees,
Was an emblem meet of the soul's mild calm,
When feeling nought but affection's balm:
Oh, those hours had pleasures too high and pure,
To much like heaven to long endure.

And alas, the friends of those days are gone,
And those loved resorts are now still and lone,
Or profaned by the stranger's careless tread;
And if through those scenes you again are led,
'Twill be in the rapt and silent hour,
When Fancy puts forth her magick power.
'Twill be when memory, with seeking eye,
And glance retrospective, looks back to sigh
As she catches the forms of the kind and true,
Who shared the bright joys of youth's morn with you:
Then will you revisit those scenes, and then
Act over in Fancy those joys again.

A VISIT TO THE GRAVE OF A CHILD.

"Here is his peaceful bed,—
Beneath this humble mound
He sleeps,"—the mourners said,
Then bent upon the ground.

Beside them knelt a sweet,
A lovely cherub,—he
Had come with gentle feet
To bend his little knee
Upon his brother's bed,
Where slept the precious dead.

No sighs were heard,—a deep
And mournful feeling spake
Within,—'twas sad to weep
And feel the past awake.

To feel that beauteous head,
Again upon the breast,
And kiss that cheek of red
While in its living rest.—

To gaze upon that brow
Of snow; those calm, blue eyes,—
Yet know that dear one now,
Deep in the cold earth lies!

A Sabbath hush there lay,
Around the mourning pair,
It seemed as grief that day
Breathed in the still, calm air.

But Christians may not mourn
In hopeless agony.—
O God! to thee we turn—
Vite first—child—he lives with thee.

NAPOLEON.

BY GRENVILLE MELLER.

"Napoleon, when in St. Helena, beheld a bust of his son, and wept."

Long on the Parian bust he gazed,
And his pallid lips moved not;
But when his deep cold eye he raised,
His glory was forgot;
And the heated tears came down like rain,
As the buried years swept back again—
He wept aloud!

He who had fearless rode the storm
Of human agony,
And with ambition wild and warm,
Sailed on a bloody sea,
He bent before the infant head,
And wept—as a mother weeps her dead!
The pale and proud!

The roar of the world had passed—
On a sounding rock alone,
An exile, to the earth he cast
His gathered glories down!
Yet dreamt he of his victor race,
Till, turning to that marble face,
His heart gave way,

And nature saw her time of power—
A conqueror in tears!
The mighty bowed before a flower,
In the chastisement of years!
What can this mystery control!
The father comes, as man's high soul
And hopes decay.

Alone before that chiselled brow,
His proudest victories
Flit by, like hated phantoms now,
And holier visions rise—
The empire of the heart unveils,
And lo! that crownless creature wails
His days of power.

The golden days whose suns went down,
As at the icy pole,
Lighting with dim but cold renown
The kingdom of the soul!
When all life's charities were dead,
And each affection failed or fled
That withering hour!

Oh! had the monarch to the wind
His hope of conquest flung,
And to the victory of the mind
Had his warrior footsteps rung,
What then were desert rocks and seas,
To one whom destiny decrees
Such fadeless fame!

Oh! had the tyrant cast his crown
And jewels all away—
What though the pomp of life had flown,
And left a lowering day!
Then had thy speaking bust, brave boy,
Awake with memories of joy
Thy fated name!

From the Edinburgh Literary Gazette.

PARODY OF "OH! NO, WE NEVER MENTION HER."

Oh! no, I never drink a drop;
A bottle's never seen;
My lips are now forbid to taste
What all my joy has been.

They think the gout that harrows me
Has banished my regret;
And if I smile, they vainly think
That I my grog forgot.

They bid me, in exchange for grog,
Seek charms in drinking tea;
But all the tea in Christendom
Would work no change on me.

Alas! I now behold no more
The crouy whom I meet;
I visit not the publick house—
But how can I forget?

They tell me he lives sober now,
Once rummest of the rum;
They hint he's to be married now—
I know it's all a hum.

Like me he grumbles loud, that we Can't meet as we have met;
And if he drank as I did drink,
He never can forget.

JOY.

Joy!—Joy!—Joy!—
Comes bounding o'er the plain,
A rosy, laughter-loving boy,
'Mid pleasure's sportive train!
Around his brows a viny wreath
With the blushing rose is twined,
And his scented locks rich odours breathe
To ev'ry passing wind!

Joy!—Joy!—Joy!—
His smile is like the morn,
As he roams a jolly hunter boy
'Mid the sound of hound and horn!
While echo bears on ev'ry breeze
His spirit stirring voice,
And his care-dispelling melodies
Make the leafy woods rejoice!

Joy!—Joy!—Joy!—
He decks the festal shrine,
And the bright eyes of the laughing boy
O'er the wine-cup gaily shine!
He leads the revel and the dance,
He chaunts the bridal song,
And sports in beauty's sunny glance
Life's glowing scenes among!

MASONICK RECORD.

MASONICK CONVENTION,

Of the Counties of Madison, Chenango and Cortland.

At a convention of delegates from several Masonick bodies in the counties of Madison, Chenango, and Cortland, held at the village of De Ruyter, on Wednesday, the 2d day of September, 1829, for the purpose of taking into consideration the unhappy excitement which now exists against Masonry, and to adopt such measures as are deemed most expedient to allay the excitement, and again restore peace and harmony to society—

The Hon. ERASTUS CLEVELAND was called to the chair, and Russel Case and William Berry, Esquires, appointed secretaries.

Resolved, that should there be any persons present wishing to hear the deliberations of this convention, that they be invited to take a seat therein.

The object of the meeting having been stated from the chair—whereupon

Ellis Morse, William J. Hough, Perry G. Childs, Abel Chandler, Paul Rice, J. Fowler, Jairus French, Sylvester Beecher, John Lucas, Bennet Bicknell, G. Chittenden, B. Butterfield, Benjamin Enos, Nathan B. Wilber, A. B. Smith, Robert Riddle, S. Campbell, and Marvel Underwood, were appointed a committee to draft resolutions and an address expressive of the sense of the convention.

The committee, after deliberating upon the subject matter by themselves, reported the following preamble, resolutions and address, which were unanimously adopted by the convention:—

Whereas, several Masonick bodies in the western part of this State have, we believe from a sincere desire to allay the excitement unhappily existing against them, surrendered a portion of their constitutional rights, by returning their charters and absenting themselves from all Masonick communications, to the result of which we have long looked with intense anxiety, sincerely hoping that the concession would be met with a like conciliatory spirit on the part of our opposers, and peace again be restored to a distracted community. Instead of which, with sorrow we have seen that the leaders of the anti-masonick party have seized upon it for sinister purposes, and in the tumult of passion endeavoured to awaken a credulous and blind spirit of hostility against us in the minds of our worthy and honest fellow-citizens.

Yet as good and peaceable citizens, we consider it our duty at all times to use our best endeavours to promote the peace and harmony of society, and especially at this time to allay if possible the unhappy excitement against masons, and therefore feel willing to make any honourable sacrifice to appease the feelings of that part of community who from honest motives are acting under mistaken ideas relative to our institution.

But believing from what has transpired, that the returning of our charters and withdrawing ourselves from all masonick communications would not have the effect, and that public opinion therefore does not demand this sacrifice to be made, which would be conceding to ambitious aspirants a step towards anarchy and intolerance—therefore

Resolved, that in the opinion of this convention, it would be inexpedient to take measures for the surrender of masonick charters, and that we recommend to all masonick bodies the propriety of retaining their charters, with a strict and regular attention on all masonick communications, as the strongest testimonials of their integrity as citizens, and attachment to their inestimable civil and religious privileges.

Resolved, that as the principles of masonry are opposed to party feuds and political combinations, we will not as masons unite our influence with any political party whatever.

Resolved, that as the principles of masonry teach us to submit to whatever form of government we may chance to fall under, and as we feel and enjoy in common with our fellow-citizens the blessings which flow from a republican government, that we deem it our indispensable duty as good citizens to oppose all attempts of factious demagogues to overthrow our republican union, or in the least to abridge the civil or religious rights of any class of our fellow-citizens.

Resolved, that we deeply deplore and sincerely lament that the common respect and deference due to our late revered Grand Master and fellow-citizen DE WITT CLINTON, should have been so far disregarded by any American citizen as has been evinced in recent publications by some of the profligate organs of the anti-masonick party, which every friend to his country must view with indignation as a foul and detestable calumny upon the venerated dead. And

Whereas, masons are charged with binding themselves by solemn oaths "to assist a brother whenever they see him in any difficulty, whether he be right or wrong: to vote for a brother mason in preference to any other person: to keep the secrets of a brother mason, murder and treason not excepted"—therefore

Resolved, that we know of no such obligations in the masonick institution: masonry requires not of its members the performance of any act in contravention of the laws and usages of our country, or contrary to our moral or religious duty to man, our country or our god.

Resolved, that the following address be signed by the delegates present, and that the proceedings of this convention be published.

ADDRESS.

Fellow Citizens—believing that the time has arrived when an honest exposition of our feelings and opinions in regard to masonry, and the agitation of the public mind towards us as masons, will receive a more candid and impartial consideration than at any former period of the present excitement, has induced us to appeal to your sober and dispassionate consideration; and in this address to give you our united views of this subject, and frankly to avow our firm and decided purpose of strictly adhering to the fundamental principles of the institution. Facts and observations plainly declare that the public feeling is becoming more charitably inclined towards us; and we cherish the hope that the causes which have arrayed public indignation against us will soon cease to exist, and when that period arrives, we are anxious to be found worthy of the respect of our fellow citizens and of our own. We wish for peace, but wish for it on honourable terms—on terms which will not sully our integrity, and on such terms only will we accept of it. If the olive branch of peace is to be proffered on no other terms than that we turn apostates and traitors, and openly renounce through the public journals that which we honestly and sincerely believe, thus adding hypocrisy to crime—we most solemnly affirm that we will not accede to it. No; we never can so far sacrifice our feelings, our veracity, and that sense of character which honour and virtue teaches us to venerate. Truth is a divine attribute, the foundation of virtue, and by its dictates we are taught to regulate our conduct. We have pledged ourselves by the most sacred obligations to practice morality and virtue, and by it to maintain the strictest integrity, and to keep the principles of our order inviolate; and should we from base and corrupt motives stain our garments with treachery, defamation and falsehood, we should feel that the ignominy of reproach, the infamy of depravity, and the scorn of mankind would justly pursue us to the end of our existence.

From these and many other considerations, we are determined to maintain our integrity and strictly adhere to the fundamental principles of masonry, and leave our motives to the dispassionate judgement of a candid world.

Neither do we wish to shrink from investigation. We do not object to decent and rational discussion. We have no wish to abridge the rights of others, to whatever sect or class of community they may belong, or in the least to restrain any one in the full enjoyment of his privileges and immunities. No: discussion and opinion in a government like ours, ought to be free as air; and we have not the least desire to stifle a free inquiry into the merits of the institution, or to prevent a cool and dispassionate discussion of its principles; but our object in this address is not to sustain the edifice of masonry, but to vindicate our personal characters as citizens, and if possible to put an end to that distracted state of feeling which has well nigh closed every avenue to social intercourse in this section of the state.

We deeply deplore that an event should have taken place which has enlisted the angry feelings of so many of our worthy and honest fellow citizens against us; and out of deference to their standing in community, we wish not to accuse them of dishonesty of purpose, but ascribe their motives to an honest but mistaken zeal for the wholesome administration of justice. And when time and circumstances shall have convinced them that the principles of masonry shrink from the blaze of faction and the sanguinary conflict of political intriguers, that no plots or conspiracies can be fostered in its bosom; that in most ages of the world, statesmen and divines, distinguished for patriotism, talents and piety, and all the most estimable and charitable virtues, have enrolled themselves on its tablistures, and acknowledged its moral and benevolent influence upon the human heart, and its well directed philanthropy and universal benevolence towards all mankind—that then they will grant us that respect and confidence which alone is due to the strictest integrity and unabused fidelity. And we would respectfully ask of them, whether an association of men differing so much in rank, age, education, political views and religious sentiments, would be in the least degree favourable for the organization of factious conspiracies. But to those who have arrayed themselves against us from sinister or political motives, the same deference is not due, nor can their conduct be ascribed to the same honourable motives; and we do not expect to satisfy the persecuting spirit of the profligate politician and the treacherous hypocrite, who have volunteered in this warfare of indiscriminate extermination for self aggrandizement, or to gratify the spirit of disorder and political intrigue. They combine a discordant association; "there, among the most active, may be seen an individual scoffing at all religion, and openly avowing his disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being: here, another whose profligate life has made him the object of public notoriety; and there again, in close communion with these, another appears, who with" shameless and "blasphemous impudence" declares that "anti-masonry emanated from the throne of God". "From such a combination the public must turn with disgust." And when reason and judgement shall have resumed their empire, and the tumult of passionate excitement is over, their "disappointed expectations, blasted hopes, and waning popularity" can afford them but a melancholy reproof, that it was a restive and ungovernable spirit of sordid ambition bursting through all the bonds of social nature. Yet of these classes of our opponents, we would ask to view us as men whose interest, happiness and welfare are deeply interwoven with theirs, and for a moment to reflect, that violent and inflammatory language, and strong appeals to the passions of men in a state of excited feelings are never permanent or lasting, and if reason and sober reflection cannot overthrow the edifice of masonry, the battery of persecution will be used upon us in vain; and that all attempts in cases of violent excitement to infuse the poison of despotick principles into the minds of the weak and unwary, are but so many steps towards anarchy and intolerance. Commencing at the destruction of all the sympathies of domestic life and kindred blood, bursting asunder all the moral ligatures of friendship, of neighbourhood, and of country, and ending only in the destruction of "the adamant rock of human rights," "the sacred bond of our social union," for the support of which our fathers mutually pledged to each other, their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honour." And with the strictest fidelity to their sacred trust, a Washington, a Warren, a Lafayette, and a long line of departed worthies stood forth its fearless defenders. Oceans of human blood were spilt, and the spirits of many of our dearest kindred left the field of battle to plead the cause of liberty before the court of heaven. And these again bear witness of the peaceful character and purity of the principles of masonry, which at that eventful period so often sustained "sinking nature, struggling against" the pestilence of war and a "world's vicissitudes," and that its principles and precepts are all in strict accordance "with that unerring word which we all profess to believe should be the standard of human actions," and aimed only at the amelioration of human sufferings. These are testimonials which can not be controverted, and although we do not expect they will satisfy that class of our opponents who are determined to persevere in their crusade of proscription, right or wrong. Yet such are not the moral feelings of community. They wish only to be convinced—to be satisfied; and to their candid judgement we address ourselves, and will endeavour in the soberness of truth to answer more specifically the leading charges preferred against us as Masons.

"Much has been exhibited to the world purporting to be disclosures of the secrets" and obligations "of Masonry, which is shocking to the feelings of the Christian and philanthropist, and which if true would have driven from its pale long ere this every member possessing the least moral principle or refinement." A specific answer to all these would far exceed the bounds and limits of an address, and in this way can not reasonably be required of us; "but to all those which have been thus directly brought against us, we give an absolute denial," and in the soberness of truth we affirm that we know of no obligations in Masonry which require us to conceal the commission of crime, or to interfere with or in the least to obstruct the speedy and wholesome administration of justice; but on the contrary, the principles of the Order imperiously require us to be obedient citizens to the laws of whatever government we may chance to live under, and in obedience to these requirements we have always considered it our duty to use our best endeavours to detect and bring to condign punishment every species of crime known to be committed against the constituted authorities.

We sincerely regret the high-handed offence committed by some of the members of the Fraternity upon the liberty and perhaps the life of a fellow being. And we join with you, fellow-citizens, in the expression of horror and detestation against the perpetrators of so high handed an offence against the majesty of our laws. And to us, as well as to you, a cloud of mystery yet hangs over the scene, and we will at all times unite with our fellow citizens in any proper measures for the discovery and punishment of every individual concerned in a conspiracy of so detestable a character. Yet we do most solemnly protest against the charge, that because some bad men are found within the pale of the Fraternity, that therefore the whole are guilty. "It is a fundamental rule of justice, that every man shall be held responsible for his own acts, and those only." And shall this rule, so firmly engraven on the human heart, be reversed in its application to us? Let offended justice call over the catalogue of all human societies, religious as well as moral, and if any shall be found whose members have not offended, then indeed we will acknowledge the justice of the charge. Of the violence committed upon William Morgan, we have the same sources of information with the rest of community, and no other. We are members of different bodies and degrees of Masonry, and before and at the time of the offence, many of us were members of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter of the State, and we trust we shall be credited in saying, that we knew nothing of the transaction until after it transpired, and then only through the same sources with yourselves. And we most solemnly affirm, that within our knowledge no such measure was ever devised, aided, or in any wise sanctioned by any Masonick bodies known to the Institution, and that no rules or regulations of the Order authorize the infliction of corporeal punishment upon any of its members. The highest punishment known to the Institution, is expulsion of the offenders: and the high-handed offence, whatever it may have been, was altogether unauthorized by any principles of masonry; and we sincerely mourn the corruption of human nature as evinced in the commission of so base a deed.

We are charged with being aristocratic in principle—in inculcating precepts repugnant to the spirit of liberty, and a republican form of government; with having an undue and countenancing influence in politics; and of holding principles contrary to religion and virtue. All these in the sincerity of our hearts we deny, and challenge the proof in a single instance.

The Society of freemasonry "is a widely extended moral and benevolent institution." Uniting men of all nations and degrees, of different "religious sects and political opinions, in the bonds of social intercourse"; and we have never seen or known in a single instance its prostitution to political or sectarian purposes; and we do solemnly affirm, that its principles prohibit even a discussion of those subjects within the walls of our lodges. No body of masons has ever been known to act in concert in political controversies, upon any occasion whatever. We appeal to your own observation on this subject, and the late presidential contest is a sufficient illustration of the fact.

The principles of the institution strictly enjoin upon every member a cheerful and ready obedience to the laws of his country, and we unhesitatingly declare that we know of no rules or edicts of masonry which countenance the commission of crime, or shield the guilty from punishment. Convince us that masonry has, or now does, influence the decisions of the judge upon the bench, or that it interferes with the sacred right of trial by jury, and we will concede this charge to be just.

With any particular religious creeds masonry does not interfere. It learns each of its members to settle his own belief between his conscience and his God. The countenance and support given it by many of the most eminent divines in all ages of the world is a sufficient proof that we hold no doctrines incompatible to christianity, or that its principles inculcate any new, immoral, or irreligious sentiments. The principles of the institution inculcate pure morality and virtue—peace on earth and good will towards man—devotion to God and fervent charity—a charity which teaches us not to execute vengeance or defame friends or enemies—not to countenance intolerance or persecution, but to "exercise forbearance" and universal benevolence towards all mankind. It inculcates only the principles which the wise and good in all ages have cherished; which a WARREN taught, a FRANKLIN countenanced, and a WASHINGTON loved. "From this, would it appear to any unprejudiced mind, that masonry is opposed to the rights and liberties of man? or that it is at war with religion, or any of the social and moral virtues of the heart?" Reflect, fellow citizens, and we presume you will pronounce these charges unfounded and unjust. And shall it be said in this enlightened age, in this boasted land of liberty, that we must turn apostates and renounce that we firmly believe—that which the most eminent divines, the most exalted statesmen, and venerated patriots in all ages of the world have loved and cherished—to gratify the spirit of intolerance and political intrigue, or the disordered caprice of bigoted fanaticism? No: we are fathers, we are husbands, we are sons, and we are likewise members of the same community; subject to the same passions and sympathies, and susceptible of the same feelings with yourselves; and we never can be so lost to that respect due to ourselves, our families and our country, we never can so far sacrifice our veracity and that sense of honour due to ourselves and our posterity, as to consent to a measure so base, to an act so degrading.

We have now spoken. We have addressed you, that we may be heard. We put ourselves upon the judgement of a candid community, and by that judgement we are willing to stand or fall.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

THE TEETH.

An Article is going the rounds of the papers, giving instructions in regard to the teeth, which, if followed, will be sure greatly to injure if not to destroy them. It states that some French chemist has ascertained that the tartar can be removed from the teeth by the use of vinegar, which is the only acid, as is asserted, that does not injure the enamel. A medical writer in the National Gazette, exposes the falsity of this assertion. He says:

"Thus we find that the enamel of the teeth and the tartar are nearly the same in their composition, as we have before said, any acid which will dissolve the one will dissolve the other. Had this writer taken the trouble to examine the researches of others on this subject he would have learned that nearly all the weaker acids exert a pernicious influence upon the teeth. Mr. Pepys remarks, that the great solubility of the phosphate of lime, in even the weakest acids is very extraordinary. The celebrated Doctor Black, of Edinburgh, asserts, positively, that he has seen the enamel entirely removed by the use of cream of tartar, which is so often made an ingredient in dentifrices. Mr. Woffendale, many years since an eminent dentist of London, ascertained by direct and repeated experiments, that common vinegar would dissolve the enamel of the teeth, and that in a very short time.

There is one fact mentioned by this writer which, in a vast many cases is most deplorably true—it is, that the dentists very freely use the most potent acids to facilitate the removal of the tartar in the operation termed scaling. Whenever acids are used to cleanse the teeth, they do it at the expense of the teeth themselves. Two or three applications of an acid are sufficient to ruin the finest set of teeth. They are white at first, but soon become permanently dark. No person should ever apply any acid, however weak, to his teeth, or allow it to be done by others. They should never use an acid tooth powder, or in fact any substance that sets the teeth on edge. The teeth are far better cleansed by the use of instruments and some dentrifice having in its composition a little fine chalk, or something of that kind, applied with a brush, a piece of soft leather, or even a piece of linen cloth, the use of which, whilst it does the teeth no injury whatever, will render them white and beautiful."

THE COSMOPOLITE.

FOOD OF VARIOUS NATIONS.

Concluded.

The diet of the Frenchman, is chiefly vegetable. and his frogs are rarities reserved for the delectation of the opulent, and answering, in some degree, to the brains and tongues of singing-birds amongst ancient epicures; since, after being subjected to a peculiar process of fattening and purifying, only the legs of these animals are eaten. Light wines, beer, sugar and water, strong coffee, and a variety of delicious liqueurs, are drunk by the French, but they have shown themselves capable of conforming to the English taste in a relish for stronger potations. Spaniards of all ranks, use fruit, vegetables, fish, and olives, for their principal diet, and oil and garlic used plentifully in their culinary operations; chocolate is their chief beverage, but at dinner ladies drink nothing but water, and gentlemen a little wine. The fare of the Portuguese peasantry is meagre in the extreme, although, they are, in fact, surrounded with the abundant luxuries of nature; a piece of black bread and a pickled pilchard, or head of garlick, is their usual subsistence, but a salted cod is a feast. In Italy, ice-water and lemonade are luxuries essential to the existence of all classes, and the inferior ones, who never inebriate themselves with spirituous liquors, can procure them at a cheap rate; macaroni and fruit are chief articles of food, but the Italians are great gourmands, and delight in dishes swimming in oil, which, to an English ear, sounds very disgustingly; however, it must be remembered, that oil in Italy is so pure and fresh, that it answers every purpose of our newest butter. A gentleman who had resided some time in this country, informs us, that by the Italians, puppy-broth was reckoned a sovereign remedy in some slight indispositions, and that he has constantly seen in the markets young dogs skinned for sale. Of the Turks, the ordinary food is rice, sometimes boiled with gravy, and sometimes made into pilan; a kind of curry composed of mutton and fowl stewed to rags, and highly seasoned gravy. This is eaten with their fingers, since they have neither knives nor forks, and the Koran prohibits the use of gold and silver spoons. Coffee and sherbert are their ordinary beverages, and by higher classes of "the faithful," wine is drunk in private, but an intoxication of a singular and destructive description, is produced by opium, which the Turks chew in immoderate quantities. The food of the Circassians consists of a little meat, millet-paste, and a kind of beer fermented from millet. The Tartars are not fond of beef and veal, but admire horse-flesh; they prefer to drink, before any thing else, mare's milk, and produce from it, by keeping it in sour skins, a strong spirit termed koumiss. The Jakutians (a Tarter tribe) esteem horse-flesh as the greatest possible dainty; they eat raw the fat of horses and oxen, and drink melted butter with avidity; but bread is rare. The favourite food of the Kalmuck Tartars is horse-flesh, eaten raw sometimes, but commonly dried in the sun; dogs, cats, rats, marmots, and other small animals and vermin are also eaten by them; but neither vegetables, bread nor fruits; and they drink koumiss; than which, scarcely any thing can be more disgusting, except, perhaps, that beverage of the South Sea islanders, prepared by means of leaves being masticated by a large company, and spit into a large bowl of water. The diet of the Kamtschadales, is chiefly fish, variously prepared; huigal, which is neither more nor less than fish laid in a pit until putrid, is a luxury with this people! They are fond of caviar, made of roes of fish, and scarcely less disgusting than huigal. A pound of dry caviar will last a Kamtschadale on a journey for a considerable time, since he finds bread to eat with it in the bark of every birch and elder he meets with. These people boil the fat of the whale and walrus with roots of setage. A principal dish at their feasts, consists of various roots and berries, pounded with caviar, and mixed with the melted fat of whale and seal. They are fond of spirits, but commonly drink water. For the Arabs, lizards and locusts, afford food, but with better articles. The Persians live like the Turks, or nearly so, but for the want of spoons, knives and forks, their feasts, if the provisions are good in themselves, are disgusting; besides which, the sofera, or cloth on which the dinner is spread, is, from a superstitious notion that changing is unlucky, so intolerable dirty and offensive in odour, that the stranger can scarcely endure to sit beside it. With the Chinese, rice is the "staff of life," but all kinds of animal food are eagerly devoured; and pedlars offering for sale cats, rats, and dogs, may be seen in the streets of Chinese towns. It is uncertain whether a depraved taste or lack of superior animal food, induces a really civilized people to devour such flesh. Weak tea, without sugar or milk, is the common beverage of the Chinese; and in the use of ardent spirits they are moderate. The Peguese, worshipping crocodiles, will drink no water but from the ditches wherein those creatures abound, and consequently are frequently devoured by them. The Siamese, besides a variety of superior food, eat rats, lizards, and some kinds of insects. The Battas of Sumatra, prefer human flesh to all other, and speak with rapture of the soles of the feet and palms of the hands. Warm water is the usual beverage of the Manilla islanders. The Japanese, amongst other things, drink a kind of beer distilled from rice, and called sacki; it is kept constantly warm, and drunk after every morsel they eat. Cocoa-nut milk and water, is the common beverage of the natives of the New Hebrides. In New Caledonia so great is the scarcity of food, that the natives make constant war for the sake of eating their prisoners, and sometimes, to assuage the cravings of hunger, they bind ligatures tightly round their bodies and swallow oleaginous earth. The New Zealanders are cannibals sometimes in a dearth, and to gratify a spirit of vengeance against their enemies. The New Hollanders, near the sea, subsist on fish eaten raw, or nearly so; should a whale be cast ashore, it is never abandoned until its bones are picked; their substitute for bread, and that which forms their chief subsistence, is a species of fern roasted, pounded between stones, and mixed with fish. The general beverage of the negro tribes is palm-wine. No disgust is evinced by the Bojesman Hottentots at the most nauseous food, and having shot an animal with a poisoned arrow, their only precaution, previous to tearing it in pieces and devouring it raw, is to cut out the envenomed part. Half a dozen Bojesmans, will eat a fat sheep in an hour; they use no salt, and seldom drink any thing, probably from the occult nature of their food. The Caffres live chiefly on milk; they have no poultry, nor do they eat eggs. When flesh is boiled, each member of a family helps himself from the kettle with a pointed stick, and eats it in his hand. Their substitute for bread, which is made of Caffre-corn, a sort of mille, is the pith of a palm, indigenous to the country.

The Lattakoos eat, with equal zest, the flesh of elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, giraffes, quaggas, &c.; and sometimes, under an idea that it confers valour, human flesh, of which they have otherwise great abhorrence. They are very disgusting in their manner of preparing food. The Abyssinians usually eat the flesh of cattle raw, and sometimes, although we believe the fact has been much controverted, immediately as it is cut from the living animals. The Bisharye, a tribe of Bedouin Arabs, eat raw flesh, drink raw sheep's blood, and esteem the raw marrow of camels their greatest dainty.

The Patagonians eat raw flesh with no regard to cleanliness. The Greenlanders subsist on fish, seals, and sea-fowls, prepared and devoured in manners truly disgusting; train-oil is their sauce, and the blood of seals, their favourite beverage! Some of the North American Indians diet on the flesh of the sea-dog, parts of the whale and its fat, and an oil made of the blubber of both of these animals. Whilst, singular is the contrast, some of the South American tribes, are able to digest monkeys, blackened in, and dried by fire, to such a degree of wood-like hardness, as to be rendered capable of keeping, we dare not say how long.

Chacun a son gout, says one proverb, but we trust that the readers of this paper will, whenever they feel themselves inclined to quarrel with English fare, pause, and remember, another, viz.:—"A man may go further and fare worse."

THE GATHERER.

From The Parterre.

AUTUMN MORNING.

Reader, are you an early riser? If not—be one immediately, or you will lose all the glorious sights of an Autumn morning, for this year, at least. Come, get up and walk out with me into the fading fields. There. Now look to the east—

Far away,
In the blue portals of the rising day,

see the first herald of morning. That large dark cloud just over the hill top, with its edges all on fire, is the morning's harbinger. How beautiful! See the rich contrast between the gold and azure! And see that ray of light just flashing up from the unseen sun—it has set the whole cloud on fire, and broke it, till it looks like a shattered mass of gold. Another, and a long train of bright pearls, touched with yellow, stream up the vaulted sky. See there! That pale, regular cloud, away off in the blue, as it were an angel's mirror hung out upon the sky. See how gloriously the sun strikes it. Now look; it seems like a plane of polished pearl gleaming in the sunshine. Look farther to the north—see you that scattering train of black clouds, that seem as palls for the departed night? Wait a moment and see the sun shine upon them. There. They are all melted gold flowing in ten thousand streams over the blue heavens. Did you ever see any thing more beautiful?

Ninety years hence not a single man or woman now twenty years of age will be alive. Ninety years! alas! how many of the lively actors at present on the stage of life, will make their exit long ere ninety years shall roll away! And could we be sure of ninety years, what are they? "A tale that is told!" a dream; an empty sound that passeth on the wings of the wind away, and is forgotten. Years shorten as man advances in age; like the degrees in longitude, man's life declines as he travels towards the frozen pole, until it dwindles to a point and vanishes forever. Is it possible that life is of so short duration? Will ninety years erase all the golden names over the doors in town and country, and substitute others in their stead? Will all the now blooming beauties fade, and disappear; all the pride and passion, the love, hope, and joy pass away, in ninety years, and be forgotten? "Ninety years!" (says Death,) "do you think I shall wait ninety years? Behold, to-day, and to-morrow, and every one, is mine. When ninety years are past, this generation will have mingled with the dust, and be remembered not."

A GREAT MAN'S MEANNESS.

"I know of nothing more melancholy than the discovery of a meanness in a great man. There is so little to redeem the dry mass of follies and errors from which the materials of this life are composed, that any thing to love or to reverence becomes as it were the sabbath for the mind. It is bitter to feel, as we grow older, how the respite is abridged, and how the few objects left to our admiration are abused. What a foe not only to life, but to all that dignifies and ennobles it, is Time! Our affections and our pleasures resemble those fabulous trees described by St. Oederic—the fruits which they bring forth are no sooner ripened into maturity, than they are transformed into birds and fly away." [Devereux.]

MARRIAGE.

Look at the great mass of marriages which takes place over the whole world;—what poor, contemptible, common place affairs they are! A few soft looks, a walk, a dance, a squeeze of the hand, a popping of the question, a purchasing of a certain number of yards of white satin, a ring, a clergyman, a stage or two in a hired carriage, a night in a country inn, and the whole matter is over. For five or six weeks two sheepish looking persons are seen dangling about on each other's arm, looking at waterfalls, or making morning calls, and guzzling wine and cake; then every thing falls into the most monotonous routine. The wife sits on one side of the hearth, the husband at the other, and little quarrels, little pleasures, little cares, and little children, gradually gather round them. This is what ninety-nine out of a hundred find to be the delights of love and matrimony.

As Cooke, the solicitor-general, was beginning to open the pleadings at the trial of Charles I, the king gently tapped him on the shoulder with his cane, crying "Hold, hold!" At the same moment the silver head of the cane fell off, and rolled on the floor.

Truth can hardly be expected to adapt herself to the crooked policy, and wily sinuosities of worldly affairs; for truth, like light, travels only in straight lines.

It is adverse to talent, to be consorted, and trained up with inferior minds, or inferior companions, however high they may rank. The foal of the racer, neither finds out his speed, nor calls out his powers, if pastured out with the common herd, that are destined for the collar, and the yoke.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From Flint's Western Monthly Review

ATTACK OF BRYANT'S STATION.

Concluded.

The number of assailants amounted to at least six hundred. In conformity to the common modes of Indian warfare, they attempted to gain the place by stratagem. The great body concealed themselves among high weeds upon the opposite side of the Station, within pistol shot of the spring, from which it was supplied with water. With a detachment of a hundred, they commenced a false attack upon the southeast angle, with a view to draw the attention of the garrison to that point. This stratagem was predicated on the belief, that the inhabitants would all crowd to the point of assault, and leave the opposite one defenceless. But here they reckoned without their host. The people instantly penetrated their purpose; and instead of returning their fire, commenced, what ought to have been completed before, repairing the palisades, and putting the Station in a condition of defence. The high and luxuriant Jamestown weeds near the spring instructed these experienced backwoodsmen, that a host of the foe lurked beneath their sheltering foliage, there to await the coming forth of the men, to draw water for the supply of the garrison. Let modern wives, who hesitate to follow their husbands to this place, because it is deemed unhealthy; or to that, because it will remove them from the scene of their accustomed pleasures, hear and prehend! These noble wives, mothers, daughters and sweet hearts, I dare affirm, handsomer, than ever either Juno or Venus or Minerva, or any of the graces, and the nymphs to boot, appeared on Mount Olympus, informed the men, that there was little probability, that the Indians would fire upon them, as their game undoubtedly was the men; and that even if they did shoot down a few of them, it would in no way diminish the resources of the garrison. The illustrious heroines armed themselves with buckets, and marched down to the spring, espying here and there a painted face, and an Indian body crouching under the thick foliage. Whether the Indians were fascinated with their beauty or courage does not appear. But so it was, that they fired not, and these fair and generous ones came and went, until the reservoir was sufficiently supplied with water. I depend upon traditionary rather than written documents for the fact, that a round number of kisses were exchanged with these heroic ladies, who had so nobly jeopardized themselves, and proved that the disinterested darning of affection, is not a mere poet's fiction.

After such an example, it was no ways difficult to procure young volunteers, ready to try the Indians in the same way. As they deemed, they had scarcely advanced from the station, before a hundred Indians fired upon them. They retreated within the palisade; and the whole Indian force rose, yelling, and rushed upon the enclosure. They howled with mere disappointment and rage, when they found every thing prepared for their reception. A well directed fire, drove them to a more cautious distance. Some of the more desperate of their number, however, ventured on the least exposed point so near, as to be able to discharge burning arrows upon the roofs of the houses. Some of them were fired, and burnt. But an easterly wind providentially arose at the moment, and secured the mass of the buildings from the spreading of the flames; and the remnant they could not reach with their arrows.

The enemy lurked back to their covert in the weeds; waiting, panther-like, for safer game. They had been informed, or they had divined it, that aid was expected from Lexington; and they arranged an ambuscade, to intercept it, on its approach to the garrison. When the reinforcement, consisting of forty-six persons, came in sight, the firing had ceased. The enemy were all invisible; and they came on in reckless confidence, under the impression, that they had marched on a false alarm. A lane opened an avenue to the station, through a thick corn field. This lane was ambuscaded on either side by the Indians, for a hundred yards. Fortunately, as it was dry and mid summer, the horsemen raised such a cloud of dust, that they sustained the close fire of the Indians, without losing a man, or even a horse. The footmen were less fortunate. They dispersed in the corn field, in hopes to reach the garrison unobserved. But masses of savages, constantly increasing between them and the station, intercepted them. Hard fighting ensued, and two of them were killed, and four wounded. Soon after the detachment had joined their friends, and the Indians were lying close in their covert again, the numerous flocks and herds of the station came in quietly, ruminating, as they made their way towards their night pens. Upon these harmless animals the Indians had unmolested sport; and they made a complete destruction of them.

A little after sunset, the famous Girty covertly approached the garrison, mounted a stump, whence he could be heard by the people within; and demanded a parley, and the surrender of the place. He managed his proposals with no small degree of art, assigning, in imitation of the commanders of numerous armies, that they were dictated by his humanity; that he wished to spare the effusion of human blood; that, in case of a surrender, he could answer for the security of the prisoners; but that, in the event of taking the garrison by storm, he could not; that cannon were approaching with a reinforcement, in which case they must be aware, that the palisades could no longer avail, to secure them from the numerous and incensed foe. His imposing manner had the more effect, in producing consternation, as the garrison knew, that the same foes had used cannon in the attack of Ruddle's and Martin's stations. Some faces blanched. Two had been already slain, and the four wounded were groaning among them. Some of the more considerate, apprised of the folly of allowing such a negotiator in such a way, to intimidate the garrison, called out to shoot the rascal, adding to his name the customary Kentucky epithet. Girty insisted upon his promised security, as a flag of truce, while this negotiation lasted; and demanded with great assumed dignity, if they knew, who it was, who thus addressed them. A spirited young man, of whom the most honourable mention is made in the subsequent annals of Indian warfare, was deputed to answer the renegade negotiator. His object was to do away the depression of the garrison; and perhaps to gain a reputation for wagery, as he already had for hard fighting. "Yes," replied Reynolds, "we know you well. You are one of those cowardly villains, who love to murder women and children; especially those of your own people. Know Simon Girty! Yes; his father was a panther, and his dam a wolf. I have a worthless dog, that kills lambs. Instead of shooting him, I have called him Simon Girty. You expect reinforcements and cannon, do you? We expect reinforcements, too; and in numbers to give short reckoning to your cowardly wretches. Cannon! you would not dare touch them off, if you had them. Even if you could batter down our pickets, I for one, hold your people in too much contempt to honour them by discharging fire arms upon them. Should you take the trouble to enter our fort, I have been roasting a great number of hickory switches, with which we mean to whip your naked rascals out of the country."

"Now you be—d," says, Simon, apparently no ways edified, or flattered by the reply. Affecting to deplore the obstinacy and infatuation of the garrison, the man of ruffled shirt, and soldier coat returned; and the firing commenced again. The besieged gave a good account of every one, who came near enough to take a fair shot. But before morning, the main body marched away to the lower Blue Licks, where they obtained a signally fatal and bloody triumph. The Indians and Canadians are said to have exceeded six hundred; and the besieged numbered forty-two rifle-men, before their reinforcement.

The following appendix to the above real history, we frankly confess, seems rather apochryphal, and is not unlikely to have been foisted into the Kentucky annals by some wag. Though there are not wanting commentators, who discover intrinsic evidence of its fidelity in the narrative. We leave the reader to settle the question for himself.

We give, as we have received. It seems to us to be a spirited sketch of the energetick and somewhat wild manners of the brave and free spirits of the former generation in that state.

The Kentuckians of those days, carrying their lives in their hand, were faithful in obedience to the precept, to "take no thought for the morrow." While gloom was retiring from their forehead, joy shone again on their cheeks. As soon as they were aware, that the merciless prowlers had left the vicinity for good they paid due honours to the dead, who had fallen, while coming to their aid. The wounded were nursed with the tenderest assiduity. These duties of humanity duly performed, the subsequent afternoon and evening were devoted to the joy and hilarity of a kind of triumphal jubilee. The tables groaned with good cheer; and, as there were then no temperance societies, a reasonable proportion of "Old Monongahela rye whiskey," which even in those early days was deemed a drink of most salutary beatification, was added to the persimon and maple beer. All, not excepting even those, who had been most zealous for treating with Simon Girty, overwhelmed Reynolds with well-earned compliments, and admiration of his spirit and oratory. The gentlemen were scarcely more hearty in expressions of this sort, than the ladies; among whom, being handsome, and of a brave and free spirit, he had been a favourite before. There was something particular in the wistfulness, with which Sarah McCracken contemplated him this evening. Sarah was Irish, six feet and an inch; her limbs admirably turned, and her frame as square and proportioned, as an Indian statuary would desire for a model. Her hair was fair, and inclining to yellow; and in her face piony red was sprinkled on a ground of lily white; and withal she carried a hook nose, an abundant vocabulary of Kentucky repartee, and a termagant spirit curiously compounded of frolick and mischief. Sarah had been wooed to no purpose by every young man of any pretensions in the vicinity. It was clearly understood, that no lover would be favoured, until he should be able publicly to give her a fall fall, and noose her, as they were in the habit of managing a wild, or, as the phrase was, a "severe" colt. More than one had struggled for the prize. But they fared like the Philistine upon Sampson; or as Tabitha Grumbo managed with her tiny suitor, young Mr. Thumb. Reynolds had sighed among the rest; and had surveyed the premises with feelings, not unlike those, with which a hostile man of war regards the rock of Gibraltar. When questioned by the young men, why he had not attempted to noose this pretty and "severe" colt, he discussed the value of the prize, much as the fox did the grapes.

In the triumph and expansion of heart of that evening of deliverance, two or three fine young girls had been noosed; and, to their credit be it recorded, they were ever after as gentle and docile as they had been wild and unmanageable before. Whether Reynolds felt stronger after the ample honours and praises he had won, or whether there was a consenting languor in Sarah McCracken's eye, doth not appear. The fact is submitted without any explanatory conjectures. Reynolds, with a neat cord of buffalo hair, made up to Sarah, evincing a show of the requisite hardihood, of purposing a trial to noose her. "Come on," said Sarah, "Faint heart never won fair lady." Jigs, reels, sports, frolicks, rifle-shooting, every other excitement was instantly absorbed in the keener interest of witnessing the trial at noosing. It commenced with an energy, for which I have no comparisons. The contest of the stranger with the Giant of Gauntly, or even that between Aeneas and Turnus, for the hand and kingdom of Lavinia, afford no adequate parallel of illustration. Tears of laughter streamed from the eyes of the spectators; and it actually made them pant, that sultry August evening, to see the exertion of athletic power, the intertwining of hands, the bending of arms, and the dishevelled locks. Sometimes her fine form seemed to bend to the muscular powers of the young warrior; at other times, to avail of the Kentucky phrase, she "flirted" him, as though she had been playing pitch penny. Sometimes one scale preponderated with the chances of victory, and sometimes the other. But no golden sign was hung out in the sky. Reynolds began to show laborious respiration; and the ladies to cheer, and the gentlemen to despond. But at the very moment, when his powers seemed to be sinking under the prowess of the fair and blowzed female Hercules, the destinies threw a heavy weight into his scale, and hers instantly kicked the beam, for lo! an almost imperceptible tip of the ancle bestowed her at her length on the white clover. While the woods rung with united acclamations, the lover followed up his conquest. The "severe" colt was noused, as meekly as a lamb.

There were not wanting sly girls, inmates of the station, who used in private to insinuate to her, that the slip was intentional. Sarah always assumed a knowing look on the occasion; and insisted, that she had found no cause to repent the fall. Reynolds, it is well known, behaved nobly afterwards at the battle of the Blue Licks. He it was, who, being in after days a little in the habit of "striking the post," as the Indian have it, or, in our phrase, blowing his own trumpet—started the proverbial Kentucky boast—"I have the handsomest horse, dog, rifle and wife in all Kentucky."

MISCELLANY.

From the Ladies' Magazine.

HAVANA.

Leaf from a traveller's Port Folio.

The city of Havana has certainly a grand and beautiful appearance, as one sails into the harbour. The passage is so narrow that but one ship can enter at a time. On the left rises the Moro, a commanding castle, surmounted by a light house. For a long distance on the same side, extends a very elevated bridge, crowned with strong batteries called the Cabanas. On the right is the Punta, a fortress situated on much lower ground than the Moro. The harbour expands beautifully, after passing the narrow entrance; and the city, which lies on the left, for in beyond the Punta, presents a stately and glittering array. There are strong walls bristling with cannon and alive with soldiers, gray and ancient looking monasteries, and churches with their massive towers and narrow windows, and a fine display of white walled houses, a thronging mart and a thick forest of masts from every commercial country of the globe. Beyond the city, and at the remotest part of the harbour, is a small cluster of white houses called the Reglas; and beyond this, in fine contrast, rises a verdant slope, a part of the amphitheatre of hills, which encloses the city and harbour.

The sounds which greet the coming stranger, are not less imposing. Besides the busy hum of commerce, the mariners' cry and the clamours of the thronging quay, there are the almost incessant ringing and chiming of bells, the frequent discharge of musquetry and cannon; the shrill music of bugles, which comes over the water from the Cabanas, and the melody of full military bands from the city garrison.

The city is less attractive on a nearer view. The traveller lands upon a long wharf, amidst hundreds of people, mostly black; a few of whom are engaged in loading or unloading vessels; but by far the greater part in talking, or rather vociferating with all their might. Pushing his way with difficulty through them, he attains a narrow, muddy street; and if he can speak Spanish, or has a guide, at length finds his way to a publick house. This he will probably find to be like most of the houses in the city, a quadrangular stone building, of rather massive architecture, with a court yard in the middle, and pleasant balconies running round within. At the dinner table he will meet a host of foreigners; but very few Spaniards or Cubanos. His fare will be excellent; the price from two to three dollars a day. He will have a variety of dishes, for the most part in the French style; claret, a fine dessert, a cup of fifth proof coffee without milk; and finally, a good Havana cigar.

The city is regularly laid out in squares; the streets being straight, unpaved, and crossing each other at right angles. The houses are seldom more than two stories high; built of soft stone; the roofs covered with tiles, the walls plastered and white-washed. The lower story is frequently used for a shop or ware house; and where this is not the case the entrance on the ground floor is broad, and serves to shelter the volante. In the centre of the building is the patis or court yard, round which the rooms are ranged, opening into balconies. This court yard, if the building belong to a merchant, is generally filled with goods. There are no glass windows; but upright bars of wood or iron, with curtains and wooden shutters on the inside; so that the houses would have the appearance of prisons. did not a glimpse of glass chandeliers, rich tapestry, gilded furniture and bright eyes, afford a convincing proof of their real use. A good dwelling house rents at from 8000 to 14000 dollars. In the suburbs the rents are somewhat lower.

The shops are very numerous in every street; as even the nobility sometimes rent the lower front rooms of their houses to traders. This gives a lively business air, to most parts of the city. The sign boards are decorated with pictures, which seldom have a very near relation to the business of the trader; and the inscription, instead of presenting the owner's name and occupation, appears to be a matter of fancy. For instance, a mercer has a landscape on his sign-board, with the inscription La Gloria; a hatter calls his establishment La Palma; a tailor sports the effigy of a warrior, with the title El Heroe Espanol; and a vender of hard ware, arms, &c., carries on his trade under the auspices of a dove and the motto AMITY.

The streets being unpaved and continually cut up by volantes and heavy laden carts, are extremely dirty, and almost impassable, on foot, even in the dry season. It is probably owing to the bad police regulations, respecting the streets, and the manner in which the city and harbour are enclosed by the surrounding hills and fortifications, that the place is so unhealthily for foreigners, in the summer season.

REMINISCENSES.

Some years ago we were in Virginia, and our curiosity led us to visit the sage of Monticello; whom we had once known slightly in boyhood. There was something about the man that could not easily be forgotten, and his intellectual greatness had given him a high rank in our estimation. It was a beautiful morning in July, when we ascended the conical hill on which his house stands; the sun had risen in all his splendour, and was diffusing his radiance over dale and mountain. The prospect was magnificent—on the West the Blue Mountains towered in their grandeur, and "faded into mist;" while on the East the eye took in the lofty peaks of the Cotocten, which could be discerned at the distance of forty-five miles. The residence of Mr. Jefferson stood about 500 feet above the surrounding country. It is in shape an octagon, in the Dorick order, with a balustrade on the top. Porticoes adorned its east and west sides, and piazzas its north and south. The interior was handsomely arranged, according to the various orders of architecture. The ground floor contained eleven, the second six, and the attic four rooms. On the cellar floor there was a passage 300 feet in length, leading to two wings, which extend 120 feet from the passage, and terminate in a pavilion of two stories at each end of the passage: the roofs of these passages were elevated just above the surface, and formed a fine terrace, protected by Chinese railings.

We entered, and found the sage at breakfast. We understood he was in the habit of rising before the sun at all seasons, and of retiring to bed at about nine o'clock at night. He employed himself before breakfast in writing; after that in visiting his workmen and labourers; and upon his return, till twelve o'clock, in study. He then took a ride over the plantation, and returned at two, dressed for dinner, and joined his company. The afternoon was devoted to conversation with his guests, walking, and reading. This was the usual mode of spending his time. The interior of the building was such as one might expect in an edifice designed and superintended by such a man. Mr. Jefferson always seemed to have a fondness for architecture, and, we believe, was conversant with its principles. We found several plans of the the University suspended in the room, and designed by the late Mr. Latrobe, whose genius he admired. The hall and parlour contained a number of busts and statues, in marble and plaster; a fine collection of paintings, by the first masters, Raphael, Poussin, Reubens, Guido, &c.; and a considerable collection of natural and artificial curiosities, especially those found among the Indians, whose relics and works he was fond of collecting. The conversation of the sage was such as might have been expected from a man who had read and reflected so much, and had been so long in the world. It was replete with all that was interesting and useful. Rich in the lore of antiquity, and profoundly versed in the history of nations, the policy of states, and the diplomacy and history of his own country, his remarks were always characteristic, luminous, and striking. All who visited him were benefited by his intellectual treasures, and pleased and instructed by the spirit, variety, and simplicity of his conversation. Nothing seemed too lofty for his reach, or too small for his attention. He would quit the most complicated mathematical proposition, to examine the organization and trace the economy of the smallest insect, and leave the "fair and fertile fields" of poetry to "batten on the moor" of political science. His mind was enriched with the treasures of knowledge which years of study and observation had enabled him to collect, and it always gave him sincere pleasure to impart it in conversation to those who might be united to him by the ties of friendship, or who visited him from curiosity or admiration. This great man has since passed away from the world, and his name will fill a large space in the history of his country. But what is now the condition of the villa we have been describing? Is it to remain in the hands of his descendants, or to pass into those of strangers who can not appreciate its value? Will it become the property of some unlettered planter, some uncultivated but wealthy clown, who can not feel the inspiration which the memory of such a man is calculated to produce in minds of sensibility and refinement? Will not the future traveller often pause on the spot which has been consecrated by patriotism, and love to linger among the shades which have been rendered sacred by wisdom and virtue? It would be gratifying to know that it will be held, ages hence, by the descendants of him who has merited so much of his country.

SOLDIERS OF GUSTAVUS AND NAPOLEON.

Allan Cunningham makes the following comparisons. The points of difference are almost sufficient to destroy the resemblance.

"The soldiers of these illustrious men were fanatics; but their fanaticism had a remarkable difference. One was the fanaticism of religion and liberty, the other the fanaticism of martial tyranny and conquest. The followers of Napoleon saw all earthly honours, and the riches of all nations, within their reach, and in their fancy they became marshals and princes, and founders of new kingdoms and new dynasties. The followers of Gustavus scorned the vanities of this world: their hope of peace was in another state, and the kingdom of their love was in another world. To the Frenchman flocked all the fierce, ardent, and ambitious spirits of the nations—those who desired change, hasted old monarchies, asserted the natural supremacy of courage and genius, and desired that talent alone should be the rate of rank. To the Swede came spirits of a sterner stamp, with souls, made up for every emergency, who deemed all earth's glory but vanity, and considered the crown of martyrdom to be the only crown worth contending for. They were insensible to the allurements of pleasure, and dead to all love of outward splendour. Their food was coarse, their beds were hard, their uniform simple, and the swords and cannon with which they conquered their enemies and levelled the strong walks of antichrist, were plain instruments, without device or emblazonment. Their songs of war were psalms, and their conversation was devout controversy. Gustavus himself preached as well as fought; and never, under any captain, did war wear a more gentle aspect, nor did armed thousands observe more strictly the lessons of mercy and military obedience which their great leader enjoined. In support of this, take the testimony of a German poet and historian, and a graphick one it is:—

"What a coil and a turmoil, in word and in deed,
Was that plague of his people, Gustavus the Swede.
His camp was a church; and a chapel each tent,
As to it at morning and evening we went.
To psalms and to prayers round the standard we flew,
By the morning reville and the evening tattoo.
And, if we but ventured an oath or a jest,
He would preach from the saddle as well as the best.
He ruled in religion and all godly fear,
The Swede on that head, now, is far less severe."

To the sound of trumpet and drum the soldiers of Napoleon marched to battle, and when their fierce appetites were appeased, their camp resounded with wild songs and wilder jests; their booty was great, they spent it freely, and then longed to uncrown another king and fill their purses in his capital. They were vain of their persons, wore splendid uniforms and costly cuirasses, more for show than use, for musket-balls pierced them like silk. Their arms were elegant, and of the best construction. Their leaders imitated, and with some success, the ancient warriors of romance in their bearing and habiliments. The soldiers of Gustavus did good to mankind; those of Napoleon did evil. The soldiers of the former conquered their enemies, gained their object, and sheathed their swords amid the applause of half the world; the soldiers of the latter failed to conquer the earth, were crushed in a few terrible fields, and the remainder were scattered among the nations, never to be gathered under their formidable captain again. "The smooth and solid temper of the modern world," says Gibbon, "can exhibit neither the triumph of Alexander nor the fall of Darius." Napoleon triumphed more than the Greek, and fell farther than the Persian."

LADY MORGAN AND MR. OWEN.

After a long silence, Lady Morgan has once more come before the publick, not as a romancer or an historian, but as best became one of the fair sex, with The Book of the Boudoir, a fine little work filled with the spirit, and calculated for the meridian of that delightful temple of woman's fascination and unresisted supremacy. It is discursive, like her Ladyship's imagination. Original anecdotes, piquant observations, souvenirs du passe, sentiment, sallies of wit, thoughtfulness, levity, gloom, joy—all topics, all countries, and all passions, are made to contribute a leaf, sometimes a flower, to the wreath she has wore. Among such a variety it is difficult to make a choice, but we take the following anecdote, applying to a well known Visionary, for its characteristic singularity.

[London Cour.]

One of the most benevolent, amiable, and sanguine of all philanthropists called on me, with a countenance full of some new scheme of beneficence and utility. It was Mr. Owen, of New Lanark, whose visits are always welcome in Kildare-street, though so "few and far between."

As soon as we had sunk into our arm-chairs, and put our feet on the fender, and before we had got on the usual topicks of parallelograms and perfectibility, New Lanark and a new social system, he began,

"My dear Lady Morgan, you are to have a party to-night."

"To be sure, my dear Mr. Owen, and one made expressly for yourself. You are my lion; I hope you don't mean to jilt me."

"By no means; but I have brought you a better lion than I could prove."

"I doubt that; but who is he? where is he?"

"In my pocket."

"You don't say so: is it alive?"

"Here it is," said Mr. Owen, smiling; and drawing forth a little parcel, he unfolded and held up a canvass tunic, or chemise, trimmed with red tape.

"I want you," he added, "to assist me in bringing into fashion this true costume of nature's dictation, the only one that man should wear."

"But woman, my dear Mr. Owen?"

"Or woman either, my dear Lady."

"Consider Mr. Owen, the climate!"

"Your face does not suffer from it."

"But then again, the decencies?"

"The decencies, as you call them, Lady M—, are conventional—they were not thought of some years ago, when you were all dressed in the adhesive draperies of antiquity, like that beautiful group on your chimney-piece. You see there the children of Niobe who wore no more voluminous garments than my tunic—that lovely child, for instance, which Niobe is endeavouring to save from the shafts of Appollo. And yet none of your fine gentlemen and ladies are shocked by the definition of forms, which have ever been the inspiration of art. I assure you I have already got several ladies to try this tunic on—"

"Oh! Mr. Owen!!!"

"On their little boys, Lady Morgan; and if I could only induce you to try it—"

"Me, my dear Mr. Owen! You surely cannot suppose—"

"I don't ask you to wear it, Lady M—; all I beg for the present, is, that you will give it a trial, by showing it off at your party to night—recommend it, puff it off!"

Quitte pour le peur, I promised to do so, to the utmost of my appraising abilities; and so we suspended the little chemise from the centre of my bookcase, under the bust of the Appollo.

"There!" said Mr. Owen, looking rapturously at the little model dress of future perfectibility, there it is worthily placed! Such were the free vestments, that, leaving the limbs of the Greek athlete unrestrained, produced those noble forms, which supplied models for the Appollo of Belvidere."

"It is certainly placed to great advantage, Mr. Owen," I replied with a sigh, "but it gives my pretty library very much the look of Ragfair, or a back parlor in Monmouth-street."

"My dear Madam," he replied, emphatically, where the human race is to be benefitted, no sacrifice is too great." And this sentiment, which is the governing principle of Mr. Owen's life, may serve for his epigraph.

The little tunic, however, had a great success; and merited the well known eulogium of Tam O'Shanter to a similar garment—

"Weel loon'd cutty sark."

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1829.

§ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

Extract of a letter to the Editor, dated October 5, 1829.

"While on a recent tour in Vermont, along the banks of the Connecticut, I called at publick house,—in the bar-room of which I observed a notice posted up, of which the following is a copy. On inquiry, I found the writer to be a magistrate, and one of the most respectable men of the town. His name had been used without his consent at an anti-masonick meeting in the county, and the anti-masonick papers, to give importance to their doings and to gain popularity."

"Whereas, I am appointed one of the committee of the honourable society of anti-masons, to superintend the prudential concerns of Anti-Christ's church—and whereas they have published my name in the North Star, a paper apparently conducted by the spirit of Anti-Christ—therefore I have thought proper to give notice, and notice is hereby given to all the members of Anti-Christ's church in Fairlee, to meet and elect a delegate to meet the convention at Montpelier, on the 5th day of August next, to take into consideration, and adopt the best method of promoting the cause of Anti-Christ. Now, if any persons wish to become members of the church of Anti-Christ, and join said church in full communion, three things are necessary: 1st, believe a person who is guilty of perjury and lying to the worst degree, before you will believe one who speaks the truth; 2d, strive to make all the divisions in families, neighbourhoods, and churches you can; 3d, strive, as much as in you lies, to promote the cause of Anti-Christ in the world, by circulating anti-christian newspapers, and strive to make the people believe they contain the truth, and nothing but the truth."

Now, every person who will subscribe to the foregoing articles, shall be received with open arms.

"N. B. The above is a class of people who, for a cloak, style themselves anti-masons—but a tree is known by its fruit. Signed, SAMUEL BLISS.

"Fairlee, July, 1829."

Who can doubt that the above contains a true picture of anti-masonry? It is the plain English of anti-masonick patriotism and christianity. The same letter adds, that the excitement in Vermont has assumed altogether a political aspect, and that the party which supports it is made up of weathercock politicians, and men who are celebrated for their tory principles. That such men should oppose an institution approved of and encouraged by Washington is perfectly natural.

§ Some fellow of a sheep-stealing disposition, labouring under a grievous weight of "mother" wit and "mother" wisdom, and who, like Mrs. Dywart, appears to be a "literal" sort of thing, quite independent of the leading strings of decency and education, has, evidently with great labour, filled one page of a sheet of foolscap with a rascally mixture of hieroglyphicks, pot-hooks, trammels, &c., and sent it to us by mail, from Rochester, endorsed with a draft upon our purse for 18½ cents, by way of postage. We regret exceedingly, that our ignorance of the multitude of jargons in which the brilliancy and profundity of this exquisite epistle is clothed, prevents us from receiving that delight and instruction from it, which its very volity, honest and courageous author no doubt intended to administer to us. As far as we have been able to discover its meaning, by the help of the Yankee faculty of guessing, it was intended to pass for something exceedingly pithy, about ourself and the "Butys of masonry"—the greater portion of the pith being in the shape of a bevy of lofty and generous personalities, to understand which, the reader must be the proprietor of an intellect perfectly upon a par with that of their author; who is probably a stray anti-masonick Yahoo, from the land of Gulliver's Houyhnhnms. If this genius is desirous of letting off a further quantity of his intellectual exuberance, we advise him to persuade an acquaintance, if he has a decent one, to set it down in English, then to pay the postage, and send a fellow to read it, who shall be accommodated with a rostrum in the market place. If these conditions be not complied with, he may direct his epistles to Don Miguel, the Man in the Moon, or his brother of China, but not to us, or perhaps he may rue the day he did it.

In sober seriousness, we would say to this pitiful fellow, who will doubtless read this, that we believe his natural propensities, unless restrained by a better self-government than he appears at present to be possessed of, are capable of leading him to the state's prison, or even to the gallows. To be guilty of so contemptible an act of malice and revenge, he must be by nature a coward and a villain, and one whom nothing but a fear of the laws can deter from evil deeds. We do not, however, believe that he is alone in his meanness; there are many—very many—in the anti-masonick ranks, who (could they act with the same security that a rascal supposes attends him when he insults another and picks his pocket by means of anonymous letters) would be guilty of any act, however petty, which could be construed into revenge. From nature they inherit no honesty, no honour, no generosity, no feeling which elevates them above the brutes—for their human dignity they are indebted to the human shape alone. Untrammelled by selfishness, we advise these fellows to mend their morals, keep their scrawls at home, and learn to read the Bible; and notwithstanding their natural depravity, they may, by a lucky chance, escape the state's prison, or a worse fate.

The editor of the Nantucket Inquirer having "argued at considerable length," but to no purpose "the advantages which would result from having the streets" of that place "handsomely lighted," "respectfully suggests that every post in the streets be painted as white as possible, and be surmounted with a little cupola of touchwood," which he thinks, while it would cost but little, would rescue strangers as well as constant residents, from "many a tremendous jar." As posts are not the only things with which men are liable to come in contact, we respectfully suggest in addition to the above, that individuals be compelled to carry touchwood upon their several noses, for the purpose of guarding against each other. We would go considerably out of our way, to see a couple of these portable touchwood lamps, dodging for half an hour in a very dark night before they could pass each other. Besides, the practice might be of signal service to the country by encouraging the domestic manufacture of a new article.

A writer in the Buffalo Republican, in an essay on "Crowding," says he has "seen anti-masonry attempt to 'crowd' itself into society; but it's like trying to split a knotty log on a frosty morning with a wooden wedge—it will bounce out to the great danger of him at the beetle." There is an itinerant character, belonging to this city, who has worked lustily "at the beetle" for about three years, and the only return he has received from his labours, if we are to trust his word, has been a few thumps from the "wedge." He declared it as his opinion, a few days since, that unless the "wedge" should become more civil, he would soon be compelled to lay down the "beetle."

We have received the second number of The Parterre, which is better written than the first. It is ornamented with a full length representation of the editor, whose forehead and wig put one in mind of the Catskill mountains during a thunder storm. He wears tremendous whiskers and a pug nose. We suppose he has repented of his sins, for we see he has commenced reading Emmon's Fredomadi, to go through with which will require the remnant of his days. A scrap from the Parterre, containing some very good advice will be found under the head of "The Gatherer."

On Monday last the acting Governor removed John Becker from the office of Sheriff of this county. The following is a copy of the decree of removal. Becker, though the candidate of the Adams party, was supported by the anti-masons.

Having heard and examined charges of misconduct in office against John Becker, sheriff of the county of Albany, and having served upon him a copy of the charges against him, and heard him in his defence, I do adjudge him guilty of official misconduct in

1. Suffering the escape of Elizabeth M'Auly, duly committed to the jail of said county, under his custody on a charge of felony.

2. Suffering ardent spirit to be freely drank by the prisoners in jail under his custody, contrary to the statute, and

3. Confining debtors and felons together in the same room in the jail of said county, also contrary to the statute.

For these and for other acts of misconduct in his office, sufficiently proved to me, I do, in pursuance of the power vested in me by the 8th section of article 4th of the constitution of this state, remove him from his said office of sheriff of the county of Albany, and order a supersedeas to issue.

E. T. THROOP.

Albany, October 5th, 1829.

ANTI-MASONRY. A certain H. D. Ward, imported from New-England to act as an anti-masonick showman, in this state for the benefit of Southwick & Co., exhibited in this village last Thursday to a number of spectators and about a score of wise men from the south. Our worthy Sheriff, who belongs to the fraternity of freemasons, generously granted him the use of the large court room, and permitted the bell to be rung twice for the purpose of calling together a respectable audience. Of course, Ward began in the old hum-drum style, "sawing and pawing the air," and uttering a thousand ridiculous things about freemasonry which nobody cared to hear, and which excited nothing but contempt. Many left the room long before the conclusion of his speech, which was the same he spoke last winter in Albany at the grand convention, whereof some account was given in this paper in an article from the Albany Argus, entitled "The anti-mason Looking Glass." Our readers may judge of the effect produced by the solemn farce from the fact, that not a single human being has been tempted to take a dose of scutlap since Ward "cleared out."

This individual, who came here as he said to "enlighten" us, was concerned, if we rightly remember, in the paper called the "Anti-Masonick Beacon," printed in New-York, which lately, notwithstanding his numerous doleful appeals in its behalf at the anti-masonick meetings in that city, gave up the ghost for the want of dupes to support it. He is now the itinerant editor of a periodical pamphlet cycled "the Review." If an opinion as to the influence this thing may have upon the minds of the citizens of the metropolis can be formed from that which his address produced here, we hazard little in predicting that the Review will soon follow the fate of the extinguished Beacon. A more tedious, insipid, and drowsy discourse, rarely, if ever fell from the lips of a professed delaimer. It was genuine anti-mason, and that, in all conscience, is saying enough.

[Ulster Sentinel.]

ANTI-MASONRY. This moral contagion is fast evaporating from the atmosphere of New-York. Governor Southwick's last publication is loaded with lugubrious groans against the hard hearted antis who neglect to encourage his insane revelations and buy his nonsensical newspaper. He calls loudly upon his patrons to "pay up," and begs most piteously that every subscriber will add another to the list—even then he says "it would not be a very profitable concern." Solomon must travel with the current. The New-Yorkers are sick enough of anti-masonick drugs, and the good people of Massachusetts are next to be dosed. Besides, an anti-masonick candidate for governor will soon be wanted here. We are really sorry that Solomon is so near suffering martyrdom. But he should be comforted and remember Socrates, who, he says, "was poisoned for the same reason that William Morgan was drowned."

RUSSIA AND TURKEY. The intelligence brought by the ship Robert Edwards, capt. Sherburne, which left Dartmouth on the 29th August, is, as far as it can be relied upon, says the New York Evening Post, of a very important character. A paragraph from the London evening papers of August 25th, is copied in the Plymouth paper of the 27th, which states that "A TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCH IS SAID TO HAVE BEEN RECEIVED AT PARIS, ANNOUNCING THE ENTRANCE OF THE RUSSIANS INTO CONSTANTINOPLE." In the National Gazette of Thursday the same fact was announced, in an extract of a letter from a Havre correspondent under date of 26th of August; for the respectability of the writer of which the U. S. Gazette of yesterday morning vouches. Indeed, there seems to be no reason to doubt the accuracy of the report. After the unlooked for vigour and boldness of plans suddenly exhibited by the Russians, and their unlooked for success, it became obvious to all that nothing could prevent the fall of Constantinople, unless the ravages of the plague had been sufficiently rapid and extensive to chill the ardour which such a quick succession of victories must have aroused. Putting this consideration aside, had Nicholas on the summit of the Balkan cried out to his conquering army to halt, it is doubtful with Adrianople at their feet, and Constantinople almost in view, if they would have obeyed the Autocrat. Looking upon the previously received intelligence as true, the only hope for Constantinople must have rested on the remote probability that the extension of the plague among the northern army would be so great as to require pause, and that that pause would be improved by the other powers to negotiate a peace. That such has not been the case, and that "Stamboul's oriental halls" are now in possession of the Czar, and ravaged by his soldier, we see no reason to doubt. Assuming this, then, as a fact, what important consequences may not be expected to result to Europe from this conquest? Although we have ever disapproved of the motives of Russia's invasion of the Turkish dominions, yet we can not but feel gratified at the prospect of the happy consequences which will flow from it, in the promotion of civilization, and the multiplication of the means of human felicity. By the acquisition of such an extent of territory on the Mediterranean seaboard, a strong impulse will be given to the commercial, and the already far advanced manufacturing interests of Russia, by which she will receive a tremendous augmentation of that preponderance of power which for a long time past, has been a subject of constant dread to the other nations of Europe. Her trade liable to many and vexatious interruptions through the Baltick, will spread itself without let or hindrance to the Mediterranean, and, through that channel, to the markets of the world. What measures may be devised by the other powers to check this promised rapidity of growth, are yet matters of conjecture. Had not England been held down by her thousand millions of debt, Nicholas would never have crossed the Balkan; but if his standard does really wave from the walls of Constantinople, it will not be an easy matter to induce or eject him from his new dominions, so long as it is an object of desire to Russia.

The Way to keep Him. About ten o'clock, last evening, a man was seen coming down by the spout of a low three story house in the northern quarter of this city. Several persons collected; among them a young physician, who, supposing it to be a case of somnambulism, kept the others quiet, lest the man, awakened suddenly by noise, should fall and break his neck. When he came down, however, he was found to be as wide awake as any of the stargazers. On being questioned, he said that he was a member of a club which met every Thursday night. He thought he always came home sober, though his wife said he had gone to bed drunk every Thursday night since he had joined the club. "The only proof she can bring of that," he added, "is, that I get up every Friday morning with my clothes on. Just as I was going out to night, she got me to go into the garret to set a rat trap; and when I tried to come out, I found she had locked me in. She said, through the key-hole, that she would set me free if I would agree to give up the club, and join a temperance society; but I had too much spunk for that. So, after working two or three hours at the door, I got out on the roof, and here I am." Having finished his speech, he turned off, in hopes to finish the evening with his cronies; when Mrs. Sneak issued from the house, accompanied by a stout, thin-lipped, bare-armed gossip. Each seized an arm. In spite of poor Jerry's struggles, they dragged him with great ease into the house, and bolted the door for the night. The audience gave three cheers, and went home to bed. An Italian in London has imported from his native country sixty boys, whom he furnishes, some with organs, others with white mice, birds, and other means of attraction, and sends them into the street to attract a crowd and beg money. He finds the boys lodgings, and receives from each a shilling per day for the use of the toys, animals, &c.

A preacher has notified the inhabitants of Newport, N. H. that he will preach at the court house in that town on the 20th of this month, "at 12 o'clock, by the leave of Providence, and without the leave and in defiance of the Prince of Darkness and all his understrappers."

POETRY.

AUTUMN WOODS.

BY BRYANT.

Ere, in the northern gale,
The summer tresses of the trees are gone,
The woods of Autumn, all around our vale,
Have put their glory on.

The mountains that infold
In their wide sweep, the coloured landscape round,
Seem groups of giant kings in purple and gold,
That guard the enchanted ground.

I roam the woods that crown
The upland, where the mingled splendours glow,
Where the gay company of trees look down
On the green fields below.

My steps are not alone
In these bright walks; the sweet southwest, at play,
Flies, rustling, where the painted leaves are strown
Along the winding way.

And far in heaven the while,
The sun, that sends that gale to wander here,
Pours out on the fair earth his quiet smile,—
The sweetest of the year.

Where now the solemn shade,
Verdure and gloom where many branches meet;
So grateful when the moon of summer made
The vallies sick with heat?

Let in through all the trees,
Come the strange rays; the forest depths are bright;
Their sunny coloured foliage in the breeze
Twinkles like beams of night.

The rivulet, late unseen,
When bickering through the shrubs its waters run,
Shines with the image of its golden screen,
And glimmerings of the sun.

But 'neath yon crimson tree,
Lover to listening maid might breathe his flame,
Nor mark within its roseate canopy,
Her blush of maiden shame,

Oh, Autumn! why so soon
Depart the hues that make thy forests glad;
Thy gentle wind and thy fair sunny noon,
And leave thee wild and sad.

Ah, 'twere a lot too blest,
Forever in thy coloured shades to stray;
Amidst the kisses of the soft southwest
To rove and dream for aye.

And leave the vain low strife
That makes men mad—the tug for wealth and power,
The passions and the cares that wither life,
And waste its little hour.

NAPOLEON.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

He came, as comes the sun at dawn,
Upon a slumbering world;
Corruption at his nod was gone,
The tyrant's banner furled;
Thrones trembled at his giant tread,
Crowns fell around his feet,
And shook the ashes of the dead
His eagle glance to meet.

He came, a child whom men might scorn,
A vision faint to feel,
But Europe saw her proudest born
Before his presence kneel;
And kings and conquerors faded far
In shadow from his name,
As fades the faintest silver star
Behind the sunrise flame.

He went upon the battle ground,
Strong, yea, invincible;
Of death to enemies around
His cannon tones were full;
With requiems rang his trumpets, ere
The deadly fight began,
And fell as many foes from fear
As from opposing man.

An island in a sleeping sea
Him sent abroad to reign;
An island in a stormy sea
Has got him back again;
He came on earth, determined, stern,
And hard to be denied,
Empires and thrones to overturn,
And on the greatest, died.

CHILDHOOD AND HIS VISITORS.

Once on a time, when sunny May
Was kissing at the April showers,
I saw fair Childhood hard at play
Upon a bank of blushing flowers;
Happy—he knew not whence or how;
And smiling,—who could choose but love him?
For not more glad than Childhood's brow,
Was the blue heaven that breathed above him.

Old Time, in most appalling wrath,
That valley's green repose invaded;
The brooks grew dry upon his path,
The birds grew mute, the lillies faded;
But Time so swiftly winged his flight
In haste a Grecian tomb to batter,
That Childhood watched his paper kite,
And knew just nothing of the matter.

With curling lip, and glancing eye,
Guilt gazed on the scene a minute,
But Childhood's glance of purity,
Had such a holy spell within it,
That the dark demon of the air
Spread forth again his baffled pinion,
And hid his envy and despair,
Self tortured, in his dominion.

Then stepped a gloomy phantom up,
Pale, cypress crowned, night's awful daughter,
And proffered him a fearful cup,
Full to the brim with water;
Poor Childhood bade her tell her name,
And when the beldame muttered "Sorrow,"
He said—"Do not interrupt my game,
I'll taste it, if I must, to-morrow."

The muse of Pindus thither came,
And wooed him with the softest numbers
That ever scattered wealth and fame,
Upon a youthful poet's slumbers;
Though sweet the musick of the lay,
To Childhood it was all a riddle,
And "Oh!" he cried, "do send away,
That noisy woman with the fiddle."

Then wisdom stole his bat and ball,
And taught him, with most sage endeavour,
Why bubbles rise and acorns fall,
And why no toy may last forever;
She talked of all the wondrous laws,
Which nature's open book discloses,
And Childhood, ere she made a pause,
Was fast asleep among the roses.

Sleep not sleep on!—O Manhood's dreams,
Are all of earthly pain, or pleasure,
Of Glory's toils, Ambition's schemes,
Of cherished love, or hoarded treasure;
But to the couch where Childhood lies;
A more delicious trance is given,
Lit up by rays from seraph eyes,
And glimpses of remembered heaven!

FADED WILD FLOWERS.

I.
Farewell, ye faded flowers,
That on the cold ground lie;
How gaily ye smiled
Mid the brown wild,
'Neath Summer's painted sky!—
Passed hath your bloom away:
Your stalks are sere and bent;
On the howling blast
The rain sweeps past,
From the dim firmament!

II.
I think me of your pride,
When Zephyr came with Spring;
Then sigh to know
That wreck and woe
A few brief months may bring!—
Emblems of human fate,
Ye say, "Though bright and fair
Life's morning be,
Its eve may see
The clouds of grief and care!"

III.
In you I scan the fate
Life's sunniest hopes have met,
When Youth's bright noon,
(Alas, how soon!)
For Sorrow's tempest set.
Yes! joy by joy decayed,
As ye did fade, sweet blooms,
Leaving behind
Upon the wind,
Awhile, your soft perfumes.

iv.
As waned each blossom bright,
So doomed we're to depart
Friend after friend,—
And each to rend
A fibre from the heart:—
Green Spring again shall bid
Your stems with bloom be crowned,
But alas, to man,
In earth's brief span,
No second spring comes round!

v.
Yes! friends who clomb Life's hill
Together, long ago,
Are parted, and
Their father's land
No more their place shall know!
We see them not—nor hear them—
Among the garden bowers;
They have passed away,
In bright decay
Like you, ye perished flowers!

vi.
Mourn not—we meet again,
Although we meet not here;
Turn ye above,
Where Faith and Love
Taste heaven's eternal year:
For, though Time's winter bows
The grey head to the clod,
Dust goes to dust,
But, as we trust,
The Spirit back to God!

MASONICK RECORD.

FAREWELL SERMON,

Preached at Harpersfield, Delaware county, June 21, 1829,

BY REV. STEPHEN FENN, A. M.

John 10, 32. Jesus said unto them, many good works have I shewed you from my Father—for which of these works do ye stone me?

These are the words of the Lord Jesus Christ. They are a reply to the Jews, for their unkindness and cruelty towards him, in stoning him. Our Lord was at Jerusalem, at the feast of the dedication in the winter, and as he walked in Solomon's Porch, the Jews came round about him and began to interrogate him. How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. Jesus answered them, I have told you, and ye believed not; the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me. Mark—"But ye believed not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my Father's hand. My Father, which gave them to me, is greater than all; and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one."

It was for preaching these plain and essential doctrines of the cross, that the Jews again took up stones to stone him. When Jesus saw them with their stones ready to cast at him, he spake to them in the words of our text:—"Many good works have I shewed you from my Father; for which of these works do ye stone me?" He wished to know for which of the many good works which he had done among them, during the whole time he had preached and laboured among them, they were now going to stone him.

Now hear the answer which the Jews made to the inquiry of our Lord: For a good work we stone thee not, (wiped themselves with a single stroke from all blame,) but for blasphemy; because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God. The Jews then, and so it is now, have no more belief in the deity of Jesus Christ, than the modern Arians amongst us have. The Jews denied that they stoned Christ for a good work, and at once charged him with being guilty of the most atrocious crimes—and they lied every word they spoke. I ask the Jews, and all other persons, to lay their finger on a single evil act that ever Christ did; all their accusations against him were groundless; and it must have been for a good work that they stoned him, for their was not an evil work to be found in him.

The Jews were not willing that the truth should appear; for if it should be brought out to view, in all its length and breadth, it would throw a weight of odium upon them, which they would be illy able to sustain; and if they could so manoeuvre as to cast all the fault upon Christ, then all their wicked and cruel dealings with him would pass well with the world.

In the providence of God, my labours here, as a minister of the gospel, are brought to a close. I have preached in this place for thirty-six years. When I first came to this town, it was a mere wilderness, in both a natural and a moral sense. There were but few inhabitants, and they in low and penniless circumstances—able to do but very little for the support of society. In a great proportion there was a willing mind to do, but manifestly a great want of ability.

There are but three men now living in this town, who belonged to this society when I first began to labour here as a herald of the cross of Christ, though some more became inhabitants before my ordination, who are now actually living here. Almost all who then composed this society, are now either housed in the silent grave, or have moved to some other place.

The society has almost changed its inhabitants three times since I commenced my ministry here. Great changes have taken place in this society; like all other places we have often times been visited with death; the congregation of the dead has been swelling every year; many of our near and dear friends sleep in the dust; their memory is dear and precious to us, but their society we never can enjoy any more here on earth. There have been two hundred and ninety-five deaths in this society, including all ages. This account is not designed to embrace other denominations in this town; it is confined wholly to your society.

In the discharge of my ministerial functions, I have often been called to administer the ordinance of baptism. Sometimes it has been difficult for me certainly to determine who were the proper subjects of the ordinance; and it is by no means improbable that I may have often erred in this important part of my duty. But I have this for my consolation, that my errors were those of judgement, and not of will or design. I have performed seven hundred and thirteen baptisms, not all in this church, but in this and the churches around. Quite a number to whom I have administered baptism, are now in the eternal world, giving up an account to God, and receiving according to the deeds done in the flesh.

I have performed three hundred and sixty-seven marriages, in this town and the vicinity. In a few instances I have married the same person twice; and a very considerable number of those whom I have married, have had their days numbered and finished, and are called out of time to the bar of God. The path of life, as we are passing along through it, is chequered with a great variety of incidents, directly calculated in their very nature to remind us of our dependence and accountability.

When I first settled in this place it was in its infancy. People had not yet gotten their farms so cultivated as to more than barely support their own families, with all the economy they could use; they had little or nothing to spare to support the gospel. My salary, as is well known to you all, has ever been nominally small; and the manner in which it has been collected; taking the years on an average, has been reduced one quarter in its value—at best, if it had been punctually paid, it fell far short of being a competent support for my family. When the society had fallen in debt, and it was found extremely difficult to raise money to pay the arrearages, the whole burden resting upon a few, and many of them not the most able, I have repeatedly given off large sums of my salary, and trusted to Providence for my support. I have had to flee to the fields and labour hard for my subsistence, rather than burden the people. Having been constrained to flee to the fields, has been a course highly injurious to me, to my proficiency in knowledge, and to the discharge of the duties of my office among the people. A minister cannot be driven to the field to earn his living, and at the same time be in his study, furnishing his mind with useful knowledge, searching the scriptures to make preparation for the solemn duties of the sanctuary. If a minister is constrained to flee to the field, it not only makes him a lean preacher, but it makes his hearers a lean people. They fail of that knowledge which they might receive on the Sabbath, and they fail of those weekly visits which not only secure and maintain friendship between minister and people, but those visits likewise which contribute much to keep religion alive, when they are rightly improved. A people must first place a minister in comfortable worldly circumstances, and then if he does not faithfully and punctually perform the duties of his office, he must be without excuse, and the people may in such circumstances with propriety find fault.

During the whole of my straitened circumstances, and my incompetent support; let my worldly concerns be ever so crowding, I have ever been ready and prompt to attend all calls, in case of sickness, funerals, &c. within my own parish. Not a case can be found among my own people, where I have ever refused, or even manifested the least unwillingness to attend a single call. This is well known to all who have had occasion for my ministerial services.

But my ministerial labours in the week time have not been confined to my own parish. Besides attending two stated sessions of the presbytery every year, ordinations, councils, &c. which have often led me many miles from home, I have had many calls abroad to attend funerals, lectures, &c. I have been thirty miles to attend a funeral several different times, and in the several distances short of thirty miles, I have had a vast many calls to preach and attend funerals, and have in every instance attended out of my parish, when called upon, unless prevented by sickness or some providence which was utterly beyond my controul. Attention to those repeated calls from abroad, has rendered my life extremely laborious, and has consumed a very considerable portion of my time, which otherwise might have been spent in my study, or in profitable visits among my people. This consideration, together with others which might be mentioned, ought to do much to satisfy the minds of those who have been too ready to find fault that I have not spent that portion of time in visiting from house to house, which a minister ought.

When I settled here, there was a small Presbyterian church collected here consisting of about twenty members, and the state of piety was extremely low; there was hardly a praying family to be found. Those who had a desire to profess religion, being mostly New-England people, did not feel a freedom to unite with the church in its then present form. They had been educated in congregational principles, and they preferred that kind of church government. I was ordained in January, 1794.

Some wished to retain the Presbyterian form: and some, and a majority too of those who were professors, wished to change the form of church government. Accordingly, on the third of May, 1798, all the members, both male and female, met, and after an examination of their views of gospel doctrine and practice, were pronounced a Church of Christ, agreeable to the rules of the Northern Associated Presbytery, and the church has continued on this foundation ever since.

We have had four awakenings, and seasons of special revival in religion, since I commenced my ministry here. As fruits of these blessed seasons of grace, a goodly number has hopefully been brought into the kingdom of Christ. I have received three hundred and six into the church here, since it was organized upon its present establishment. Some of this number have been received on letters from other churches in fellowship with us; but almost the whole have been received from the world on their profession. There have been great removals by death, by changing their place of residence from this town to other parts of the country, and by excommunication. I cannot now accurately state the largest number of which this church has consisted at one particular time; twenty-nine is the largest number which has ever been received into fellowship in one day. At several different times there have been quite a large number of youth who were professors; at the present time, there are but few belonging to the church who are in single life. The present number of the church is one hundred and twenty-two; a number of these, by reason of age, infirmities, living at a distance from the house of God, and other causes which it is not necessary to mention, have attended with the church but very little, if any, for several years. The ranks of the church are every year thinning by removals; and there are none coming forward to fill their places. A general deadness as to spiritual things has for a long time been found in this place, and the greatest evil of all, which attends this state of things is, people are willing to have it so: they appear to manifest no wish that the state of things in a moral view should be changed.

My preaching, as far as I understand the system, has been truly Calvinistic. I appeal to you all, whether you have ever found me a man-pleaser: Have I ever shrunk from declaring the truth even in the most trying times? Though a minister has so many trying temptations arising from the world, and the desire to retain the friendship of the unrenewed part of his audience, not to be found faithful, not to crowd truth upon the conscience, in all its length and breadth, lest it should give offence; yet can you mention an instance in which I have shrunk from my duty? Though the friendship of all persons, of every class of hearers, of even the impenitent, is so desirable to a minister who has an earnest desire to live in peace with all men, and to even seek the things which make for peace, yet witness against me if you can, the time or place when I ever shrunk from the full declaration of God's word, because I feared that it would arm the resentment of the ungodly against me. With the sword of the divine law at my back, and the awful judgement of the great day when I must give up an account of my stewardship before me, I dared not keep back any part of divine truth. I think I have realized in some measure the worth of the souls of my hearers; and I have endeavoured so to preach as to save my soul and those that heard me.

Have I ever caused the gospel trumpet to give an uncertain sound? Have not I ever put a difference between the clean and the unclean? And have I not ever pointed out the difference between the holy and the profane? Have you ever known me to talk alike to saint and sinner? Witness against me if you can, when I ever cried peace, peace, when there was no peace. Have not I, in the most moving and affectionate terms, intreated sinners in Christ's stead to become reconciled to God? Have not I followed him from Sabbath to Sabbath, with the most earnest intreaties to become reconciled to God while the door is open? Have not I showed the sinner on gospel ground that there is no hope for him?

I appeal to the whole church if I ever refused to administer the ordinances of the gospel to any who were the proper subjects of them. Have not I ever manifested the utmost readiness to feed the sheep and to feed the lambs of the flock with the sincere milk of the word of divine truth, and to administer the ordinances to them for their quickening, for their comfort, and for the confirmation of their faith?

As purity is necessary to the peace and prosperity and growth of the church, and to its honour and respectability in the world, have not I in every instance when there was a call for it, urged upon the church their duty, and pointed out to them the spirit with which discipline must be exercised, that the desired end may be effected, that the offender may be reclaimed, and God's name be glorified? Have I ever manifested the least disposition to screen any one from discipline who in the judgement of the church, was deserving it? Have not I often pressed discipline upon the church, when I could get none to undertake it? Has not the church often bled at every pore through the neglect of its members towards offenders? If the moral health of the church is not kept good, it will certainly languish and die; a tree, or vine, that it may be made fruitful, must be kept well pruned.

I appeal to every one, if I have not, during the whole of my ministry here, made it my business to press the punctual and the faithful performance of duty upon every one? Have not I, in times more than I can reckon up, called your attention to the solemn and important duty of family prayer—of the sanctification of the Sabbath—of public worship in the sanctuary—of closet duties—of separation from the world in your life and conversation—and of a close and humble walk with God? Have not I always told you that the best way to carry conviction to the conscience of those around, of the holiness of your hearts, was to evidence it in your life and conversation? You must in all things walk according to the rules of God's word, if you would rightly support the christian character.

Whenever a person has been sick, and I have been called upon to visit him, I have invariably attended—not an instance to the contrary can be found; and I have commonly made it my rule of procedure, when I have heard of any one within the congregation that was sick, dangerously sick, to improve the first opportunity to visit him, though I have not been requested to do it. When a sick person has at any time desired the prayers of the church and congregation, I do not recollect a single instance that I have failed to visit him, and to pray with him, and impart such instruction as his case required, and he was capable of receiving.

I had the peculiar happiness of living in peace with all my neighbours: I have never had a quarrel or controversy with one of them. If we did not at all times agree in all things, yet the matter was at all times so disposed of as to prevent a rupture, and I believe we were saved from any wrong feelings towards each other.

In the course of my ministry here, I have had many things to encounter that have been exceedingly trying to my feelings, but never, according to my recollection, have I in a single instance been so thrown off my guard by any opposition which I have received, as to be enkindled into a passion. God has mercifully preserved me from anger, and has kept me from railing and provoking language; and in all my intercourse with my fellow men, I have endeavoured to seek the things which make for peace.

I have known what it is to be afflicted. Here have I buried the wife of my youth—a woman endeared to me by every tender tie; she was endeared to her family—to a large circle of christian friends, and she died in the full faith of the gospel. Here I expect soon to bury my present wife; she is now apparently in the last agonies of life, and only awaits the call of her dear Lord and Master to depart, and to be with him, which is far better than to be here. Will the Lord prepare my heart for a repetition of such sore trials.

I have spent all the prime of life, and the best part of my days in this place. Thirty-six years have I preached to you the great things of the kingdom of Christ. I am now passed my sixtieth year; my usefulness cannot any where be continued but a little while longer, if my life should be lengthened out. I have been with you in days of prosperity, and in days of adversity. I have seen and enjoyed good days, amidst many trials and crosses, and I think I have reason to bless God for all the way he has led me in life.

I thought to have spent the remainder part of my days here with you in the ministry, but God in his holy providence has ordered otherwise. The spirit of anti-masonry rose here at the very time most favourable for its rapid growth. Religion was at a very low ebb, and the mind was in a right state to receive just such a kind of spirit, and to blow it up to the highest pitch, and to prostrate every good feeling before it; and we see that this is the very course which it has taken. Religion has disappeared on its approach. The tunnel of anti-masonry grew hotter and hotter, and there was no alternative left for me, only to be overpowered by its exterminating spirit, or to flee before it. And as several had already taken a decided stand, and declared that they would not pay me any salary, because I was guilty of the crime of being a mason, I thought that wisdom, personal safety, and peace within my own breast, required that I should retire from my pastoral charge; and hence it was that I deliberately asked for my dismission. I was persuaded that my friends would not wish me to continue in such a situation, exposed to such an intolerant spirit, which prostrates all before it, levels all distinctions in the character of men; paralyzes every religious feeling; divides families, societies, churches, counties and states; alienates the most intimate friends; declares every one that will not come into its measures, shall be prohibited holding any office of any grade in either state or church, and declares that it will not give over its persecutions until every mason, and every upholder and supporter of masonry, shall be buried from his office, and they snugly placed in his room. Jacobinism in France, in the days of Robespierre, was not so deadly in its influence as the spirit of anti-masonry.

If a man does not attend a lodge for ten or fifteen years, and has made up his mind on good and sufficient reasons not to attend any more, this does not satisfy—this does not in the least shield him from the deadly, persecuting hand which is raised against him. Anti-masons will have no neutrals; every one shall come over to the standard which they have erected, or feel the utmost extent of their persecuting rage.

Travel over the whole western section of the state where this anti-masonic spirit has spread with its wasting influence and exterminating rage, and you will see nothing but a moral desolation. Every thing is as completely in a moral waste as the Island of Scio was in a natural waste, after it had felt the barbarous, ruthless hand of the blood thirsty and insatiable Turk. At the west you will see churches, which were but a few years since prosperous and in peace, and walking hand in hand in the duties and ordinances of the gospel, now divided: refusing to fellowship one another as christians; filled with the uttermost bitterness one towards the other, and the stated ministrations of the gospel driven away from them; societies in ruins, and the morals of the people rapidly returning to a mere heathenish degradation. Let this spirit continue to rage, and our world will be an alcazema, a field of blood; for all the depraved passions of the human heart are enlisted in the promotion of this fell, destroying mania.

If I have any spirit of discernment, from the state of things in this society and church, I see a dreadful weight of woe and ruin connected with this anti-masonic spirit, in relation to this people. I already seem to see the seeds of dissolution and final ruin taking deep root. The church and society, which have been prosperous for more than thirty years, already tremble and pant for existence. I look on the people, to whom I have so long administered, with deep interest. I tremble for their welfare and existence. I am filled with the most sensible emotions at the threatening prospect before you. I have a most ardent desire for your peace and prosperity. I have, as an ambassador of Christ, administered to you for many years; and now to see such a cloud hanging over you fraught with such dreadful evils and charged with such exterminating appearances, is distressing indeed. I hope my fears towards you will not be realized; that God in infinite mercy will avert the storm which hangs over you, and gathers blackness every moment. If he does not in his rich grace interfere, you are a ruined people, past all hopes of a recovery. If a different spirit is not manifested, from what has been for several months past, I fear your destruction is sealed.

I make no doubt that some, at least, who have engaged in this anti-masonic excitement are sincere. They think that the exigency of the times calls for the most serious exertions. But their sincerity in the thing does not justify the measure at all. Saul of Tarsus verily thought within himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which thing he actually did in persecuting and committing to prison and to death the innocent followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was very sincere in his malicious attack on Christianity. He afterwards acknowledged that his sincerity was no justification of his conduct in persecuting the church of Christ. People may be sincere in a wrong measure as well as in a right.

As I have now barely, in a brief manner, brought into view some of the good works which I have shown you from my heavenly Father, and which I have actually done among you; and have touched upon the only thing which has brought my ministerial labours to a close with you, I shall now, after offering up my earnest prayer for your best peace and prosperity, take my affectionate leave of you; verily believing, that every thing respecting my ministry here, both in relation to you and myself, will be reviewed at the judgement day. Consequently, as eventual as eternity, stand connected with the relation which subsists between minister and people. I must give an account how and what I have preached, and you must give an account how you have heard, and how you have practised. Wishing you much of the divine presence and enlarged measures of the influence of the holy spirit, I now take an affectionate leave of you—farewell. AMEN.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

ELECTRICITY.

It is curious to take a retrospective view of the mode in which the effects of the Leyden phial were announced to the world, on their first discovery. The philosophers who first experienced, in their own person, the shock attendant on the transmission of an electric discharge, were so impressed with wonder and with terror by this novel sensation, that they wrote the most ridiculous and exaggerated account of their feelings on the occasion. Muschenbroek states, that he received so dreadful a concussion in his arms, shoulder, and heart, that he lost his breath, and it was two days before he could recover from its effects; he declared also, that he should not be induced to take another shock for the whole kingdom of France. Mr. Allemand reports, that the shock deprived him of breath for some minutes, and afterwards produced so acute a pain across the right arm, that he was apprehensive it might be attended with serious consequences. Mr. Winkler informs us, that it threw his whole body into convulsions, and excited such a ferment in his blood, as would have thrown him into a fever, but for the timely employment of febrifuge remedies. He states, that at another time it produced copious bleeding at the nose; the same effect was produced also upon his lady, who was almost rendered incapable of walking. These strange accounts naturally excited the attention and wonder of all classes of people; the learned and the vulgar were equally desirous of experiencing so singular a sensation, and great numbers of halit-taught electricians wandered through every part of Europe to gratify this universal curiosity.

It is on the nervous system that the most considerable action of electricity is exerted. A strong charge passed through the head, gave to Mr. Singer the sensation of a violent but universal blow, and was followed by a transient loss of memory and indistinctness of vision. If a charge be sent through the head of a bird, its optic nerve is usually injured or destroyed, and permanent blindness induced; and a similar shock given to larger animals, produces a tremulous state of the muscles, with general prostration of strength. If a person who is standing receive a charge through the spine, he loses his power over the muscles to such a degree, that he either drops on his knees, or falls prostrate on the ground; if the charge be sufficiently powerful, it will produce immediate death, in consequence, probably, of the sudden exhaustion of the whole energy of the nervous system. Small animals, such as mice and sparrows, are instantly killed by a shock from thirty square inches of glass. Van Marum found that eels are irrecoverably deprived of life when a shock is sent through their whole body; but when only a part of the body is included in the circuit, the destruction of irritability is confined to that individual part, while the rest retains the power of motion. Different persons are affected in very different degrees by electricity, according to their peculiar constitutional susceptibility. Dr. Young remarks, that a very minute tremor, communicated to the most elastic parts of the body, in particular the chest, produces an agitation of the nerves, which is not wholly unlike the effect of a weak electricity.

The bodies of animals killed by electricity, rapidly undergo putrefaction, and the action of electricity upon the flesh of animals is also found to accelerate this process in a remarkable degree. The same effect has been observed in the bodies of persons destroyed by lightning. It is also a well-established fact, that the blood does not coagulate after death from this cause.

CHARACTER.

DE WITT CLINTON.

The following sketch is from a review of Dr. Hosack's Life of Mr. Clinton, in the last number of the North American Review.

At a very early period of his life, he acquired and cultivated habits of great industry; he rose at an early hour at all seasons of the year. He observed the utmost punctuality in all his engagements; this too he was the better enabled to accomplish, by means of the order and regularity with which he divided the several duties of the day; illustrating by example that well known truth, that he who has the most numerous avocations, is the most attentive and the most punctual in the performance of all; every hour not occupied by his numerous public duties, was devoted to general literature. History, poetry, taste, belles-lettres, metaphysics, natural history, theology, all in turn occupied those portions of his time, not devoted to public business, or the duties of the various stations he filled; and he studiously noted with his pen every fact or principle that he deemed important, or that might be rendered subservient to his intellectual improvement, or to the profit of others; by this habit of collecting in his commonplace book, what he considered of value, he was enabled to concentrate the ample stores of his knowledge upon the various subjects which occupied his more immediate pursuits; even those smaller portions of the day that are lost by most men, were not unemployed by him; like the goldsmith, who carefully accumulates the smaller particles that drop beneath his hand, and which collected, constitute the ingot. Mr. Clinton, in like manner, carefully treasured up the minutest fragments of time, which, though inconsiderable in themselves, compass an aggregate of great value.

The ordinary and more frivolous amusements of fashionable life presented no attractions to his mind; on the contrary, they were by him, I believe through life, most studiously avoided, as not only involving the loss of time, money, and reputation, but utterly incompatible with those pursuits and views that belong to a man who has at heart his dignity of character, the high interests of science, or his country's welfare.

This leads me to notice Mr. Clinton as a writer and speaker. Mr. Clinton as a public speaker, was slow and deliberate in his manner, manifesting the constant exercise of his understanding while in the act of delivery; he also observed great order in the plan of his discourse, arranging his arguments with precision, and with the view of giving to each its appropriate place and effect, exhibiting thereby much previous and careful consideration of his subject; yet such was the quickness of his perception and power of analysis, that he did not require long preparatory deliberations to embrace a full view of the merits of the question which came before him.

Such were the ample stores of his mind, that when an extemporaneous expression of his views or opinions was demanded, whether upon the seat of justice, the floor of the senate, or upon any other public occasion, at the shortest notice he could summon to his purpose all the resources of his highly gifted and cultivated understanding; with these at his command, it may be added, Mr. Clinton was enabled to give full force to the discussion in which he was engaged, and to avail himself of the peculiar advantage it afforded him of directing his attention to, and of observing the effects of his argument upon, every individual of the body he addressed. Such too was his perception of the effect produced upon his auditory; that I have often heard him say, that when speaking in the senate, or other deliberative assemblies, he could decide at the moment the probable result of his address, and at once ascertain, how far it was safe to urge the question immediately to a decision, or to suggest the expediency of deferring such decision to a more distant day, when he could have the opportunity of adding to the friends of the measure he wished to accomplish.

He never indulged in rant or vehemence, either in voice or gesture, yet his clear and logical method and arrangement, the force and perspicuity of style, and dignity of manner, his strong and manly tone of voice, united with his undaunted firmness, gave to his discourse, whether in the judgement seat or in the hall of legislation, an influence and effect, which no other individual, except the lamented Hamilton, Wells, and Emmet, has ever exercised in our state. As far as conductive reasoning, happy illustration, strong and vigorous language, a style always dignified, and oftentimes highly ornamented, can be considered as constitutional eloquence, and are calculated to arrest the attention, and to carry conviction to his auditory, Mr. Clinton is entitled to the denomination of an eloquent speaker.

His style, not remarkable for precision of thought, or refinement and accuracy of expression, is animated, bold, and strong; the language lofty and sweeping; the illustrations and allusions, though not always in the most exact taste, drawn from a wide range of reading and study, are always striking. The style, on the whole, faithfully exhibits the expanded views, lofty motives, the elevation above the petty manœuvring and wily intrigues of party, the stern integrity and fearless intrepidity of the man.

Though during a great part of his active life he was tossing among the currents and eddies of our turbulent politics, sufficiently boisterous and agitated in every part of the country, but not least so in New-York, yet he snatched a great deal of time for more quiet pursuits, the solaces of reflection and intellectual culture, and cheerfully lent his talents, influence, and labours to various charitable, literary, and economical objects. He was an active member of the New-York Historical Society, which is greatly indebted to him for its present flourishing condition, and promise of future usefulness. His Discourse before that Society on Indian character and antiquities, is the fruit of great industry and research in a course of studies diverging widely from his ordinary pursuits. He was an active member of the Academy of Arts, contributed materially towards the establishment of the Orphan Asylum, the system of public schools, the agricultural societies, the New-York City Hospital, the free-school societies. Every philanthropical institution or enterprise found in him a ready, zealous, indefatigable, and powerful friend; the eyes that saw him blessed him, and in future generations thousands will bless without seeing him.

SKETCH OF ISABELLA, OF SPAIN.

Selected from Irving's Life of Columbus.

Cotemporary writers have been enthusiastick in their descriptions of Isabella, but time has sanctioned their eulogies; she is one of the purest and most beautiful characters on the page of history. She was well formed, of the middle size, with great dignity and gracefulness of deportment, and a mingled gravity and sweetness of demeanour. Her complexion was fair; her hair auburn, inclining to red; her eyes were of a clear blue, with a benign expression, and there was a singular modesty in her countenance, gracing as it did, a wonderful firmness of purpose, and earnestness of spirit. Though strongly attached to her husband, and studious of his fame, yet she always maintained her distinct rights as an allied princess. She exceeded him in beauty, in personal dignity, in acuteness of genius, and in grandeur of soul. Combining the active and resolute qualities of man, with the softer charities of woman, she mingled in the warlike councils of her husband, engaged personally in his enterprises, and in some instances surpassed him in the firmness and intrepidity of her measures; while, being inspired with a truer idea of glory, she infused a lofty and generous temper into his subtle and calculating policy.

It is in the civil history of their reign, however, that the character of Isabella shines most illustrious. Her fostering and maternal care was continually directed to reform the laws, and heal the ills engendered by a long course of internal wars. She loved her people, and while continually seeking their good, she mitigated as much as possible the harsh measures of her husband, directed to the same end but inflamed by a mistaken zeal. Thus, though almost bigoted in her piety, and perhaps too much under the influence of ghostly advisers, still she was hostile to every measure calculated to advance religion at the expense of humanity. She strenuously opposed the expulsion of the Jews, and the establishment of the Inquisition, though unfortunately for Spain, her repugnance was slowly vanquished by her confessors. She was always an advocate of clemency to the Moors, although she was the soul of the war against Grenada. She considered that war essential to protect the Christian faith, and to relieve her subjects from fierce and formidable enemies. While all her publick thoughts and acts were princely and august, her private habits were simple, frugal, and unostentatious. In the intervals of state business, she assembled around her the ablest men in literature and science, and directed herself by their councils, in promoting letters and arts.

Through her patronage Salamanca rose to that height which it assumed among the learned institutions of the age. She promoted the distribution of honours and rewards for the promulgation of knowledge, she fostered the art of printing, recently invented, and encouraged the establishment of presses in every part of the kingdom; books were admitted free of all duty, and more, we are told, were printed in Spain, at that early period of the art, than in the present literary age.

It is wonderful how much the destinies of countries depend at times upon the virtues of individuals, and how it is given to great spirits, by combining, exciting, and directing the latent powers of a nation, to stamp it, as it were, with their own greatness. Such beings realize the idea of guardian angels appointed by heaven to watch over the destinies of empires. Such had been Prince Henry for the kingdom of Portugal, and such was now for Spain the illustrious Isabella.

TOPOGRAPHY.

HURON, OR OUISCONSIN TERRITORY

The Cincinnati Advertiser has a letter from a traveller, dated at that place, containing an account of this new territory whose boundaries are to be fixed by the next Congress. As it embraces the lead mine district, some particulars extracted from the letter spoken of may not be unacceptable to our readers.

Its population is already about 16,000 souls of whom 10,000 are engaged in drawing mineral wealth from the earth. The remainder occupy the villages of Galena, Cassville, Prairie du Chien, Green Bay, and others less known to us by name. That its population is rapidly augmenting, may readily be gathered from the fact that 3000 persons passed through Buffalo, in the space of a single week this season, for Ohio, Michigan, and Huron. The latter seems indeed to be the nucleus of another Ohio, as to her climate or soil, to which may be added her vast mineral wealths, and unlimited facilities of navigation. It is a mistaken, though prevalent opinion, that the cold is excessive. Snow falls, indeed, sometimes to the depth of twelve inches; but all the grains, fruits, and vegetables, found in the same latitudes in the United States, also succeed well here. Such, too, is the influence of the Gulf (Southerly) winds which set up the many streams, and dissolve the snows, that the harvest may be reaped as early. The interior of the country is always healthy. On the borders of the larger streams it is sometimes otherwise in the summer, the great inundations of the spring leaving large pools which afterwards stagnate; but fevers are generally confined to the borders of the Mississippi. On the water courses the soil is broken and hilly; in the interior, undulating. About one-third of the land is of first rate farming quality, and about one-tenth is well timbered. The purest water is found in every direction.

Some of the copper mines may be found south-east of the Porcupine Hills, which lie on the coast of Lake Superior; but the great mine, from whose copper the spoons in Peale's Museum were made, lies on a stream which runs into the Onontagon river, nearly north-west of Copper lake, and in latitude 46°. A line drawn west from Chippicotton river of Lake Michigan, in about 42° 55', will strike Copper Mines on the branches of Rock and Peckotano, sometimes called Peckotolia, rivers. The mine which Dr. Franklin was so anxious to secure in the treaty with Great Britain, lies on an island in Lake Superior. Galena, in about latitude 42° 24', is situated on Bean (Fever or Fève) river, twelve miles from its junction with the Mississippi and Small Pox rivers, and has 250 houses and 800 inhabitants. Portage Summit, on a space of land between Ouisconsin and Fox rivers, is mentioned as likely to be a thriving town with advantages which may make it hereafter rival Cincinnati. The writer says of this place—

"In the heart of a fine country, suitable for farming, the thoroughfare to the Indian trade in the upper section of the Mississippi, commanding an uninterrupted steamboat navigation to New Orleans, save the rapids of Desmoines, and navigation equally free for boats to New York and Montreal, may not Missouri and Arkansas, in a few years, receive their supplies at a reduced rate of transportation by this route?"

Huron presents many sites for canals, and for making connexions between the Mississippi and Lake Superior. A natural one, as we have before mentioned, exists in the spring, when the waters are high. R. W. Chandler, of Galena, is about to publish a map of the mines, furnishing a general topographical view of the mineral region now worked.

When certain persons abuse us, let us ask ourselves what description of characters they admire; we shall often find this a very consolatory question.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Saturday Evening Post.
From the Philological Institute, Pittsburgh.

THE LAST OF THE DRUIDS.

A TALE OF THE SHETLAND ISLES.

The Romans were not long in peaceable possession of Britain, until the dark and bloody mysteries of Druidism, which had hitherto universally prevailed amongst the inhabitants, began fast to dispel before the mild doctrines of Christianity, introduced by their conquerors. Nor was its influence confined to Britain alone: the spirit of conversion was gradually spreading, not only over the neighbouring country of Caledonia, but also to the islands on the northern coast, which at that time were engaged in perpetual wars with wandering tribes of the Scandinavians. Such was the state of things, when a small boat, navigated by a single man, was seen to approach Swinholm, one of the Shetland group; and shortly after Longo, a once powerful arch Druid and Soothsayer, landed and bent his steps towards Glencullin, the residence of one of his colleagues, who were under the tacit protection of Magnus, the Island Chieftain. Longo was scarce two days in the island, when he received a message to attend at the hall of Magnus, who desired a private interview with him: although surprised, the Druid felt gratified at thus unexpectedly having an opportunity of exerting his influence in behalf of his profession. These crafty men, who were accustomed to rule the temporal as well as the spiritual affairs of the people, saw with regret that their controul over the minds of their followers was fast diminishing, and they resolved on making one desperate effort in order to retrieve their tottering fame. At this time there dwelt in the family of Magnus, a christian damsel named Agnes, who had some years previous been taken captive during an incursion to the south, and carried home along with the other spoils, by Harold, the son of Magnus, who commanded the expedition, and was deeply affected by the misfortunes of his lovely charge. Agnes, on her part, was bound by gratitude to the young chief, who had protected her from insult and perhaps death: from frequently conversing with her, he imbibed many of the principles which she endeavoured to inculcate, and the dread with which she hitherto regarded him as a heathen, was softened into love towards the youthful convert. Many followed the example of Harold, and became christians: the latter being now absent, it was deemed a prudent time to remove the object which had caused such an inroad upon the doctrines anciently entertained by the islanders; and this, it was supposed could easily be effected, as the old chief was decidedly averse to the introduction of Christianity amongst his retainers. Accordingly Longo repaired to the presence of the chief, whose brow bore indications of extreme mental suffering, as well as age, and who thus addressed the devotee: "Priest! thy fame has reached my ear. To your sect alone is bestowed the gift of revealing the events of futurity, and for that purpose I have requested your attendance. I had the three sons whose shields were as immovable in the hour of strife as the rocks upon which they were reared: two of them fell fighting by my side, and are now resting with the spirits of the brave. But Harold, the youngest, whom I loved more than both, went to chastise the insolence of a marauder who plundered our coast; the snow lay deep upon the ground when he departed; the forests are now green, and he has not yet returned. I fear he has fallen—fallen without a friend to raise his tomb. Tell me, oh, Priest! tell me, if I shall again see my child." "Chief," replied the Druid, "the time was when daily sacrifices were offered to the gods, and these were the times when your fame reached every land, and your arm was victorious in battle—but now the altar is neglected, and the mistletoe grows unregarded: the daughter of the stranger, and your mortal enemy, is cherished in your house; her words are believed, and her counsel attended to. Let this sacrifice be given as a sacrifice at the neglected shrine of the gods; it may appease their indignation, and you shall again see your child."

The chieftain at first refused to comply with this cruel advice, but finally his superstition gained the ascendancy over his better nature, and he consented to deliver to the zealous Druids the object of their bitter aversion. The day was chosen, and Glencullin selected for the scene of murder. Agnes was bound upon the rude altar, consisting of a huge block of granite, around which was placed a circle of stones, inside of which, none, except the sacred persons of the Priests, were permitted to intrude: billets of wood were fixed under the under the unfortunate maiden, and a demon-like smile of triumph lightened the stern and austere features of the Druid as he set the pile in a flame, and

Now the dense, white vapour floats on high,
Which veils the writhing victim from the eye,
Her shrieks are mingled with the Druid's song,
Re-echoed by the vast, deluded throng.

Though many a tear was shed at the virgin's fate,
None dared to disobey the stern mandate,
Which sent a maiden to her early grave,
Oh! lovely martyr, first choice of the brave.

Already was the unholy sacrifice consummated—the day was drawing to a close, and the spectators were gradually dispersing, wondering at what they had witnessed, but none venturing to hazard an opinion contrary to that of their chief, when the shrill blast of a horn was heard, and presently the rays of the setting sun glanced bright on the spears of a hundred warriors, who with many a shout of joy and recognition, were seen winding their way up the glen. At their head was distinguishable the lofty person of Harold, whose plume waved above his followers like a tall tree amidst a forest of shrubs, and who was flushed with his success in a recent encounter; but when he saw the assembled islanders, and the yet smoking altar, strange thoughts took possession of his fancy: a few moments revealed the dreadful truth, and Longo was the first who fell a victim to his avenging hand. The death of the subordinate Priests followed shortly after; and the proud, haughty Druids, were ever afterwards known only as the wandering minstrels, subsisting on the gratuitous bequests of the people, whom they had long ruled with a despotick sway.

MISCELLANY.

From the Journal of Health.

WATER versus ARDENT SPIRITS.

"If," says Hoffman, a celebrated German physician, "there is in nature a remedy which deserves the name of universal, it is, in my opinion, pure water. The use of it is so general, and so necessary to us all, that we can neither live, nor preserve our bodies sound and healthy without it."

Water is the natural drink of plants and animals of every description, and is the only article which can fulfil those ends for which the introduction of a liquid into the human system is demanded. Its use is equally adapted to every age and temperament,—to every season and climate. It facilitates digestion, and, by its fluidity and mildness, promotes that free and equable circulation of the blood and humours through all the vessels of the body, upon which the due performance of every animal function depends.

Hence, in physical strength, in the capability of enduring labour and fatigue, in the vigour and clearness of the intellectual powers, the individuals whose drink is confined entirely to water, far exceed those who substitute for the pure element distilled or fermented liquors.

"Their equal days
Feel not the alternate fits of feverish mirth,
And sick dejection.—
Blest with Divine immunity from ails,
Long centuries they live; their only fate
Is ripe old age, and rather sleep than death."

Errors in regard to drink constitute one of the causes to which, in a great measure, are to be attributed the increase of disease as society advances in refinement and luxury. It has been computed, that since the introduction of ardent spirits into common use, more victims have fallen by it alone, than by the sword and pestilence within the same period.

A belief is entertained by many that there are certain circumstances, however, which render the latter a preferable drink to pure water. Ardent spirits are supposed useful to preserve the system from the effects of cold and dampness. The very contrary is the fact. Though an individual, while under the immediate excitement of the intoxicating draught, may perhaps expose himself with impunity to a degree of coldness and moisture, which would be injurious under other circumstances, yet when the stimulating effects of the liquor have passed away, his system is left in a condition far more subject to their deleterious influence than is that of the man habitually sober.

To drink water during hot weather, or in warm climates, would, it is imagined, lay the system open to the attacks of disease, while a contrary effect is ascribed to the use of ardent spirits. Experience has, however, proved that the latter argument instead of diminishing the pernicious influence of extreme heat. "Run" says Dr. Bell, "whether used habitually, moderately, or in excessive quantities, in the West Indies, always diminishes the strength of the body, and renders men more susceptible of disease, and unfit for any service in which vigour or activity is required." Rush very aptly remarks, that we might as well throw oil into a house, the roof of which was on fire, in order to prevent the flames from extending to its inside, as to pour ardent spirits into the stomach to lessen the effects of a hot sun upon the skin.

"I have known," says the same author, "many instances of persons who have followed the most laborious employments for many years, in the open air, and in warm and cold weather, who never drank any thing but water, and enjoyed uninterrupted good health." Dr. Mosely, who resided many years in the West Indies, confirms this remark. "I aver," says the Doctor, "from my own knowledge and custom, as well as the custom and observations of many other people, that those who drink nothing but water, or make it their principal drink, are but little affected by the climate, and can undergo the greatest fatigue without inconvenience, and are never subject to troublesome or dangerous diseases."

The instances in which sudden death has occurred from drinking cold water during a heated condition of the body, may probably be urged in proof of the necessity of tempering the water with a portion of ardent spirits; it is to be remarked, however, that it has been found from observation, that the injurious effects of cold water, under the circumstances here referred to, occur principally, or almost exclusively, in those individuals who are habitually intemperate.

We have spoken above of water as a means of preserving health and of warding off the attacks of disease. The following fact from the page of ancient history, will show its powers as a restorative means.

Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero, to whom so many works and letters of the latter are addressed, whilst labouring under that uncomfortable state of the mind produced by disease of the stomach, became disgusted with life and resolved to destroy himself. He called together his relations and friends, to communicate to them his design, and to consult with them upon the species of death he should make choice of. Agrippa, his son-in-law, not daring openly to oppose his resolution, persuaded him to destroy himself by famine; advising him, however, to make use of a little water to alleviate the sufferings which would at first result from entire abstinence. Atticus commenced this regimen, whilst he conversed with his family, philosophised with his intimate friends, and passed many days in thus preparing himself for death. This, however, did not occur; on the contrary, by restricting himself solely to water as his only nourishment, the pains of the stomach and bowels, by which he had been previously tormented, ceased; and he speedily felt himself improved in health and more tranquil in mind. Agrippa now attempted to convince him, that as the disease under which he had laboured was happily removed, he ought to renounce his design of putting a period to his existence. Atticus confessed, at length, the justness of his son-in-law's arguments: he accordingly followed his advice, and lived until a very advanced age.

ON PREMATURE INTERMENT.

From the European Magazine

It is the unnatural custom of the French to inter twenty-four hours after the apparent decease. Several laudable attempts have been recently made by Englishmen in France to rouse the attention of the French Ministers to the subject. Dr. Macnab, an English physician, who has resided in France for many years, has made very spirited exertions to effect a change in the law requiring interment so short a time after death. The following extracts are taken from the very interesting memorial which he has presented to the French Ministry:

"In every age and country history has furnished numerous instances of individuals, who, in apparent death, have been preserved by accidental causes from premature interment. The short period of twenty-four hours allowed by the existing laws of France for the purpose of ascertaining the real or apparent death of individuals, is far too short. There are many cases in which the signs of apparent death are witnessed, and which cannot be determined for days after they have been manifested. I could enumerate diseases in which such signs are common."

Doctor Macnab then proceeds, in his illustration of his position, to relate among others the following:

"The danger to which the elegant Lady Russell was exposed is too well known, both in France and in England, to require details. She remained seven days and nights without any sign of life, and her interment was delayed only on account of the violent grief which Lord Russell experienced at the idea of being separated from a beloved wife. On the eighth day, as the parish bells were tolling for church, Lady Russell suddenly raised her head, and to the amazement and indescribable joy of her husband, told him to get ready to accompany her to church. Her recovery was rapid and complete; and she lived many years afterwards, to render her Lord the father of a family." "If," says the author, "Lady Russell had been in France, under the existing law, she would have been buried alive."

The second instance is related by the celebrated Odiar of Geneva, in the following words:—"I knew a girl, twenty-five years old, named Eliza Roy, who narrowly escaped being buried alive. She lived at a distance of two leagues from Geneva. For some years she had been subject to nervous attacks, which frequently deprived her of every appearance of life; but after the lapse of a few hours she would recover and resume her occupations as if nothing had happened. On one occasion, however, the suspension of her faculties was so protracted that her friends called in a medical man of the neighbourhood, who pronounced her dead. She was then sewn up in a close shroud, according to the barbarous custom of the country, and laid upon the bedstead. Among those who called to condole with the parents was a particular friend of the supposed deceased, of her own age. The young woman, anxious to take a last look at her friend, ripped the shroud and imprinted a kiss upon her cheek. Whilst she was kissing her she fancied that she felt her breathe. She repeated her caresses; and being shortly assured of the fact of her friend not being dead, she applied her mouth to that of the girl, and in a short time the latter was restored to life, and able to dress herself."

Dr. Crichton, physician to the Grand Duke Nicholas, brother to the Emperour of Russia, relates a fact from his own experience which powerfully supports the arguments used by Dr. Macnab. "A young girl," says Dr. Crichton, "in the service of the Princess of —, who had for some time kept her bed with a nervous affection, at length, to all appearance, was deprived of life. Her face had all the character of death—her body was perfectly cold, and every other symptom of death was manifested. She was removed into another room, and placed in a coffin. On the day fixed for her funeral, hymns, according to the custom of the country, were sung before the door; but at the very moment when they were going to nail down the coffin, a perspiration was seen upon her skin, and in a few minutes it was succeeded by a convulsive motion in the hands and feet. In a few moments she opened her eyes, and uttered a piercing scream. The faculty were instantly called in, and in the space of a few days her health was completely re-established. The account which she gave of her situation is extremely curious. She said that she appeared to dream that she was dead, but that she was sensible to every thing that was passing round her; and distinctly heard her friends bewailing death; she felt them envelope her in the shroud, and place her in the coffin. This sensation gave her extreme agony, and she attempted to speak, but her soul was unable to act upon her body. She describes her sensations as very contradictory, as if she was and was not in her body at one and the same instant. She attempted in vain to move her arms, to open her eyes, or to speak. The agony of her mind was at its height when she heard the funeral hymn, and found that they were about to nail down the lid of the coffin. The horror of being buried alive gave a new impulse to her mind, which resumed its power over its corporeal organization, and produced the effects which excited the notice of those who were about to convey her to a premature grave."

THE HYPOCHONDRIACK.

Some hypochondriacs have fancied themselves miserably afflicted in one way, and some in another; some have insisted that they were tea-pots, and some that they were town-clocks; one that he was extremely ill, and another that he was actually dying. But perhaps none of this blue devil class ever matched in extravagance a patient of the late Dr. Stevenson, of Baltimore. This hypochondriack, after wringing the change of every mad conceit that ever tormented a crazy brain, would have it at last that he was dead, actually dead. Dr. Stevenson having been sent for one morning in great haste by the wife of his patient, hastened to his bed side, where he found him stretched out at full length, his hands across his breast, his toes in contact, his eyes and mouth closely shut, and his looks cadaverous. "Well, sir, how do you do? how do you do this morning?" asked Dr. Stevenson, in a jocular way, approaching his bed. "How do I do?" replied the hypochondriack faintly; "a pretty question to ask a dead man." "Dead!" replied the doctor. "Yes, sir, dead, quite dead. I died last night about twelve o'clock." Dr. Stevenson putting his hand gently on the forehead of the hypochondriack, as if to ascertain whether it was cold, and also feeling his pulse, exclaimed in a doleful tone, "Yes, the poor man is dead enough; 'tis all over with him; and now the sooner he can be buried the better." Then stepping up to his wife, and whispering to her not to be frightened at the measures he was about to take; he called to the servant: "My boy, your poor Mr. — is dead; and the sooner he can be put into the ground the better. Run to C—, for I know he always keeps New-England coffins by him ready made; and do you hear, bring a coffin of the largest size, for your master makes a stout corpse, and having died last night, and the weather being warm, he will not keep long. Away went the servant, and soon returned with a proper coffin. The wife and family having got their lesson from the doctor, gathered around him, and howled not a little, while they were putting the body in the coffin. Presently the pall-bearers, who were quickly provided and let into the secret, started with the hypochondriack for the churchyard. They had not gone far, before they were met by one of the town's people, who having been properly drilled by Stevenson, cried, out, "ah, doctor, what poor soul have you got there?" "Poor Mr. B—," sighed the doctor, "left us last night." "Great pity he had not left us ten years ago," replied the other; "he was a bad man." Presently another of the townsmen met them with the same question, "and what poor soul have you got there doctor?" "Poor Mr. B—," answered the doctor again, "is dead." "Ah! indeed said the other; "and so he is gone to meet his deserts at last." "Oh, villain!" exclaimed the man in the coffin. Soon after this, while the pall-bearers were resting themselves near the church-yard, another stepped up with the old question again. "What poor soul have you got there doctor?" "Poor Mr. B—," he replied, "is gone." "Yes, and to the bottomless pit," said the other, "for if he is not gone there, I see not what use there is for such a place." Here the dead man, bursting off the lid of the coffin, which had been purposely left loose, leaped out exclaiming, "O you villain! I am gone to the bottomless pit, am I? Well, I have come back again to pay such ungrateful rascals as you are." A chase was immediately commenced, by the dead man after the living, to the petrifying consternation of many of the spectators, at sight of a corpse, in all the horrors of the winding-sheet, running through the streets. After having exercised himself into a copious perspiration by the fantastick race, the hypochondriack was brought home by Dr. Stevenson; freed from all his complaints; and by strengthening food, generous wine, cheerful company, and moderate exercise, was soon restored to perfect health.

MARRIAGE CEREMONY.

Hoboken is probably to become as celebrated for sacrifices at the hymenial altar as it now is for those made at the shrine of false honour. By the existing laws of this state, no formal solemnization of the marriage ceremony is necessary. Any bona fide and solemn engagement or contract, that such relation shall exist from thence forward, co instantis, is a legal marriage. By the revised, or rather the new statute, which is to go into effect on the first of January next, a former solemnization, and other acts, are made necessary. Among other things, the statute declares, that

Females may marry at 14, and males at 17 years of age.

Marriage can be solemnized only by ministers of the gospel, and priests of every denomination, by mayors, recorders and alderman of cities, and by judges of the county courts, and justices of the peace. When solemnized by a minister or priest, the ceremony must be according to the forms and customs of the church or society to which he belongs; and when by a magistrate, no particular form is necessary, except the parties must solemnly declare they take each other as husband and wife. In every case there must be at least one witness present.

It is the duty of every priest or magistrate, to ascertain the christian and surnames of the parties; their respective residences, and their profession or occupation; or the name and residence of one, if only one witness be present. The facts so ascertained, and the day of the marriage, he must enter in a book kept for that purpose.

If either the parties to be married shall not be personally known to the priest or magistrate, he shall require proof of the identity of such person, by the oath of some person made known to him; which oath any magistrate may administer.

The statute does not apply to Quakers or Jews.

I have always thought this delicate subject flourished best when let alone. But our law makers have thought proper to point out the manner in this interesting ceremony shall be performed; and perhaps the regulations are such as the publick good require. There are many cases, however; where the parties cannot or will not submit to any restrictions or delays. For relief of such persons an asylum will no doubt be provided in some romantick spot on the Jersey shore, where they may have the knot tied to suit themselves.

There appears to be one great obstacle to many marriages under the statute; the magistrate or priest is required to ascertain the ages of the parties. The age of an old maid indeed! This is a ticklish subject. The fair sex over 20 years of age, are very coy in this matter. Many old young maids would well nigh expire in the act of confession—others would be guilty of fraud or perjury rather than reveal the appalling truth; and should the truth be told, many a swain would, horror-struck, surrender up his intended rib. BENEDICT.

THE RAINBOW.

The poets feigned the rainbow to be the residence of certain aerial creatures, whose delight it is to sport and wanton in the clouds. Milton, in his exquisite pastoral drama of Comus, thus alludes to this Platonick idea:—

"I took it for a fairy vision

Of some gay creature in the element,
That in the colours of the rainbow live,
And play 't' th' plighted clouds."

Shakspeare is the only writer who has alluded to the colours which are reflected on the eye when suffused with tears. The rainbow, which, not improbably, first suggested the idea of arches, though beautiful in all countries, is more particularly so in mountainous ones; for, independent of their frequency, it is impossible to conceive any thing more grand than the appearance of this fine arch, when its points rest upon the opposite sides of a narrow valley, or on the peaked summits of precipitate mountains. The Scandinavians believed it to connect earth with heaven, and gave it, for a guardian, a being called Heimdallar. It is impossible to see a rainbow without feeling an admiration towards the power that forms it. One of the glories which are said to surround the throne of heaven is a rainbow like an emerald. In the Apocalypse it is described as encircling the head of an angel; in Ezekiel, the four cherubim are compared to a cloud arched with it.

ANOTHER MASANIELLO.

The port of Milo is one of the best in the Mediterranean: it presents a safer anchorage than Mitylene, though the latter has the advantage of position. The situation of Milo under the Turkish domination, was exceedingly happy; the island paid an annual tribute to the Porte, and its governors were chosen from among the inhabitants. In the seventeenth century, a man of low birth, named John Capsi, made Milo, for a time, an independent kingdom. Capsi had been a seaman, and, like many of his countrymen, he had amassed a considerable sum by the business of a pilot, and by some commercial speculations in the islands of the Archipelago; he was bold and enterprising, and his good humour and pleasing manners rendered him much beloved among his countrymen. There were no Turks residing on the island, which they visited but rarely, and only for the purpose of receiving the tribute-money; for the vigilance of the Knights of Malta rendered the periodical visits of the Captain Pacha exceedingly dangerous. The people of Milo were, therefore, almost entirely left to themselves, for they had the privilege of choosing their own governors. Capsi conceived the idea of delivering his country from the dominion of the Sultan; he communicated his design to some of his friends, and when he found himself secure of the support of all classes of the inhabitants, he threw off the mask, and was proclaimed king of Milo. He was crowned by the Bishop Antonio Camillo, who put round his neck a chain of massive gold, while the people applauded the ceremony, and exclaimed, "God save Capsi! God save the king of Milo!"

Capsi fulfilled all the duties of his new dignity with the moderation of a philosopher: he conciliated the friendship of the principal islanders, through whose influence he obtained an allowance out of the public imposts, a guard of fifty men to escort him when he went out, and twenty-five sentries always on duty before his residence, which was the finest building in the island. He fixed certain days for the administration of justice, and he was at once the legislator, the judge, and the monarch of Milo. This state of things continued for three years without interruption; but at length the Porte, alarmed at the prudence, rather than at the power of Capsi, and fearing lest others might be encouraged to imitate him, determined to make an example of him, and to reduce its tributaries to passive obedience. However, it was no easy matter to seize a man who was adored by his subjects, and who had a body of eight hundred troops under arms. The Captain Pacha, being informed of these circumstances, would not himself go to Milo, lest he should excite suspicion; he merely sent three galleys for the purpose of receiving the annual tribute. The Turkish commander landed without any escort, and proceeded, unattended, to the palace of Capsi. He addressed him as the sovereign of the island, paid him a thousand compliments, and assured him that the Porte was ready to recognize his authority, provided that he would consider himself as a vassal of the Sultan, and continue to pay the tribute-money as before. Capsi, blinded by his vanity, acceded to this proposition; the Turk returned to his vessel, and Capsi, losing sight of his usual prudence, promised to return his visit. He proceeded to the sea-shore, accompanied by twelve men, and having incautiously dismissed his attendants, he went on board the vessel. He was then immediately loaded with chains; and the perfidious Turk weighed anchor, and conveyed him without delay to Constantinople, where the unfortunate king was hanged on a tree facing the gate of the Bagnio. This occurred in the year 1680.

THE GATHERER.

WASTE OF TIME.

Few men need complain of the want of time, if they are not conscious of a want of power, or of desire to ennoble and enjoy it. Perhaps, you are a man of genius yourself, gentle reader—and though not absolutely like Walter Scott, a witch, warlock, or wizard, still a poet—a maker—a creator. Think, then, how many hours on hours you have lost, lying asleep so profoundly, that

"The cock's shrill clariion, or the echoing horn,
No more could rouse you from your lazy bed."

How many more have you not absolutely lost, but to a certain extent abused, at breakfast—sip, sipping away at unnecessary cups of coffee, or gob, gobbling away at buttered rolls, for which nature never called. Then think on all your aimless forenoon saunterings—round and round about town—now to the reading-room, [though you well know there is nothing new—now home again, to receive a coach-full of country cousins, come in the capacity of forenoon callers—now dozing on the drawing-room sofa, wondering if the bell is ever to be rung—now grimly gazing on a bit of bloody beef, which your impatience has forced the blaspheming cook to draw from the spit ere the outer folds of fat were well melted at the fire—now, after a disappointed dinner, discovering that the old port has evaporated, and all that might constitute a desert, has gone the way of all things eatable—now an unwholesome sleep of interrupted snores, your bobbing head ever and anon smiting your breast-bone—now burnt beans palmed off to the family for Turkish coffee—now a game at cards, with a dead partner, and the ace of spades missing—now no supper—you have no appetite for supper—and now into bed tumbles the son of genius, complaining to the moon of the shortness of human life, and the fleetness of time!

DEATH OF MOSES.

The Jewish lawgiver ascended the loftiest eminence in the neighbourhood, in order that he might once behold, before his eyes closed for ever, the land of promise. From the top of Mount Abarim, or Nebo, the former of which names may perhaps be traced in Djebel Attarous, the highest point in the district, the lawgiver, whose eyes were not yet dimmed, and who had suffered none of the infirmities of age, might survey a large tract of country. To the right lay the romantick pastures of Gilead, the romantick district of Bashan; the windings of the Jordan might be traced along its broad and level valley, till, almost beneath his feet, it flowed into the Dead Sea. To the north spread the luxuriant plains of Esdracron, the more hilly yet fruitful country of Lower Galilee. Right opposite stood the city of Jericho, embowered in its groves of palms; beyond it the mountains of Judea, rising above each other till they reached the sea. Gazing on this magnificent prospect, beholding in prophetick anticipation his great and happy commonwealth occupying its numerous towns and blooming fields, Moses breathed his last. The place of his burial was unknown, lest the impious gratitude of his followers might ascribe divine honours to his name, and assemble to worship at his sepulchre.

FASTING.

Distinct from religious ordinances and anchorite zeal, fasting has been frequently recommended and practised, as a means of removing incipient diseases, and of restoring the body to its customary healthful sensations. Howard, the celebrated philanthropist, used to fast one day in the week. Franklin for a period did the same. Napoleon, when he felt his system unstrung, suspended his wonted repast, and took exercise on horseback. The list of distinguished names might, if necessary, be increased—but why adduce authority in favour of a practice which the instinct of the brute creation leads them to adapt, whenever they are sick. Happily for them they have no meddling prompters in the shape of well meaning friends to force a stomach already enfeebled and loathing its customary food, to digest this or that delicacy—soup, jelly, custard, chocolate and the like."

WASHINGTON AND MASONRY. We have received from a correspondent at Alexandria, D. C. fac-similes, taken by himself, from the originals of the following answers of the illustrious WASHINGTON, to two communications, received by him from the masonick body, over which he subsequently presided as Master. It affords us much pleasure to comply with the request to publish them, and we include the hope, with our correspondent, that the honest and well disposed enemies to masonry will receive them with the deference which is justly due to the opinions of their immortal author. They are brief, but conclusive. The language is as decidedly favourable to the institution of freemasonry, as any that is written now, or has been written from that time to this, by its friends, on similar occasions. There is not the possibility of a doubt that the opinions implied by these answers were sincerely cherished by Washington: every one who is acquainted with his character, knows that if he had entertained a belief that the institution was dangerous or useless, he would not have hesitated to express it. Yet the mushroom orators of the day have repeatedly declared that he was cowardly in this particular—that he was fearful of being "cable-towed." What impudence, and what nonsense! The common sense of every man will reject such stuff, and teach him that the following letters would not have been written by a man as honest, as candid, and as grave as Washington, had he not esteemed the worth of the masonick institution unquestionable. To say that the father of his country believed one thing, and wrote another, on the subject of masonry, is to belie the natural sincerity of his character, and the whole tenour of his life. Washington surely would not have "felt pleasure" in "rendering service" to a masonick body, had he considered it dangerous to the liberties of his country; nor would he "with pleasure" have "received an invitation to dine with the master and members of a Lodge," had they been traitors and cut-throats. We recommend these replies to the reader, enjoining him for once to cast aside his prejudices, if he has any, and honestly ask the veneration which he entertains for their author, if they are not, brief as they are, a sufficient refutation of the volumes of malignant slander, which have been thrown out by vicious speculators against the masonick institution.

"Gentlemen—

"With a pleasing sensibility I received your favour of the 26th, and beg leave to offer you my sincere thanks for the favorable sentiments with which it abounds

"I shall always feel pleasure when it may be in my power to render service to Lodge, No. 39, and in every act of brotherly kindness to the members of it being with great truth

"Your affectionate Brother

"Mount Vernon, June 19th, 1784.

"Dear Sir,

"With pleasure I received the invitation of the Master and members of Lodge No. 39, to dine with them on the Ann-versary of St. John the Baptist—if nothing unforeseen at present interferes, I will have the honor of doing it. For the polite and flattering terms in which you have expressed their wishes, you will please to accept my thanks.—

"With esteem and respect

"I am Dear Sir,

"G. WASHINGTON.

The original copies of the above are framed and hung up over the Master's seat, in the room occupied by Lodge, No. 39. The same venerable man who was Tyler of the Lodge when Washington presided, has held the office since that time, and holds it still.

¶ We would direct the attention of the reader to the Sermon upon our first and second pages. We seldom see a production which surpasses it for piety, calmness, plainness, and just reasoning. The aged and excellent author, after a residence of thirty-six years with the same congregation, has been compelled, by the reckless spirit of anti-masonry, to seek another home! Do not the feelings of every christian revolt at such scenes? Can any man, who wishes well to religion or to society, encourage them? What a contrast is there between the truly christian feeling and calm but dignified submission of Mr. Fenn, and the exterminating spirit of his persecutors!

¶ The anti-masons of Monroe have nominated Thurloe Weed for the assembly! This is the most disgraceful nomination (not excepting even that of Southwick) which has been made since the anti-masonic excitement broke out. Men who will support such a fellow as Weed, knowing his character as they must know it in Monroe county, can entertain very little respect for the institutions of their country, or the ordinances of christianity. We do not apprehend that Weed will be elected; his nomination, however, may be taken as a sign of what a faction of political anti-masons would do if they had the power.

The Virginia Convention assembled at Richmond, on the 3th inst. The venerable James Monroe was elected president, without opposition. This convention is composed of the most distinguished men in that state; among its members are James Madison, John Marshall, Wm. B. Giles, and John Randolph. Various select committees have been appointed, and the constitution of more than fifty years' standing, distributed among them.

¶ The story that the Russians had entered Constantinople, which we published last week, turns out to be incorrect. The last advices encourage a belief that peace will ensue.

¶ The reader will learn from a notice in another column, that THE TOKEN for 1830, the most splendid annual ever got up in this country, and quite equal to any thing from across the waters, will be published in this city, by W. C. Little, on Tuesday next. It will be a rich treat for the ladies and the lovers of pleasant reading

It would not excite our special wonder, should the anti-masonic party assume the name of anti-christian party. Most of the present leaders of that party are disbelievers in Christianity, and it must be admitted that the objections which these men have brought against masonry, will apply with nearly equal force to both institutions. Masonry, say these paragons of benevolence, is a selfish institution—it makes it the peculiar duty of its members to do acts of kindness to their brethren. So does religion—that, like masonry, inculcates universal benevolence; but while it enjoins the "doing good to all men," it especially commands it to be done to the "household of faith." Do not the anti-masons aim at the subversion of religion, by attempting to repudiate the principles upon which it is founded? It may not be many years before the public will be told that the Baptist or Presbyterian society is selfish in its operations; that it exercises a political influence; that there are bad men belonging to it, and the public good requires that none of its members should be permitted to fill any offices under our government. None can foresee the termination of this war of proscription. There are many among the anti-masons who think worse of Christianity than masonry; and when the foundations of society are broken up, and the devastating spirit of anti-masonry stalks abroad unchecked, who can tell but its blighting footsteps will trample in the dust the sacred altars of our religion, with the same recklessness of consequences that it has torn asunder the bonds of peace and happiness of neighbourhood and family circles.

[Oncida Observer.]

¶ It will be seen, by the following circular, which accompanies the number of Mr. Silliman's Journal, just published, that the late appeal of the editor has had the desired effect.

To the Patrons of the American Journal of Science and Arts, and to the Public.

The prompt and generous attention paid to the late appeal on behalf of this Journal, seems to render it proper that it should be publicly acknowledged and that the result (as far as it is known) should be frankly disclosed.

At the time of the appeal, (July 1,) the number of subscribers did not exceed five hundred and fifty. At the present time they are eight hundred. Of the number of two hundred and fifty that have been added, one hundred were voluntarily obtained, by the disinterested exertions of one gentleman; twenty-eight more were, in the same manner, added from another source; and many individuals in small towns, have forwarded, from one name to three, four, and even in some cases five or six. Were it proper, it would give me great pleasure to make this public acknowledgment more personal. I can not dismiss it however, without presenting my sincere thanks to the numerous editors of newspapers, and other periodical works, who, in all parts, even the remotest of the United States, have acted in the cause of the Journal of Science; in every instance, with a spirit decidedly friendly, and in many cases with both zeal and perseverance. A multitude of papers, containing evidence of these facts, have been kindly transmitted to me by their editors, and always where the desire has been indicated, the Journal has been sent, franked, in return.

While it is not proper for me to regard with personal feelings, the strong and general indication of public favour, thus lately manifested towards the cause of science and the arts, in this country, I ought not to omit this opportunity of acknowledging my great obligations to the generous minded friends, who have put forth effectual effort on this occasion.

Should the present subscription be continued, the Journal can be sustained in vigour; the authors of valuable communications will be compensated, and the external appearance and contents of the work will, I trust, always be, as I hope they are in the present number, such as good taste and the dignity of science demand.

I will venture to add, that it is still desirable that the number of subscribers should be completed to one thousand, as was proposed in the appeal; and it is still hoped it may soon be effected. As however the late successful effort has provided sufficiently for the expenses of the Journal, it does not perhaps become me to press the subject any further; but I may still be permitted to remark, that any additional patronage will go to secure the ground already won; and to provide against inevitable fluctuations.

P. S. An additional number of Vol. 1. has been just reprinted, that there may be no delay in supplying complete sets, which are not unfrequently called for: they are sold at a suitable discount from the retail price. It is intended to reprint deficient numbers whenever it becomes necessary.

Vol. 1. was published in four numbers, of which the first has gone through three editions; and the second and third, two: from present appearances the fourth must, ere long, be reprinted.

¶ Separate volumes will be supplied to complete deficient sets.

¶ The talented lady who superintends the ladies department of the Genius of Universal Emancipation, bestows the following well merited praise upon the Ladies' Magazine, conducted by Mrs. Hale, at Boston:

MRS. HALE'S MAGAZINE. The September number of this excellent periodical is now before us. It is a publication which has been so frequently spoken of with applause, that it is almost useless to add our voice to the praise so generally bestowed upon it.

It appears to be the unflinching endeavour of Mrs. Hale to elevate the intellectual and moral character—particularly of her own sex. Her writings generally, are well calculated to advance the cultivation of the female mind, and inspire a taste for literary pleasures, without encouraging women either to press forward one step beyond their own proper sphere, or to indulge in those flights of imagination and romantic feeling, which, though they may give a ten-fold brilliancy to those sunny spots which may be called the "poetry" of life, are, unless very carefully guarded, but too apt to dislodge the mind for unvarnished dreary, pages of plain prose, which occupy so large a portion of the volume of this "every day world." Her sentiments are such as may be applied to the common occurrences of life—not like those we lay aside in the closet of memory, thinking, like careless house-keepers, that "they may come in use some time or other." It is true, there are not many of those flashes of eloquence and imagination that burst with such a startling beauty upon the heart—but her pages admirably unite interest with instruction, and are excellently adapted to female readers: we are confident they can not rise unimproved, from an attentive perusal of them.

Mexico. A letter has been received, says the Cincinnati Daily Advertiser of the 3d inst., dated at Sabine, the 7th of September, announcing the total defeat of the invading force of the "beloved Ferdinand," with the loss of their baggage, cannon and money. How much of the latter article fell into the hands of the conquerors is not stated; but from the known impoverished condition of the Spanish exchequer, it is not probable that the amount could have been considerable. South American intelligence is so often incorrect and contradictory, that it is always to be received with caution, and the more so, when, as in the present case, it comes through a new and unexpected channel. From previous accounts, however, and from the small numerical force of the Spanish commander, it is not unlikely that the news may be in the main correct. It is several days later than our previous advices from that quarter, and it further adds, that of the survivors of the battle a few only escaped and proceeded to sea. The disaffected and proscribed old Spaniards, who were approaching to join the invaders, shared their fate.

THE TOKEN FOR 1830.

The TOKEN for 1830, will be published in Albany on the 20th of October, and will be produced in a style much superior to the last year. In the literary department, it will embrace greater strength of talent than the former volumes, and, as well from the names of the writers, as from the subjects introduced, will possess a higher degree of interest than heretofore.

The engravings, of which a list is subjoined, are all on steel. The subjects have been chosen with great care, and with a particular view to obtain those that are striking and generally pleasing. The artists, it will be seen, are the best in the United States. It is not too much to say that the work will contain several specimens superior to anything yet produced in this country. Several of the subjects are from original paintings, executed for the work, and are not only beautiful in themselves, but interesting as proofs of the talent of our native artists.

The printing will be executed in the same office as the last year. The paper is several shades whiter. The work will be elegantly done up in brilliant-coloured silk, manufactured in France expressly for the purpose. The whole, as well in the literary as the mechanical departments, will be executed under the superintendence of Mr. GOODRICH the former publisher.

The publishers have determined to spare no expense and no labour, and confidently believe they shall be able to produce the most elegant volume of which the state of literature and the arts in this country, at the present time, are capable. They therefore solicit the early orders of the trade, and trust that the work will fully answer any reasonable expectations which may be formed from this representation.

LIST OF ENGRAVINGS.

Vignette Title, drawn for the work by Inman, engraved by Cheney. The Doomed Bride, painted for the publishers, by Inman, engraved by Hatch. Chocorua's Curse, painted for the publishers, by Cole, engraved by Hatch. Banks of the Juniata, painted for the publishers, by Doughty, engraved by Ellis. The Greek Lovers, painted for the publishers, by Weir, engraved by Durand. Sybil, from a painting in the possession of Dr. Binney, by Guido, engraved by Cheney. Grandfather's Hobby, after C. B. King, from a painting belonging to J. Fullerton, esq. by Sully, engraved by Gallaudet. Schoolmistress, by Owen, engraved by Kelly. Lost Children, by Scheffer, engraved by Cheney. Innocence, by K. Westall, engraved by Pelton. Meditation, by —, engraved by Ellis. Portrait of J. G. C. Brainard, painted for the publishers, by Tisdale, engraved by Longacre. Genevieve, by A. M. Huffman, engraved by Andrews.

NOTE. The Doomed Bride, Sybil, Meditation, and Genevieve, are pictures of beautiful women; Chocorua's Curse is a bold and striking landscape, with figures; Banks of the Juniata is a view on that beautiful river, and is thought to be Mr. Doughty's happiest effort; the Greek Lovers is a picture of the rescue of a Greek girl from the Turks, and is charmingly engraved by Durand; Grandfather's Hobby, Lost Children, Schoolmistress, and Innocence, are interesting pictures of Children. The portrait of J. G. C. Brainard, one of our best poets, on account of his recent death, it is thought will be particularly acceptable to the public.

Among the contributors to the work will be Miss Sedgwick, J. Pierpont, Rev. T. Flint, (Author of "Francis Berrian," "Mrs. Child, (Author of "Hobomok," "N. P. Willis, John Neal, Greenville Mellen, Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood, W. B. O. Peabody, S. Gilman, (Author of "Memoirs of a New England Village Choir," and many others.

The subscriber, (having taken a part of the edition,) will supply the Booksellers in this City, Troy, Lansingburgh, Waterford, and Schenectady, on the publishers' terms.

POETRY.

From Gabrielle: a Tale of the Swiss Mountains.

GAZUL, OR THE LOVERS' QUARREL.

The morning bright bathed in rosy light
 San Lucar's ample street,
 When Gazul drest in a snow-white vest,
 Mounted his courser fleet;
 With purple and green, and in golden sheen,
 His trapping and harness shone,
 Stately and loud with champings proud,
 Caracoled his brave steed on.

At a mansion high, with a balcony,
 Where a form of beauty stood,
 Like an angel fair in the clear blue air
 On an errand of mortal good;
 Gazul checks his rein, for the pride of Spain
 Is there in her matchless grace;
 On his soul she gleams, as the sun's first beams
 O'er a soft cloud's silvery face.

He lights on the ground with a warrior's bound,
 And his knee on the earth is bent,
 But his gaze is above, at the maid of his love,
 From his heart's devotion sent:—
 "To Gelves I go the tourney's show—
 O vision of hope to me!
 And thou art the charm that shall nerve my arm
 With the power of victory."

With haughty scorn, from the warrior-born,
 Zelinda looks away,
 His love she spurns, for her bosom burns
 In a hell of jealousy—
 "Go, haste to the tilt, or the maid, if thou wilt, Whom thou lovest far more than me!"
 Not a moment is past, and the casement is fast,
 While the lover is on his knee.

He gazes around, then low to the ground
 Casts a thunder-stricken glance,
 And in wild despair on the marble there
 Shivers his useless lance;
 From the gallant fete and in downcast state,
 He back to Granada hies,
 While the sorrow and pain that madden his brain,
 Gush forth in his humid eyes.

But the fairest frame that may chill love's flame
 With the fear of a rival's art,
 Will oftimes see, that, like gaunt Envy,
 She preys on her own torn heart.
 Ere evening was near, after many a tear,
 Paid to burning love, to pride,
 Zelinda once more, from her chamber door,
 Called her page to her couch's side.

"My eyes overflow! haste, my dear page, go
 To Gazul, the Moorish knight,
 Say, Zelinda will wait at her garden gate
 At the hour of pale moonlight.
 Yet stay—oh, no!—yes, my good page, go."
 Then she called him back as fast
 As her pride prevailed, and love's impulse failed,
 But she sent him away at last.

The moon slept sweet on San Lucar's street,
 And the trembling stars were bright,
 When the lover stole to the maid of his soul
 Through the shades of that lovely night.
 To the gate he is come, where the page stands dumb,
 With the wicket in his hand,
 And he enters there to his mistress fair,
 The star of Granada's land.

Zelinda blushed, but her voice was hushed,
 At the thought of her pride and scorn,
 And the Moor looked down, for he thought a frown
 Might wither his hope new-born:
 A moment they stood, as all lovers would
 That had suffered like annoy;
 Then the knight in his arms locked his mistress' charms,
 In his bosom's speechless joy.

"By the Prophet I swear, my Zelinda fair,
 (Said the knight when he silence broke,)
 That I'd sooner die by my enemy,
 Or suffer the Christian's yoke,
 Or day by day drag my life away
 Unwarmed by thy eyes' bright beam,
 And the liets to me bring no victory,
 But by spell of thy magick name.

When I couch my lance, I see thee advance,
 And direct it on my foe;
 When faint grows my stroke, I thy name invoke,
 And it nerves my falchion's blow:
 No laurels I wear but for thee, my fair,
 No hopes in my bosom's spring—
 And I give no prayer where thou dost not share
 My whole heart's offering."

In the eloquence of her dark eyes' sense,
 On the knight the maiden gazed,
 They told her tale more than words avail
 And the flame that within her blazed:—
 "Go, Gazul, go to the tourney's show,
 Thy turban I'll dress for thee,
 Lest men should say that my fault to day
 Robbed thine arm of a victory."

On his barb he sprung, as the morning hung
 Like pearl in the eastern sky,
 And rock, tower, and tree lay tranquilly
 In their colourless, nightly dye.
 To Gelves he went to the tournament,
 With his mistress' token and prayer—
 Could he fear a blow from his boldest foe,
 When love was his armour there?

From the Token for 1830.

THE BUGLE.

O! wild, enchanting horn!
 Whose music up the deep and dewy air,
 Swells to the clouds, and calls on Echo there,
 Till a new melody is born!

Wake! wake again! the night
 Is bending from her throne of beauty down,
 With still stars burning on her azure crown,
 Intense, and eloquently bright!

Night, at its pulseless noon!
 When the far voice of waters mourns in song,
 And some tired watch-dog lazily and long,
 Barks at the melancholy moon!

Hark! how it sweeps away,
 Soaring and dying on the silent sky,
 As if some sprite of sound went wandering by,
 With lone hallo and roundelay!

Swell, swell in glory out!
 Thy tones come pouring on my leaping heart,
 And my stirred spirit hears thee with a start,
 As boyhood's old, remembered shout!

O! have ye heard that peal,
 From sleeping city's moon-bathed battlements,
 Or from the guarded field, and warrior tents,
 Like some near breath around you steal?

Or have you in the roar
 Of sea, or storm, or battle, heard it rise,
 Shriller than eagles' clamour, to the skies,
 Whose wings and tempests never soar?

Go, go—no other sound
 No music that of air or earth is born
 Can match the mighty music of that horn,
 On midnight's fathomless profound!

WOMAN.

From "A Letter about Men and Women," by James Hogg.

A gleesome elfin coy and wild,
 Neither a woman nor a child;
 But dancing on the verge between,
 With air and motion cherubim.
 Too gay to mark the mystick bound;
 Almost too light to tread the ground.
 Weak childhood's toys and trifles o'er:
 And maidenhood's glories all before.
 How tag such being, pure, refined,
 But tread upon the yielding wind!
 An eagle o'er her skoora riven;
 A cygnet on the skirts of heaven;
 A streamer in the ether blue;
 A rainbow on the morning dew;
 A thing to place on fairy throne,
 And lover's mind to dwell upon.

For me I'm beauty's slave confest;
 Without it, hopeless and unblest;
 And so are all, gainsay who can;
 For what would be the life of man,
 If left in desert or in isle,
 Unlighted up by beauty's smile?
 Even though he boasted monarch's name,
 And o'er his own sex reigned supreme,
 With thousands bending to his sway,
 If lovely woman were away—
 What were his life? what could it be?
 A vapour on a shoreless sea,
 A troubled cloud in darkness tost,
 Along the waste of waters lost;
 A ship deserted in the gale,
 Without a steersman, or a sail,
 A star, or beacon-light before,
 Or hope or haven evermore,
 A thing without a human tie—
 Unloved to live, unwept to die.

Take woman as her God hath made her,
 And not as mankind may degrade her;
 Else as well may you take the storm,
 In all its hideousness, to form
 An estimate of nature's cheer,
 And glories of the bounteous year;
 Take her in all her filial duty—
 A virgin glowing in her beauty;
 And say, if such a form was given
 For loveliness by bounteous heaven!
 The mantling blush so sweetly spread,
 Changing the pale rose to the red:
 The downy locks with roses twined,
 Or wanton waving in the wind.
 The graceful form, the gliding tread,
 Too light to bruise the daisy's head;
 And smile, that, like the morning dew,
 Sheds gladness on the gazer's view.
 O wake me from my raptured dream,
 For more than perilous is the theme!

SONG.

Written for an Indian Air.

BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

I arise from dreams of thee,
 In the first sweet sleep of night,
 When the winds are breathing low,
 And the stars are burning bright.
 I arise from dreams of thee,
 And a spirit in my feet,
 Hath led me,—who knows how!—
 To thy chamber window, Sweet.

The wandering airs they faint
 On the dark, the silent stream,
 The Champak odours fail,
 Like sweet thoughts in a dream.
 The nightingale's complaint,
 It dies upon her heart:
 As I must on thine,
 Beloved as thou art!

The gentle dews of sleep
 Are falling on thy eye;
 And I, alas! must weep,
 Thou know'st not I am nigh!
 My cheek is cold and wan,
 My heart beats loud and fast;—
 O! press it to thine own,
 Or it will break at last!

SONG.

"JOE NICHOLSON'S DAUGHTER."

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD

The daisy is fair, the day-lily rare,
 The bud o' the rose as sweet as it's bonnie—
 But there ne'er was a flower, in garden or bower.
 Like auld Joe Nicholson's bonnie Nannie.

Oh my Nannie,
 My dear little Nannie,
 My sweet little noddlety noddlety Nannie,
 There ne'er was a flower,
 In garden or bower,
 Like auld Joe Nicholson's Nannie.

Once she came out wi' a rosy blush,
 To milk her twa kye, sa' couthie and cannie—
 I cowered me down at the back o' the bush,
 To watch the air o' my bonnie Nannie.
 O my Nannie, &c.

Her looks so gay, o'er nature away,
 Frae bonny blue een sae mild and mellow—
 Saw naething so sweet in nature's array,
 Though clad in the morning's gouden yellow.
 O my Nannie, &c.

My heart lay beating the flowery green,
 In quaking, quavering agitation—
 And the tears came trickling down frae my een.
 Wi' perfect love, an' wi' admiration.
 O my Nannie, &c.

There's monnie a joy in this world below,
 And sweet the hopes that to sing were uncannie;
 But of all the pleasures I ever can know,
 There's none like the love of my dearest Nannie.
 O my Nannie,
 My dear little Nannie,
 My sweet little noddlety noddlety Nannie—
 There ne'er was a flower,
 In garden or bower,
 Like auld Joe Nicholson's Nannie.

MASONICK RECORD.

From Hunt's Western Monthly Review, for October.

REVIEW

OF "A Narrative of the Anti-Masonic Excitement, in the western part of the State of New-York, during the years 1826, '7, '8, and a part of 1829. By Henry Brown, esq. Counsellor at Law." Batavia: Adams & McCleary, 1829. pp. 214.

Nothing is more natural, than that an association for convivial, scientific, or charitable purposes, should wish to cultivate esprit du corps, solidarity, and an exclusive regard for the members. To have certain personal words, or signs, known only to the initiated, by which they may instantly communicate each other amidst the crowd of strangers, is a natural adjunct to the several intention. Emblems and badges will appear striking and agreeable, or puerile and unworthy, according to the temperance of the beholder. From their being adopted by all governments, by all churches, by all scientific institutions, and by almost every considerable association, that has ever appeared, it would seem, that to a large extent, with the general bent of human nature. The eagle, the lion, the unicorn, the British navy has its green and blue, and the masonic have their square, compass and ornamented apron. Copying, perhaps, the eagle, the lion, the unicorn, the British navy has its green and blue, and the masonic have their square, compass and ornamented apron. Copying, perhaps, the eagle, the lion, the unicorn, the British navy has its green and blue, and the masonic have their square, compass and ornamented apron. Copying, perhaps, the eagle, the lion, the unicorn, the British navy has its green and blue, and the masonic have their square, compass and ornamented apron.

But we do not believe, that any intelligent mason ever attempted to trace its origin beyond the authentic records of the order. These, we apprehend, do not extend beyond the fourth or fifth century. They have unquestionable evidence, however, that even then the institution was considered as having its beginning lost in the unrecorded ages that preceded them. From the fifth century to the present, the most wise, enlightened, and distinguished men in Europe, and in recent days in America, have extended the seal of the order with their names; and perhaps no society ever existed for such a lapse of ages with so little question of its immortality, its objects and motives. Nor is it in the darkest suspicion of the most brooding and gloomy mind, picturing human nature in the colours of its own consciousness, to believe, that hundreds of characters known to us all, crowned with the name of Washington, would have belonged to the society, and honoured its institutions, if they had not known it to be at least innocent.

We have understood, that the fundamental tenet of general and speculative masonry, as regards religion, is the broad foundation of pure and simple theism, that it might embrace the people of all religions and all countries, who acknowledge and adore one God. Christians acknowledge and adore the same; and masons, in doing so, do no more deny the truth and importance of revelation, than the former. We have understood, that the masons of christian Europe and America adopt the whole Bible as their book of worship—and we all know, with how much reverence and reverence it finds a place in their processions. Beside this, we know that they profess a peculiar and most solemn responsibility of never ceasing charity, particularly to the suffering and decayed members and relatives of their society. We know, moreover, we know that they practice a noble and godlike charity to the poor, the widow, the orphan, and the poor, which ought to endear them to all who love their kind and respect those who are engaged in the holiest of all duties, the relief of human misery.

Now this society has been fit to have festivals and anniversaries. Is it alone in this? They carry banners and emblems. Do not mechanical, philosophical, literary and other societies do the same? They meet by themselves and keep out intruders. Are they alone in this? Does not every private citizen have his circle, and is not the intrusion of unbidden and unexpectant visitors interdicted as strongly by good manners, as persons not masons are from entering lodges by the by-laws? The masons apply their charity in the first instance to their own members, and their relatives. Does not charity enjoy its first and most particular distribution to those who are of the household of faith? And is not interdicted as an oracle, when we say, that if all associations relieved the miserable of their own number—and the miserable of the human race would be secured. Provide means to impart to man this propensity to associate in smaller social circles, and to be more strongly impressed with the sympathies of that circle, for those wise purposes, that regulate the whole economy of the universe. Cosmopolites, in loving every body, care for nobody but themselves. Our first duty is to relieve our own miserable; next those of the adjoining state, and so on, the obligation weakening as the circle broadens. We are bound by a much stronger obligation to comfort our own heathen, than those of the Gentiles. Hence, then, the masons in beginning, not terminating their charity with their own, have acted in conformity with the order of providence, christianity, and sound discretion.

Masons have their secrets, and so has every well ordered family; and it is as impertinent for the uninitiated, to wish to pry into those of the former, as it is for gossips to interfere with the privacy of the latter. No man has any more right to disturb the privacy in which an association of men of fair and unquestioned character choose to meet, than our chemists and other manufacturers have to inscribe on their entering gate "no admittance." The word secret is a terrible word, but only to children, grown-ups and bigots of an unquiet conscience, who think all human nature as dark as their own bosoms. Who would believe, that a society which has existed from the earliest periods of English history, which has registered in its archives the brightest and most glorious names, which has left innumerable records of the noblest charities, and upon which, as a body, harm has not yet been proved, would have been exposed in these days to the same sort of spirit which heated the tongue of St Dominic, invented thumb screws, and burned witches, merely because they choose to walk in procession, now and then, to wear fine aprons, with a compass and square and other devices painted or embroidered on them, and to meet by themselves without the admission of uninitiated intruders?

It is not at all strange, that there should be fools, knaves and bigots in the world; for they have always existed, and in numbers too great for the peace and order of society. Nor is it strange, that in the time of St. Dominic and John Calvin, and King James and Queen Mary, it should have been held sound doctrine and true orthodoxy, that to place the outer man on a slow fire would strongly tend to enlighten his mind into the truth of a doctrine he abhorred. It is not strange that pagans should have persecuted catholics, and catholics protestants, and protestant episcopals protestant puritans, and protestant puritans protestant quakers. Persecution was the spirit of the age. The wonderful William Penn was almost alone in his age, in his compact and sublime phrase of expressing the grand principle of toleration, in the laws of Pennsylvania. Persecution was deemed a proper resort for the inculcation of a doctrine; and it is not at all strange, that the great mass of the people should be led away by the prevalent opinion of the times. There was nothing strange in the gloomy and terrible delusion of witchcraft, under which so many innocent victims suffered. It was not the delusion of the ill-fated town of Salem alone, where the opprobrium of public sentiment has generally cast it. But it was the folly of the age. People believed in hosts, goblins, and haunted houses, in signs, omens and death watches; and particularly, that Satan was a wonderfully active personage, entering into old women, squaws, and negroes of preference, and to believe in witchcraft was only to adopt a prevalent spirit of the times. But it is strange, and passing strange in this age, that any order of things, or any class of men, could have got up a proscription against the fraternity of masons, merely because there is much reason to believe that a small number of foolish and misguided men, under wild and mistaken notions of masonic responsibility, carried off a certain Mr. Morgan, leaving the natural inference from his disappearance, that he had been murdered. It is, for aught we know, the first outrage of the kind, with which public opinion has charged masonry; and there is reason to believe it will be the last. The most obtuse and stupid among the fraternity have read a lesson upon the subject, which we should hope would not require to be repeated. From the excitement which has been created upon the subject, and the manner in which this excitement has been directed, one most useful lesson has been taught. It is, that man is just as much disposed to persecute now as he was in the times of Nero, St. Dominic, or Mary of England. Our security against its outrages is our laws, our admirable laws, the increasing enlightenment of the public mind, the growing conviction that, to roast a man, to torture him, to calumniate or vilify him, to take from him his standing or his income, will not at all alter his opinions for the better, if they are wrong, but from the natural stubbornness of the human character, fitting it to resist oppression, tend to fix him more unyielding in those opinions.

We see clearly, that even yet it is not supererogation to speak, and to write, and to legislate against the blind, reckless and desolating spirit of bigotry and persecution. When we see, what a pestilential fever of anti-masonic excitement has been got up in this country, how it has been got up—against what objects it has been directed, what other views have been incorporated with it, how ancient and knowing ladies and men gossips, and fierce priests, and sly and wicked politicians have operated upon the mobility of the ten thousand, let us not congratulate ourselves that the Popish plots, Cock-lane ghosts, witches, haunted houses and possession of Satan have wholly gone by. Let him who stands firm and fearless in the confidence of his innocence, and wonderful illumination of these days, take heed that he do not fall under some combination, to prove him a witch, a conjuror, or a heretic. Notwithstanding our confidence in the future, there are sufficient numbers of rogues to rake the hue and cry, and sufficient numbers of dupes not a whit more enlightened than they of the day when Salem witches were hung. No event in our times has more clearly proved all this, than that one, the force of which has filled our land, and been blown by the trumpet of a hundred thousand pamphlets, to say nothing of the newspaper flourishes and the reports of trials. These are the engines, however, a certain portion of the community may despise them, that move the physical power of the country. These are the thermometers that indicate the existing moral and political temperature of our times.

The book before us seems to us a fair and dispassionate and well authenticated history of the Morgan affair up to the present time. A very brief and succinct chronicle of the more prominent features of this business, and the anti-masonic excitement, is all that we deem of sufficient general interest to abstract from the book for our readers.

The credit of the original of this history is clearly ascribable to a certain Colonel Miller—an "able editor" of the "People's Press," a man of whom our author says little good, describing him as possessed indeed of respectable talents, but with a great deal of cunning, familiar with the arts of designing men, freed from all religious scruples, and of course ready to lend soil to a breeze from any point of the compass. Embarrassed in his circumstances, inactive to business, intemperate in his habits, he saw by intuition the use that might be made of Morgan and anti-masonic excitement.

William Morgan was born in Culpeper county, Virginia, fifty-four years since; and in 1819, he married Lucy Pendleton, of Richmond, Virginia. Of the fifty accounts of his previous life no one has any claims to authenticity. In 1821, he removed with his wife to York, Upper Canada, where he commenced business, as a brewer. His brewery was destroyed by fire; and reduced to poverty, he moved to Rochester, in New-York, and thence to Batavia, where he remained until his abduction in 1826. He had a common English education, and was pleasant in his manners, except when intemperate, which he was to a great degree, conducting towards his family and others, in those seasons, like other men of similar habits.

Miller and he were both masons. Morgan is supposed to have received his first dislike to masonry from his name having been omitted as a member of a chapter of masons chartered somewhere about 1825, in consequence of his intemperate and unworthy habits. Being of dissolute morals, his principles hanging loosely about him, and stimulated by vile companions, he proposed to disclose the secrets of masonry, in hopes, no doubt, to make an immense fortune out of the gaping and but curiosity of the vulgar. He was such an instrument, and this enterprise was such a material as precisely suited Miller's purposes.

The great body of respectable masons treated the matter, as was wise, with silence and contempt, wishing it left to its natural progress and issue. Not so with a few indiscreet and officious members. The assertion that the late De Witt Clinton, as the head of the grand lodge in New-York, issued a masonic edict for suppressing the book, that was announced, even at the expense of life, is too monstrous even to gain credit for a moment, and could not be possible, or the grand lodge was not in session from the announcement of Morgan's intended disclosure to the time of his abduction. The author gives a sensible and well written article, which he published at the time of the communication. The purpose of which was to incite upon masons to let the book take its course. Had the advice been followed, the whole thing would long ago have sunk into oblivion, and Morgan would have lived and died in quiet and obscurity.

Morgan's intended work, it seems, was in progress of publication in Miller's printing office. A few inconsiderate and officious members of the masonic body concerted, in an evil hour, a plan for the suppression of a work, which it left to itself, would undoubtedly have fallen dead-born from the press. Forty or fifty persons assembled at Batavia, and attempted to destroy the office where the manuscript, or the nearly published work was supposed to be. This project failing, some other measures attempted to burn the office. A number of masons joined in a printed notice, offering a reward of a hundred dollars for the apprehension of the incendiaries.

In 1826 Morgan was arrested for petit larceny. The ground of the charge was, that he had borrowed of one Kingsley, a tavern keeper at Canandaigua, a shirt and cravat, which he had not seen fit to return. He was tried and acquitted. But immediately upon his discharge, was arrested for a small debt due another taverner, and committed to prison. About this time a certain Giddins, infamous for his conduct, as concerned in Morgan's abduction, began to figure as a witness in the case, whose evidence was rejected in the court on the ground of his being in a new of atheist. He seems to have been desirous to become, what is known in common parlance by the name state's evidence, and to attach to his confederates a most atrocious guilt, in which, by his own confession, he had the chief share.

The next morning after Morgan's imprisonment at Canandaigua, a certain Lawson paid the small debt, for which he was imprisoned and was discharged. Immediately upon his discharge he was seized, forcibly thrust into a carriage, and driven to Fort Niagara. Notwithstanding Giddins' testimony; notwithstanding the various printed and oral declarations, that he has been living, and been found dead, all authentic ground on which to trace his fate any further, entirely fails. It is probable in a high degree, that he was taken across the Niagara into Upper Canada. He has never returned, and this seems to offer a degree of probability that he was in some way despatched, though there are not wanting thousands of instances of persons in his situation, and of his standing, who have wished to have wished to have the impression of their death that they might emigrate, and transmute, and come out unknown, and unquestioned, under another name, and to enact another part in life.

We pass over the history of numerous arrests and trials, as episodes, or minor movements attached to the main one.

The mystery attending Morgan's departure—the circumstance of his not having been heard from—the meeting on the night of the 8th Sept—the attempt to burn Miller's office—and the subsequent arrest of Miller on the 12th, excited in the public mind so many suspicions, that a few individuals residing in Batavia, very justly and properly deemed an investigation necessary.

With a view to ascertain the circumstances in relation to Morgan's being taken from jail in Canandaigua, rumours of which had as yet only reached them, an agent was sent thither on the 2nd of September, 1826. A number of affidavits were procured on the following day, which established beyond doubt the important fact, that Morgan was arrested in violation of law, after his discharge from prison the 12th of September, and, notwithstanding his deposition, conveyed from Batavia, in a carriage, prepared for that purpose, by force, they knew not whether.

Publicity given to the information thus acquired, served to increase still more the intensity of those suspicions. The thunder of popular indignation began to roll. It was however at first in low and remote murmurs. It emitted as yet no sparks, because no objects had yet been found on which its bolts could descend. The inquiry "what is Morgan," had appropriately been made, and no answer been given. The citizens of the county of Genesee were therefore invited to meet in mass, at the Court House in Batavia, on the 5th of October, for the purpose of making some arrangements in order to ascertain his fate.

The meeting was numerous and respectfully attended. It was a solemn and impressive scene. A citizen of this free land, entitled to the protection of its laws had been taken by violence and confined without authority, in some solitary place, or conveyed by force without the United States, to parts unknown, or had taken beneath some murderer's arm, and no information relative to his destiny or fate, had yet been received. The circumstance that he was poor—that he was dissolute—that he was in some respects unprincipled, and there ore held in but little estimation by community, gave to the meeting, in the eye of the philanthropist, additional interest.

Had he been a man of rank, of consideration, or of fortune, the people at large would never have been left to make the above inquiry. He would have been followed—he would have been rescued, and if necessary, an army would have been raised at his call, and awarded his commands. The wrongs of an individual once rocked the battlements of Troy, and made the throne or Priam tremble to its base. But the unfortunate and degraded Morgan was suffered to be carried off under circumstances calculated to excite the strongest suspicions, without scarce an inquiry.

I cannot in justice to historic truth forbear to remark that a number of the most conspicuous anti-masons in the country; men who became so long after Morgan's abduction, and who have since participated in the rewards and honours of a triumphant party, designedly abstained from attending that meeting. Nor can I in justice to my own feelings, offer this occasion to pass without applauding, in the highest terms, the candour, the good sense, and above all, the holy fervour which appeared to fill, inspire, and expand the bosoms of the great mass of which it was composed. A writer of eminence, I believe Mr. Burke, observes, that the public opinion is often wrong, but the public feeling never. An outrage all thought had unquestionably been committed; but its extent and authors were unknown. An inquiry was demanded—the public indignation was roused, and the detection and punishment of guilt seemed to be its only object. A numerous and respectable committee, consisting of Theodore F. Taib 4, David E. Evans, Trumbull Cary, William Davis, Jonathan Lay, Timothy Fitch, Lyman D. Plindle, E. Southworth and James P. Smith were unanimously appointed for that purpose, and the meeting adjourned.

"Similar ones were afterwards held in other counties, and committees appointed, a part of whom subsequently composed the celebrated Lewiston Convention.

"The committee above named immediately caused a notice to be published, containing a brief statement of the facts and circumstances in the case, so far as ascertained, and desired all who possessed any knowledge or information whatever in relation to either, to communicate the same without delay to some one of their members. A request was also sent to his Excellency Governor Clinton, desiring his aid—it was promptly afforded, and a proclamation was immediately issued."

Various proclamations were issued by the governor, requiring that aid, and offering pardon to accomplices, that should give evidence in the case. The Grand Royal Arch Chapter, in which one hundred and ten chapters were included, disclaimed all knowledge and approval of the affair, in which they were followed by most of the lodges in the state.

Meanwhile "Morgan's Illustrations of Masonry" fell, like rain drops, from the press, costing, probably ten cents, and which the greedy public appetite swallowed to a surfeit for some time at the price of a dollar. Our own community is unappetizing, that has an appetite, that might be medicinally called hymus, for such food. The bible, tracts, and Webster's spelling book, hardly furnished equal consolation for the press. With what views it was published, let the following extracts determine.

"We, each of us, do hereby most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear upon the holy evangelists of Almighty God, that we never will divulge during our natural lives, communicate, or make known to any person or persons in the known world, our knowledge or any part thereof, respecting William Morgan's intention (communicated to us) to publish a book on the subject of freemasonry, neither by writing, marking, or insinuations, or any way devisable by man, sworn and subscribed this 13th day of March, 1836. Signed 'John Davids,' and others.

"On the 5th day of August following, John Davids and David C. Miller, of Batavia, and Russel Dyer, of Rochester, executed to said Morgan, a bond in the penal sum of five hundred thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of one fourth part of the sum which should be received on the sale of a certain book upon freemasonry, which the said John Davids, David C. Miller, and Russel Dyer were about to publish.

"On the 7th day of August, and two days only after said bond purports to bear date, Captain Morgan, in consequence of a difficulty between him and his friends, addressed to them the following note:

"August 7, 1836.
"Gentlemen—My note of this morning has not been answered. Further evasion and equivocation I will not submit to. Acknowledge you are not gentlemen, or I will expose you in twelve hours, unless you do as you agreed to do. I am not a child—if you suppose I am, you are mistaken. I am a man, and will not suffer myself to be imposed on—you have not acted as gentlemen—I am sorry to be compelled to say it—every part of your conduct has been most shameful, and why so? My first impressions were, that you are not honest men; therefore I wish to settle and have no more to do with you. If either of you feel hurt, call on me as gentlemen, and I will give you any satisfaction you wish."
"WILLIAM MORGAN."

"The securing of a copy right to prevent others from publishing the book—its sale at first for one dollar—the oath of Davids and others—the bond executed by Miller, Davids, and Dyer, furnish at least presumptive evidence, that avarice, and not a love of country, or a regard for its future prosperity and welfare, was the principal stimulus to their undertaking."

Never did madam Rumour a more admirable subject upon which to operate. War was issued and trials instituted without number, and each succeeding day brought to light a new brood of stories of violence, blood and murder. While a famous trial upon the subject, in which a hundred witnesses were present, was in progress, a rumour was set afloat that Morgan's body had been found, and would be present at the place of trial. This tended not at all to allay the excitement. The persons proved to have been concerned in the abduction of Morgan as far as Niagara, were sentenced to different periods of imprisonment, the longest extending to three years. A petition to the legislature of the state, to obtain an additional reward of 3000 dollars to what had been already offered, was rejected by the good sense of the legislature, who saw that it would only be adding fuel to the flame.

By this time the excitement had arrived at the pitch of causing anti-masonic associations. Town meetings were called, with the avowed purpose of organizing voluntary associations to detect and punish the perpetrators of the abduction, and supposed murder of Morgan, and to make up a purse for the support of the widow and orphans. The most malignant and impolitic falsehoods and slanders, which at another time would have returned with a vengeance, to plague the inventors, in the present state of public feeling were received with implicit faith. Demagogues now saw that the affair was ripe for their use, and they accordingly took it in keeping. Bigots in their church, made use of it with the same views, operating in a different direction. Such was the state of excitement, that strangers, travelling through that part of the country, dared not avow, that they were masons.

The Lewiston committee had hired a vessel, and chartered boats, and constructed instruments for taking the bed of the Niagara, and a part of lake Ontario. The business was pursued with great industry for some months to no effect. Efforts to find the body were abandoned, but the public feeling and expectation were in no degree quieted. We remarked, that a body was found, October seventh, on the shore of lake Ontario, which appeared to have been left there by the surf. Being highly put off, after the usual inquest, it was buried. It soon spread through the community, that it was Morgan's body. Some gentlemen from Batavia and Rochester repaired to the place of interment. The body was disinterred. Mrs. Morgan was conveyed to the spot. It may easily be imagined in what state the body was. All identity of colour and countenance was gone. The hair, height, teeth, dress, &c. of course, remained unaltered. In neither of these circumstances was there a trait of resemblance to Morgan. The dress was not that which he wore when he disappeared. There were religious tracts in the pockets, and Morgan was not of the men who carried tracts. But a jury of inquest was summoned. Witnesses were examined. The first witness swore that Morgan had double teeth, dentes molares, all round, and that the body had the same; and he described many other circumstances of identity between this body and Morgan's. Most of the witnesses, and thirteen were examined, swore to the same general effect. What is most astonishing, Mrs. Morgan, whose testimony bears on the face of it marks of honest conviction, agreed with them in many particulars, especially in regard to the double teeth all round, and to the circumstance that two of his teeth were wanting, and one split, to which circumstances the witnesses generally testified, this body answered. This jury, composed of twenty three persons, subscribed their names to the verdict of inquest, which was, that this was the body of Morgan, and that he came to his death by drowning. All doubt was removed from the public mind. The multitude flocked to the funeral procession. The body was removed to Batavia. A funeral discourse was delivered by one James Cochrane, who, it seems sometimes drew inspiration from distilled spirits, but is said to have been sober on this occasion. The body was once more interred, as that of Morgan. The cry of vengeance against masons was now on the breeze, and the ghost of Morgan was said to walk.

But the tell-tale papers spread the story, until it reached the ears of the real widow of the drowned person. A Mr. Munro, of Upper Canada, left his home for Newark, and was drowned in the Niagara. A description of the clothes found on the body of the supposed Morgan induced Mrs. Munro to believe it was the body of her drowned husband. In company of relatives she repaired to Batavia. This ill-fated body which could not rest in earth, was once more disinterred. It would be useless to detail the evidence of the new inquest. No seeming, when properly sifted, can show the aspect of truth. The real truth of the case, that this was the identical Timothy Munro's body, and not Morgan's, was established by that kind of evidence that cannot fail to establish undoubting conviction in every rational mind. It is an astonishing proof, these inquisitions, how much testimony is affected by strong prejudices, public excitement and popular feeling. A great number of particulars, specified on oath by the first jury, proved to be not as specified, by this second examination. Particularly it was proved that Morgan was wholly bald on the forehead, and never wore whiskers. This body had a considerable tuft of hair there, and had whiskers. The circumstance of the double teeth all round was utterly disproved. This body had teeth of the usual character, and instead of having lost two, and a fragment of another, had actually lost five. What put the matter out of all question was, that Mrs. Munro specified before seeing them, certain articles of dress, which she had made with her own hands, and which were found to be, as she described them, to be, before seeing them. All doubt was dispelled from all minds, except such as were determined not to be convinced. It is reported that people, who had obtained all the political objects desired from the impression, that the body was Morgan's, observed, "that he was a good enough Morgan, until after the election."

The affair of Morgan was pregnant with wonders from the beginning. During the delusion of witch time, there were not wanting persons, who, carried away by the prevalent insanity, became convinced, that they were witches and wizards, and made confession, as such. A certain R. H. Hall came forward in the papers, and with most imposing solemnity confessed himself guilty of having murdered Morgan. The poor man supplicated mercy of God and man, as one sure of the gallows but the Morgan matter had been proved to be a two edged instrument, which men began to be cautious of handling. Mr. Hall attracted notoriety, which perhaps, was his wretched motive, and was imprisoned, but could not gain a martyr's fame by being hung. The jury incontinently dismissed him, as being either maudlin or moon struck in the upper story.

In the midst of these popular commotions of sentiment, Mr. Clinton was called suddenly to his account. Mr. Pitcher, Vice Governor, recommended to the legislature the appointment of a person, for the especial purpose of investigating the Morgan business, and Daniel Mosely, esq. was appointed. An attempt to procure a similar enactment in congress wholly failed.

Another strange circumstance attending these transactions remains to be recorded. Col. King, a man highly respected in his neighbourhood, about the time of Morgan's abduction, removed from the vicinity of Batavia, and with the appointment of sutler to Cantonment 'Towson, repaired to that remote establishment on the Klamia, a high branch of Red-River. Among other rumours, it was reported, that he had been concerned in the murder of Morgan, and had fled to this distant region a fugitive from justice. Remote as he was, the rumour reached him. He immediately made arrangements to return, and show himself in the midst of his accusers. Meantime, three officers, appointed by the authorities of New-York, had repaired all the way to Klamia to arrest him. Arrived at the Cantonment, they required the aid of Captain Hyde, the commander, a gentleman whom we formerly had the honour to know, in order to arrest Colonel King. He refused the required aid, though otherwise offering them permission to examine his store. At that place they were informed that he had started for New-York. They made the best of their way in the same direction, and the parties accomplished this wild goose chase of almost 4000 miles, in nearly the same time. It is easy to conjecture the feelings of the slanderers of Colonel King, at finding him, fearless and erect, in the midst of them. Captain Hyde was ordered to New-York on arrest for refusing his aid for the apprehension of Colonel King. We pass over all the subsequent trials of Bruce; and trials of various persons for libel and slander, who have grown out of this business. We have intended only to touch upon a few of the prominent facts, in this interminable history of plot and counter-plot. We should as soon have thought of making up a volume of cases and reports, as going into all the legal details of this strange business.

A general crusade had commenced against masonry, of which the following, extracted from Mr. S. Southwick's paper, the oracle of the anti masons, may be considered the watchword.

"Anti masonry sprung from the throne of God, and under his Almighty wings, it will conquer 'Hell's master-piece,' and redeem our country from vile slavery and galling chains—from eternal disgrace, from everlasting ruin and degradation. The man who hesitates to support such a cause, stabs his country and dishonours his Creator. Let no such man be trusted—let him live neglected and die unpitied and despised, and let no monument tell his name or point to the spot where his recalcitrant ashes pollute the soil that gave him birth."

It spread more or less extensively, into all the states. It denounced first the system, and then the men, as unfit for any office, and unworthy of any countenance. It not only denounced the men, but denounced those who would not denounce them. For some of the old charges of Abbe Barruel and Robinson were resuscitated and brought forward. Others were told that every thing secret was wrong. Others were taught that the principles inculcated were those of deism. Still, for others, it was denounced as deeply in tendency, abominating men from obedience to the laws, and inculcating instead a blind and implicit deference to the decrees of the lodge. The mischievous and stupid abduction of Morgan was the foundation and top-stone of the theme, and a legitimate proof of its tendency. Anti-masonic committees were organized, one of whose specific and avowed functions was, to oppose all candidates that were not anti-masons. We omit, for obvious reasons, one very striking example of the political use made of masonry and the anti-masonic excitement, about which much was said in the papers at the time. The chief magistrate of the United States ought never to condescend to reply in the shibboleth of any party to the impertinent queries of any one; and Mr. Adams' charge to his New-York correspondent, not to make his letter public, would seem to imply, that he had not studied the case of him, who, when charged to tell no man, straightway went his way, and the more vehemently proclaimed what was done, through all the country.

It soon became an instrument in the hand of some of the spiritual guides; and ministers were denounced to their people, and members of churches to spiritual censure, for being masons. Anti masonic meetings and societies have had their orators; and in Cambridge, Massachusetts, no less a man than Dr. Waterhouse has been selected for orator.

In some instances, when the pursuit has been too long, it has been a revulsion, and a reaction, and we trust, that the excitement, having lost the original pungency and zest of its influence, will soon pall upon the public ear, and it is much vexed and discussed in relation to its original standing in the public estimation.

We should not have trespassed so long upon the patience of our readers, in repeating the thread of this narrative to such a length, had we not deemed that the history is fraught with instruction upon a point most vital to the stability of those institutions which are the pride and glory of us all. We proudly talk of our illumination and a march of mind. We speak of the disgraceful illusion, recorded in history, of which some account is given in the book before us, as this has been long to a former age, and could never be re-enacted in ours. There is a proof, and a palpable one, that the public mind, when a man pretence has first been offered, can be played upon as a decaying, and that men are in fact as gullible now as they were in the times of the near-hub plot, or witch time. This ought to inspire present vigilance and caution. Another inference, as ministers say in a sermon, is, that of all the arts of demagogues, the most disgusting, and that which ought readily to come to the mind, is that of playing upon the vulgar feelings and credulity of the people, in turning these popular delusions to the purposes of their own personal and political advancement. A candidate for any office of honour and emolument, depending on the popular suffrage, may, perhaps, be allowed to caress the children of their countenances, and pronounce them the most beautiful little creatures that were ever seen. He may insinuate, that the mother is pretty, knowing and good. He may talk with the good man about crops, pigs, and the price of pork and flour, with much knowledge of the subject, as he may possess it. He may hint, so that it is done dextrously, that his competitor is a noodle, a rogue and a defaulter. He may practice all the little arts of what we here call feeding the subject of the gull-trap with soft corn. All these are fair and hackneyed arts consecrated from all guilt by use, time, or of mind. Whiskey and loans are more questionable expedients. Ogling, and walking arm in arm, and taking the voter aside from the crowd for private confab, approach the confines of intrigue; and the promise of an office, conditioned upon success, is clearly "bargain and corruption." The worst country fashion of treating the voters from a wash tub of whiskey toddy, in which the brown sugar is stirred in by the candidate, who takes off his stockings and shoes, and gets into the tub, and operates, as the feet of the voters do in France, when they mash the grapes, and who hands off the political beverage to the voter in his shoe, may be tolerated, from its show of originality and of the "free and easy." It is a usage, not wholly disallowed, for the candidate to ride a race on a Kentucky "chuck," for the amusement of the spectators, or run a foot race with the best man, otherwise the best boxer in the company. A stump is the time-honoured pulp of all political aspirants in the west. Hence, and riding the canvassing circuit, and changing opinions, moral, political and religious, a hundred times in a day, to accommodate the party to his company, and seven hundred other choice arts, known to the sport, afford a very pretty and copious choice, in the selection and the right application of which, the aspirant shows his tact and his skill, and his cleverness; and they are all white washed by common tolerance into innocence. But there are others that are clearly questionable; and we have seen them in some instances too gross to be swallowed even by voters of the most enlarged disposition. For instance, we saw a candidate, known to be a derider of religion, sitting at a camp preaching among the ministers, and ever and anon uttering a dismal groan, as if seized with a colic pang, and a face of the most elongated and rueful sanctity. Candidates, however ungodly at other times, are sure to have religious concern come over them about the time of a camp-meeting.

We feel reluctant to enlarge upon a theme so hateful, and the revolting details of which are so well known to us all. There is no point of information that has made so little progress among the people at large as information, what department in aspirants for their favour, is becoming and respectable. One would think that the head must indeed be of wood that could not instantly penetrate the palpable contempt for the people, that is thinly veiled in all these miserable and unworthy expedients. Never does a candidate so loudly manifest his conviction, that the people are asses, as when, though at other times an abject beggar at a camp-meeting; and at other times, select and aristocratic, in his habits, when he all at once becomes the man of the people, at the eve of an election. "To seize the popular delusion of a near-hub plot, witchcraft, or anti-masonry, to work into the designs of ambition, ought to be stigmatized in terms of the most pointed indignation."

The time will come, and the time must come, or our institutions will not remotely descend to posterity, when enough of the controlling minds of the community shall possess just estimates of true dignity and worth and uprightness, and tact to discriminate, what is respectful deportment in candidates, to blast with the scorching lightning stroke of virtuous indignation, all these vile arts, similar to those with which rakes woo prostitutes, all these arts which declare that they who use them despise the people, and consider them of no other use than to be gilded to give their votes, and like docile elephants, to be coaxed on to their knees that these aspirants may erect their castles on their back, and ride them to their purposes. No man was ever worthy of the suffrages of the people, who would take these methods to gain them. No man, who had any right notions of dignity and self respect, would stoop to these measures for any boon which ambition could covet, or the people bestow. Nothing ought so directly to excite the suspicions of the people, as to discern these insidious efforts to fawn upon them.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

NORTH CAROLINA BLACK LEAD.

Plumbago or Black Lead. In Professor Olmstead's Geological Report he states, that he has never read of any Mine of Plumbago which can compare an extent with that discovered in this county. It is not only of great extent, but the ore itself is of a superior quality. It is however, comparatively, but of small value, owing to the limited use that is made of it. We trust, however, that, sooner or later, it may be found advantageous to manufacture this article among ourselves. Every fresh instance therefore of the uses to which it may be applied, should be made known for the benefit of the publick. It is stated in a London paper, that the application of it to the works of clocks and watches, is likely to supercede oil. The plumbago is prepared by repeatedly grinding and washing it over, by which means the gritty particles that occur, even in the black lead, are removed, and which, if allowed to remain, would neutralize every advantage the pure plumbago is found to give. This done, the prepared substance is applied with a camel-hair pencil, either in a state of powder or mixed up with a drop or two of pure spirit of wine. It readily adheres to the surface of a steel pivot, as well as to the inside of the hole in which it runs, so that the rubbing surfaces are no longer one metal upon another, but Plumbago upon Plumbago. These surfaces, by their mutual action speedily acquire a polish only inferior to that of the diamond, and then the retardation of the machine from friction is reduced almost to nothing, and wear and tear from this cause is totally prevented. An astronomical clock, made by Mr. Herbert, of which the pivots and holes, and teeth of the escape-wheel, had been covered on their rubbing parts with fine plumbago fourteen years before, was not long ago taken to pieces by a Committee of the Society of Arts and examined; the surfaces of plumbago were found to be for the most part unbroken and highly polished, and neither the pivots nor the sockets appeared upon examination with high magnifies, to have undergone the slightest degree of wear.

A gentleman who lives in the lower part of this State informed us, a few days since, that he had used plumbago altogether, on the axles of his carriage, for several years. It is said, that if the axles and bushes of the wheel be true, a carriage may safely be run one hundred and fifty miles with once using a composition of black lead mixed with lard or tallow. The same gentleman says, it is used in nearly all the mills and machines in the lower country, where there is much friction. It may also be used, advantageously, for painting the roofs of houses, by mixing it with rosin and oil, and then applying it. Three coats of it, thus prepared, will render wood almost fire proof.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the Washington City Chronicle.

CONSTANTINOPLE AND THE TURKS.

Messrs. Editors: There exists a strong probability that by our next authentic advices from Europe we may learn that Constantinople has changed masters. Meanwhile, it may entertain some of your readers, and inform others, if we place in your valuable journal some account of that great city, and of the Turks; notices of which have been heretofore or more recently published. We extract these chiefly from the valuable travels of Dr. Walsh, late Chaplain to the British embassy in Turkey. We propose in this sketch to make free with the work of Walsh, rather by condensed fragments than full citation; and shall conclude by inserting a few general reflections made by other travellers upon the spirit of the laws and manners of the modern Turks, and their chief rulers. Having heretofore personally examined Constantinople and its environs, we can with confidence recommend the work of the Rev. R. Walsh, as exhibiting an accurate delineation of both. He thus speaks of the aspect of the country adjoining the Turkish capital. "The first and most striking impression was the deep solitude that reigned every where around. We were within a few hundred yards of the walls of an immense metropolis, where seven hundred thousand people lived together; but if we were the same distance from the ruins of Palmyra, we could not have witnessed deeper silence or completer desolation. The villas which are usually scattered over the suburbs of a large city were not to be seen, and the crowds which commonly throng the entrance, no where to be met with. And what can more forcibly mark the inactivity and indolence of the Turkish character? But the shores of the Bosphorus are very populous, and from Constantinople to near the Black Sea is one continued village. The intercourse is proportionably great, and the surface of the water is a moving picture of boats passing and repassing. This mode of motion is peculiarly adapted to oriental indolence. The Turk reclines on his cushion, smoking his pipe, and is carried the distance he wants to go without exertion or discomposure. If he had a residence in this quarter, he could only walk or ride to it, as there are, generally speaking, no carriages, or proper roads on which they could run. The vicinity of the city, therefore, on this side, is abandoned, and, with the exception of a very few scattering farms, it is a perfect desert. As to the city itself, since the destruction of the Janisaries, a death-like tranquillity has reigned at Constantinople, which no cause of excitement can disturb. Had the public mind been in that sensitive state when the first news of the battle of Navarino arrived which displayed itself at the breaking out of the Greek revolt, it is highly probable that the whole of the French population would have fallen victims to the popular phrenzy, which no authority could control. But their spirits were subdued and their courage broken down.

The present sultan, who has effected the perilous undertaking of the destruction of the Janisaries, in which so many of his predecessors failed, is a man not in the prime, though still in the vigour of life. He succeeded his brother Mustapha, in the year 1808, and so has been on the throne twenty-one years. He is now, I believe the sole survivor of thirty children, fifteen boys and fifteen girls, which his father left, and is the last of the male race of Mahomet of an age fit to reign; and it is to this circumstance (they say) that he is indebted for his inviolability. Had there been another of the sacred race old enough to substitute in his place, the Janisaries would long since have deposed him. He had two sons, one about the age of ten, to whom their eyes were turned as his successor, when he should arrive at competent years; and the sultan knew by experience that it was as easy for them to do this, as to say it; for both of his predecessors had been strangled, one of whom was his own brother. His son prematurely died; and it was reported that he had been made way with by his own father, lest he should be set up in his place. It is known however, that the boy died of the small pox, and that his father has given an extraordinary example to his subjects, by having his surviving children vaccinated: and so has shown, in one instance at least, a disposition to adopt European improvements in things not merely military. He is, moreover, a man well versed in oriental literature, writes and understands Arabick well, and his hastasheriffs, which he always dictates, and sometimes writes with his own hand, are admired for their style and composition. He is not a man of morose and cruel disposition in his own family; on the contrary, he is affectionately attached to his several daughters, by different mothers; and is, in private intercourse, urbane and affable. But his public conduct has been marked by extraordinary fierceness and unrelenting rigour, not only to Rajas but to Turks themselves, and in this he has exhibited an impartial disregard to human life, and not a very strict regard to human obligations. It is true that during the phrenzied excitement of the populace in Constantinople, which was occasioned by the Greek insurrection, that the Greek patriarch was hung at the church door, and all Greeks that the mob met with in the streets were shot without mercy; yet at the same time the Franks walked the streets unmolested, although every Turk was armed with a yatagan and a case of loaded pistols, which he was ready to use on the slightest provocation. On more recent occasions, nevertheless, where sufficient cause for irritation existed, it is but justice to the present sultan to say, that his moderation and good faith have been exemplary.

The name of Constantine occurs more frequently than that of any other in the history of the lower empire; it was borne by fourteen emperors; but they were all marked by imbecility, except the first and the last—he who founded the empire, and he in whom it terminated. The details given of this termination, and the character and conduct of him who endeavoured to avert or delay it, are truly interesting; and his devotion of himself to the cause of his Christian country, when it could no longer be preserved, and seeking death in the midst of his enemies, are worthy of the best ages of Greece or Rome. The breaches which remain in the wall for a considerable extent, near the Top Kapousi Gate, and which the Turks have never since repaired, attest the vigorous resistance made, and the utter hopelessness of any further effort to stop the torrent of barbarians that poured in through them. The body of Constantine was found in one of them, where he had placed himself as the last but ineffectual barrier; and a magnificent tree is now growing out of it, to mark, as Clark says, "the sacred spot where the last of the Palæogi fell."

As this is the side on which the Russians threaten to approach Constantinople, it is highly probable that this is the gate by which they will enter; and the very same passage that admitted the Crescent will again admit the Cross. It is very well known that this is an event which the Turks are expecting, and their anticipations of it are not confined to military preparations. Their great burying ground lies on the Asiatic shore, and is to be seen extending its dark cypress grove for a considerable distance in the vicinity of Scutari. This is, perhaps, the largest cemetery in the world, being full three miles in length; and it has increased to its present size in consequence of the extraordinary predilection the Turks of Constantinople entertain for it. They are persuaded that they shall again be compelled to retire to Asia whence they came; and they wish their bodies to be laid in a place where Christian infidels cannot disturb them. The great majority, therefore, of those who die in Constantinople are transported by their friends across the Bosphorus; and the stairs or slip at which they embark is called, for this reason, Melteiskelli, or the ladder of the dead. This impression on their minds is confirmed by ancient prophecies, which are current among them, and by other causes, equally slight, which, nevertheless, have a powerful influence on the weak and superstitious fancy of a Turk. Among them is a coincidence of names which is rather curious. Constantinople was taken and lost, at different times, by persons who bore the same name: The Latins, under a Baldwin, obtained possession of it, and under a Baldwin they were again driven out of it. The city was rebuilt and made the seat of the Greek empire by a Constantine, the son of Helena, and in the patriarchate of a Gregory; it was taken, and the empire of the Greeks destroyed under a Constantine, the son of Helena, and in the patriarchate of a Gregory; the Turks obtained possession of it under a Mahomet and they are firmly persuaded that they shall lose it under a Mahomet, and that Mahomet, too, the present reigning sultan: and, to complete this chain of names, at the time the Greek insurrection broke out a Constantine was the heir apparent to the Russian throne, and a Gregory was Patriarch of Constantinople. It is true they hanged at the time one of these ominous persons, and the other has since abdicated the crown. Still they are persuaded that events will happen as they are decreed, and the fatal combination of Mahomet, Gregory, and Constantine, will yet destroy their power in Europe."

So much for the latest and best accounts of competent travellers touching the existing manners and public opinion of the Turks in Constantinople. A single quotation or two, touching the moral causes that have gradually sunk and degraded that semi-barbarous people will properly conclude this etching: In vain (it is Volney who now speaks) have you vanquished a hundred nations, and of a mass of conquered kingdoms compounded an immense empire. After devouring your enemies, your cupidity, always alive, has re-acted on itself; and, concentrated in your own bowels, has consumed you. Having become rich, you have quarrelled for partition and enjoyment, and disorder hath arisen in every class of society. The Sultan, intoxicated with grandeur, has mistaken the object of his functions; and all the vices of arbitrary power have been developed. The Pacha, who purchased the government of his province, has farmed it out to others, who exercise every extortion. He has sold, in turn, the collection of the taxes, the command of the troops, the administration of the village; and as every employment has been transient, rapine, spread from grade to grade, has been greedy and precipitate. The revenue officer has fleeced the merchant, and commerce is annihilated; the Aga has plundered the husbandman, and culture has degenerated. The labourer, deprived of his stock, has been unable to sow; the tax was augmented, and he could not pay it; punishment has been threatened, and he has tried to borrow. Money, from want of security, has been locked up from circulation; interest, therefore, is enormous, and the usury of the rich has aggravated the misery of the indigent. If driven to extremity by tyranny and outrage, the villages have revolted—"so much the better," says the Pacha. He wages war on them, assails their houses, pillages their property, carries off their stock; and when the fields have become a desert, "what care I?" says he, "I leave them to-morrow!" Oh, who can enumerate all the calamities of despotic government! Sometimes the Pachas make war on each other, and for their personal quarrels the provinces of the same State are laid waste. Sometimes, fearing their masters, they attempt independence, and draw on the people of their pachalate the chastisement of their revolt. Sometimes, dreading their subjects, they invite and subsidise foreigners, and to render them faithful submit all things to their plunder. Here they prosecute the rich, and despoil them under false pretences—there they suborn false witnesses, and impose penalties for supposititious offences; every where they excite the hatred of litigants, encourage informations to obtain amercements, extort property, seize persons; and when their short-sighted avarice has accumulated into one mass all the riches of a country, the Government, by an execrable perfidy, under pretext of avenging its oppressed people, takes to itself all their spoils, as if they were the culprits, and sheds the useless blood of its own agents for crime of which it is the accomplice. In vain, therefore, the Sultan leads forth his armies; the ignorant warriors are beaten and dispersed: in vain he summons his vassals; their hearts are ice. "Is it not written?" (say they) what matters it who is our master. We cannot lose by the change."

BONAPARTE AND CHARLES FOX.

One day when Bonaparte, in one of his frequent fits of ill-humour, was expressing his contempt of the whole human race, I observed to him, that if the gew-gaws of state excited the admiration of the vulgar, there were some men who were above being dazzled by them; and I mentioned, as an example, the celebrated Charles Fox, who, anticipating the conclusion of the peace of Amiens, had come to Paris, where he was remarkable for his extreme simplicity of manner and appearance. "You are right," said the First Consul, "Fox is a truly great man."

Bonaparte was always delighted to see Fox; and whenever he had an interview with him, he never failed to tell me of the pleasure he enjoyed in conversing with the great English statesman, who, he said, was truly worthy of his high celebrity. He regarded him as a man of the very highest order, and ardently wished to treat with him in his subsequent relations with England. It may be presumed that Mr. Fox, on his part, did not forget the friendly relations he had maintained with the First Consul.

THE LEGENDARY.

CHOCORUA'S CURSE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOBOMOK."

The rocky county of Stafford, New Hampshire, is remarkable for its wild and broken scenery. Ranges of hills towering one above another, as if eager to look upon the beautiful country, which afar off lies sleeping in the embrace of heaven; precipices, from which the young eagles take their flight to the sun; dells rugged and tangled as the dominions of Roderick Vich Alpine, and ravines dark and deep enough for the death scene of a bandit, form the magnificent characteristics of this picturesque region.

A high precipice, called Chocorua's Cliff, is rendered peculiarly interesting by a legend which tradition has scarcely saved from utter oblivion. Had it been in Scotland, perhaps the genius of Sir Walter would have hallowed it, and Americans would have crowded there to kindle fancy on the altar of memory. Being in the midst of our own romantic scenery, it is little known, and less visited; for the vicinity is as yet untraversed by rail-roads or canals, and no "Mountain House," perched on these tremendous battlements, allures the traveller hither to mock the majesty of nature with the insipidities of fashion. Our distinguished artist, Mr. Cole, found the sunshine and the winds sleeping upon it in solitude and secrecy; and his pencil has brought it before us in its stern repose.

In olden time, when Goffe and Whalley passed for wizzards and mountain spirits among the superstitious, the vicinity of the spot we have been describing was occupied by a very small colony, which, either from discontent or enterprise, had retired into this remote part of New Hampshire. Most of them were ordinary men, led to this independent mode of life from an impatience of restraint, which as frequently accompanies vulgar obstinacy as generous pride. But there was one master spirit among them, who was capable of a higher destiny than he ever fulfilled. The consciousness of this had stamped something of proud humility on the face of Cornelius Campbell; something of a haughty spirit strongly curbed by circumstances he could not controul, and at which he scorned to murmur. He assumed no superiority; but unconsciously he threw around him the spell of intellect, and his companions felt, they knew not why, that he was "among them, but not of them." His stature was giantlike, and he had the bold, quick tread of one who had wandered frequently and fearlessly among the terrible hiding-places of nature. His voice was harsh, but his whole countenance possessed singular capabilities for tenderness of expression; and sometimes, under the gentle influence of domestic excitement, his hard features would be rapidly lighted up, seeming like the sunshine flying over the shaded fields in an April day.

His companion was one peculiarly calculated to excite and retain the deep, strong energies of manly love. She had possessed extraordinary beauty; and had, in the full maturity of an excellent judgment, relinquished several splendid alliances, and incurred her father's displeasure, for the sake of Cornelius Campbell. Had political circumstances proved favourable, his talents and ambition would unquestionably have worked out a path to emolument and fame; but he had been a zealous and active enemy of the Stuarts, and the restoration of Charles the Second was the death-warrant of his hopes. Immediate flight became necessary, and America was the chosen place of refuge. His adherence to Cromwell's party was not occasioned by religious sympathy, but by political views, too liberal and philosophical for the state of the people; therefore Cornelius Campbell was no favourite with our forefathers, and being of a proud nature, he withdrew with his family to the solitary place we have mentioned.

It seemed a hard fate for one who had from childhood been accustomed to indulgence and admiration, yet Mrs. Campbell enjoyed more than she had done in her days of splendour; so much deeper are the sources of happiness than those of gaiety.

Even her face had suffered little from time and hardship. The bloom on her cheek, which in youth had been like the sweet pea blossom, that most feminine of all flowers, had, it is true, somewhat faded; but her rich, intellectual expression, did but receive additional majesty from years; and the exercise of quiet domestic love, which, where it is suffered to exist, always deepens and brightens with time, had given a bland and placid expression, which might well have atoned for the absence of more striking beauty. To such a woman as Caroline Campbell, of what use would have been some modern doctrines of equality and independence?

With a mind sufficiently cultivated to appreciate and enjoy her husband's intellectual energies, she had a heart that could not have found another home. The bird will drop into its nest though the treasures of earth and sky are open. To have proved marriage a tyranny, and the cares of domestic life a thralldom, would have affected Caroline Campbell as little, as to be told that the pure, sweet atmosphere she breathed, was pressing upon her so many pounds to every square inch! Over such a heart, and such a soul, external circumstances have little power; all worldly interest was concentrated in her husband and babes, and her spirit was satisfied with that inexhaustible fountain of joy which nature gives, and God has blessed.

A very small settlement, in such a remote place, was of course subject to inconvenience and occasional suffering. From the Indians they received neither injury nor insult. No cause of quarrel had ever arisen; and, although their frequent visits were sometimes troublesome, they never had given indications of jealousy or malice. Chocorua was a prophet among them, and as such an object of peculiar respect. He had a mind which education and motive would have nerved with giant strength; but growing up in savage freedom, it wasted itself in dark, fierce, ungovernable passions. There was something fearful in the quiet laughtiness of his lip—it seemed so like slumbering power, too proud to be lightly roused, and too implacable to sleep again. In his small, black, fiery eye, expression lay coiled up like a beautiful snake. The white people knew that his hatred would be terrible; but they had never provoked it, and even the children became too much accustomed to him to fear him.

Chocorua had a son, about nine or ten years old, to whom Caroline Campbell had occasionally made such gaudy presents as were likely to attract his savage fancy. This won the child's affections, so that he became a familiar visitant, almost an inmate of their dwelling; and being unrestrained by the courtesies of civilized life, he would inspect everything, and taste of everything which came in his way. Some poison, prepared for a mischievous fox, which had long troubled the little settlement, was discovered and drunk by the Indian boy; and he went home to his father to sick-en and die. From that moment jealousy and hatred took possession of Chocorua's soul. He never told his suspicions—he brooded over them in secret, to nourish the deadly revenge he contemplated against Cornelius Campbell.

The story of Indian animosity is always the same. Cornelius Campbell left his hut for the fields early one bright, balmy morning in June. Still a lover, though ten years a husband, his last look was turned towards his wife, answering her parting smile—his last action a kiss for each of his children. When he returned to dinner, they were dead—all dead! and their disfigured bodies too cruelly showed that an Indian's hand had done the work!

In such a sad grief, like all other emotions, was tempestuous. Home had been to him the only verdant spot in the wide desert of life. In his wife and children he had garnered up all his heart; and now they were torn from him, the remembrance of their love clung to him like the death-grapple of a drowning man, sinking him down, down, into darkness and death. This was followed by a calm a thousand times more terrible—the creeping agony of despair, that brings with it no power of resistance.

"It was as if the dead could feel
The joy worm around him steal."

Such, for many days, was the state of Cornelius Campbell. Those who knew and revered him, feared that the spark of reason was forever extinguished. But it rekindled again, and with it came a wild, demoniac spirit of revenge. The death-groan of Chocorua would make him smile in his dreams; and when he waked, death seemed too pitiful a vengeance for the anguish that was eating into his very soul.

Chocorua's brethren were absent on a hunting expedition at the time he committed the murder; and those who watched his movements observed that he frequently climbed the high precipice, which afterward took his name, probably looking out for indications of their return.

Here Cornelius Campbell resolved to effect his deadly purpose. A party was formed under his guidance, to cut off all chance of retreat, and the dark-minded prophet was to be hunted like a wild beast to his lair.

The morning sun had scarce cleared away the fogs when Chocorua started at a loud voice from beneath the precipice, commanding him to throw himself into the deep abyss below. He knew the voice of his enemy, and replied with an Indian's calmness. "The Great Spirit gave life to Chocorua; and Chocorua will not throw it away at the command of a white man." "Then hear the Great Spirit speak in the white man's thunder!" exclaimed Cornelius Campbell, as he pointed his gun to the precipice. Chocorua, though fierce and fearless as a panther, had never overcome his dread of fire-arms. He placed his hand upon his ears to shut out the stunning report; the next moment the blood bubbled from his neck, and he reeled fearfully on the edge of the precipice. But he recovered himself, and, raising himself on his hands, he spoke in a loud voice, that grew more terrific as its huskiness increased. "A curse upon ye, white men! May the Great Spirit curse ye when he speaks in the clouds, and his words are fire! Chocorua had a son—and ye killed him while the sky looked bright! Lightning blast your crops! Wind and fire destroy your dwellings! The Evil Spirit breathe death upon your cattle! Your graves lie in the war path of the Indian! Panthers howl, and wolves fatten over your bones! Chocorua goes to the Great Spirit—his curse stays with the white men!"

The prophet sunk upon the ground, still uttering inaudible curses—and they left his bones to whiten in the sun. But his curse rested on the settlement. The tomahawk and scalping knife were busy among them, the winds tore up trees and hurled them at their dwellings, their crops were blasted, their cattle died, and sickness came upon their strongest men. At last the remnant of them departed from the fatal spot to mingle with more populous and prosperous colonies. Cornelius Campbell became a hermit, seldom seeking or seeing his fellow men; and two years after he was found dead in his hut.

To this day the town of Burton, in New Hampshire, is remarkable for a pestilence which infects its cattle; and the superstitious think that Chocorua's spirit still sits enthroned upon his precipice, breathing a curse upon them.

MISCELLANY.

From the Journal of Health.

TOBACCO.

It is really surprising that a single individual could be found, who, after experiencing the distressing sensations almost invariably produced by the first use of Tobacco, would be willing to risk their recurrence a second time: still more so, that any one should again and again resort to the "poisonous weed," until, its immediate effects being lessened by habit, it becomes an article of luxury, from the use of which it was found difficult to refrain.

The extreme nausea—pain of the head, and vertigo—the cold death-like sweat, and general exhaustion, experienced by the novice in chewing, snuffing and smoking, we should imagine would be fully sufficient to prevent the use of tobacco from becoming a habit. Yet, such is "the folly and insatiation of the human mind," and the power of custom and example, in opposition to prudence and the dictates of nature, that one of the most disgusting productions of the vegetable kingdom, "in all places where it has come," to use the quaint expression of Sir Hans Sloane, "has much bewitched the inhabitants, from the polite European, to the barbarous Hottentot."

Did this "modern herb" possess a tithe of the virtues ascribed to it by Dr. Thorus in his Patologia? did, in fact, the least benefit result to the system from its habitual use, there would then be some reason why, "with all its loathsomeness of smell and taste," it should have become so general a favourite. But we know, on the contrary, that all who habituate themselves to its use, sooner or later experience its noxious powers.

Tobacco is, in fact, an absolute poison. A very moderate quantity introduced into the system—even applying the moistened leaves over the stomach—has been known very suddenly to extinguish life. The Indians of our own country were well aware of its poisonous effects, and were accustomed, it is said, on certain occasions, to dip the points of their arrows in an oil obtained from the leaves, which being inserted into the flesh, occasioned sickness and fainting, or even convulsions and death.

It must be evident to every one, that the constant use of an article possessing such deleterious properties, cannot fail, at length, to influence the health of the system.

In whatever form it may be employed, a portion of the active principles of the tobacco, mixed with the saliva, invariably finds its way into the stomach, and disturbs or impairs the functions of that organ. Hence most, if not all, of those who are accustomed to the use of tobacco, labour under dyspeptic symptoms. They experience, at intervals, a want of appetite—nausea—inordinate thirst—vertigo—pains and distension of the stomach—disagreeable sensations of the head—tremors of the limbs—disturbed sleep, and are more or less emaciated.

According to Boerhaave, "when this celebrated plant was first brought into use in Europe, it was cried up for a certain antidote to hunger; but it was soon observed, that the number of hypochondriacal and consumptive people were greatly increased by its use."

Dr. Cullen informs us that he has observed "several instances" in which the excessive use of tobacco in the form of snuff, has produced effects similar to those occurring in persons from the long continued use "of wine and opium;" that is, "loss of memory, fatuity, and other symptoms of a weakened or senile state of the nervous system, induced before the usual period."

The almost constant thirst occasioned by smoking and chewing has, in numerous instances, it is to be feared, led to the intemperate use of ardent spirits.

This thirst cannot be allayed by water; for no insipid liquor will be relished after the mouth and throat have been exposed to the stimulus of the smoke or juice of the tobacco: a desire, of course, is excited for strong drink, which soon leads to intemperance and drunkenness.

The use of snuff destroys entirely the sense of smell, and injures materially the tone of the voice; while chewing and smoking vitiate the sense of taste. Hence those who make use of tobacco, to any extent, have certainly one, and frequently two, of the external sense less perfect than other individuals. But this is not all. Polypus of the nose, and other serious affections have been traced to the use of snuff.

Sir John Pringle, whom, we are informed, was very liberal in its use, experiencing in the evening of his days, a tremor of his hands and a defect of memory. Being in company with Dr. Franklin at Paris, he was requested by the Doctor to observe that the former complaint was very common to those people of fashion who were great snuffers. Sir John was led by this remark to suspect that his tremors were occasioned by his excessive use of snuff. He, therefore, immediately left it off, and, soon afterwards the tremor of his hands disappeared, and at the same time he recovered the perfect exercise of his retentive faculties.

Cases could be mentioned in which epilepsy, consumption, and other serious diseases have been brought on in young people by the excessive use of tobacco.

We have ourselves known individuals, in whom very severe and dangerous affections of the stomach—tremors of the limbs, and great emaciation were referable to excessive smoking and chewing, and which were removed only after these habits were entirely relinquished. One or two of these cases, we are sorry to say, occurred in females, from the filthy practice of chewing snuff; and in a class of society where it was to be hoped a refinement of taste and exalted notions of female delicacy, would forever have precluded the introduction of so detestable and pernicious a habit.

JOHN KEMBLE AND MISS OWENSON.

There is more of the patten and fun of fashion in Lady Morgan's books than in any other chronicles of the ton. The following anecdote of her ladyship (then Miss Owen) is taken from her last work, The Book of the Boudoir. It occurred about twenty years since. All the town were then running mad after the "Wild Irish Girl," and Miss O. was invited to a blue-stocking party, at the mansion of the Dowager Countess of Cork.

Mr. Kemble was announced. Lady C——k reproached him as "the late Mr. Kemble;" and then, looking significantly at me, told him who I was. Kemble, to whom I had already been presented by Mrs. Lefanu, acknowledged me by a kindly nod; but the intense stare which succeeded, was not one of mere recognition. It was the glazed, fixed look, so common to those who have been making libations to altars which rarely qualify them for ladies' society. Mr. Kemble was evidently much pre-occupied and a little exalted; and he appeared actuated by some intention, which he had the will but not the power to execute. He was seated vis-à-vis, and had repeatedly raised his arm, and stretched it across the table, for the purpose, as I supposed, of helping himself to some boar's head in jelly. Alas, no!—the bore was, that my head happened to be the object which fixed his tenacious attention; and which, being a true Irish cathak head, dark, cropped, and curly, and struck him as a particularly well organized Brutus, and better than any in his repertoire of theatrical perukes. Succeeding at last in his feline and fixed purpose, he actually struck his claws in my locks, and addressing me in the deepest sepulchral tones, asked—"Little girl, where did you buy your wig?"

Lord Erskine "came to the rescue," and liberated my head.

Lord Carysfort exclaimed, to relieve the awkwardness of the scene, "le serpents de l'envie ont siffles dans son cœur;" on every side—

"Some did laugh,
And some did say, God bless us,"

—while I, like Macbeth—

"Could not say, Amen."

Meantime, Kemble, peevish, as half-tipsy people generally are, and ill brooking the interference of the two peers, drew back, muttering and fumbling in his coat pocket, evidently with some dire intention lowering in his eyes. To the amusement of all, and to my increased consternation, he drew forth a volume of the "Wild Irish Girl," (which he had brought to return to Lady C——k) and reading, with his deep, emphatic voice, one of the most high flown of its passages, he paused, and patting the page with his forefinger, with the look of Hamlet addressing Polonius, he said, "Little girl, why did you write such nonsense? And where did you get all these d—d hard words?"

Thus taken by surprise, and "smarting with my wounds," or mortified authorship, I answered, unwittingly and witlessly, the truth: "Sir, I wrote as well as I could, and I got the hard words out of Johnson's Dictionary."

The eloquence of Erskine himself would have pleaded my cause with less effect; and the "J'y allois" of La Fontaine was not quoted with more approbation in the circles of Paris, than the naivete of my equally veracious and spontaneous reply. The triumph of my simplicity did not increase Kemble's good humour; and, shortly after, Mr.

Spenser carried him off in his carriage, to prevent any further attacks on my unfortunate head—inside or out.

HAND-WRITING.

Why will not correspondents learn to write legibly? We have before us a communication which we should be glad to read, for from the few words which we can decypher, it seems to be written "in a learned spirit of human dealing," as Othello says; but we would defy Oedipus himself to make it out. If we might judge of the author's disposition, by his hand-writing, it must be as crabbed and cynical as that of the ragged old Antisthenes. By the way, there is much truth in coming at men's characters by the peculiarities of their penmanship. We are not very devout believers in palmistry, or physiognomy, or even in much talked of craniology. A man may be a very good man, and a very great man, without a single bump on his head, and another a fool and blackguard, though disfigured with a dozen. One of the honestest fellows we ever knew had a hang-dog countenance that, according to Lavater, should have condemned him to the gallows without a hearing; and another acquaintance of ours, whose life was never diversified with a single extraordinary vicissitude, yet displayed on his hand a complication of lines and crossings which a professor of palmistry would have interpreted into the signs of a thousand "hair-breadth 'scapes, and moving accidents by flood and field."

This is a wise generation. Men of former days were dunces compared to those of the present. This assertion is not based on the progress we have made in steam boats, nor in the various methods of flying in the air, and sailing underneath the water. We allude not solely to the self moving water-wheel, nor to the now solved problem of perpetual motion. But in what art or science have we not outstripped all precedent, "till panting time toils after us in vain?" Instead of spending some four or six years in the secluded groves of academics, the student now becomes an adept in the "lore of centuries," in the short course of thirty or forty lessons. We have a machine for teaching grammar, a drug for curing intemperance, and a panacea for every ill that flesh is heir to. Miss attends a lecture on astronomy, and arises from it a profound astrologist, capable of perusing the mysteries of the stars. Mamma reads three pages of Accum's Chemical Amusements, and is at once inducted into all the mysteries of analytical and synthetical operations. We are indeed a wonderful people;—this is a wonderful age.

But, as we have already said, we do not altogether accredit the infallibility of the new methods of acquiring the difficult science of the human heart. We do not think, the altitude of the lumps and bumps on one's head, or the longitude of his nose, being known, we can go to work with these terms, according to the rule of three, and the product will be the individual's moral and intellectual character. But though we doubt the certainty of these short cuts invariably arriving at the knowledge desired, yet we are equally opposed to the tedious method of learning human character formerly in vogue. Of old, the inquirer attained it, as a ship arrives at her port in adverse weather, by beating to windward; but we by the plan we are about to propose, may drive ahead in a steam boat fashion, against wind and tide. There is no longer any need of being acquainted with the grand governing principles of nature; of viewing the actions of men in reference to their motives, and learning how actions may be modified, and motives take their hue, as the chameleon does, from circumstances. Instead of this difficult and tedious process, we need only give careful heed to men's hand writing—instead of studying man, we should study chirography.

Let any one who has ever given any attention to this subject but reflect a moment, and he will see the truth of our remarks. An individual's character is sure to get into his pen, and have its share in every letter that he forms. From a proper perusal of these, the curious may acquire an ample knowledge of the character, manners, habits and disposition, of those with whom they may be led to mingle. We need not, with impertinent stare, look into one's face for the proportions of his features, nor ask of him permission to feel the humps on his pate, in order to ascertain whether he be wise or silly, an honest man or a rogue. We need only look at his hand writing.

If all the t's are crossed, and i's dotted, with scrupulous nicety, and all the commas, semicolons, colons, &c. marked in their proper places, depend on it you are dealing with a methodical, straight forward, prudent person. If as many words are crowded into a line as possible, he is economical; if written in a loose, scrawling, flourishing hand, he is liberal; if there are many erasures and interlineations, and omissions of unimportant words and of pauses, dots, &c. he is careless, and an incoherent thinker. The latter is more particularly the case when dashes are substituted for the proper punctuation. If a final e is added to nouns usually spelled without, he is a Scotchman; if half the words are contracted, he is either a merchant or a poet. But it is easy to distinguish between these. A merchant's style is after the manner in which memoranda are written; all words not absolutely necessary to an understanding of what he writes being omitted, to save time; as for example:—Yrs 15th inst. recd. Coffee dull; tobacco no sales; sugar in demd a 11 cts. &c. A poet invariably makes use of epithets and qualifying words, chooses the most sonorous expressions, and abbreviates only that his idea may not escape him before he has it down in black and white.

We have not room at present for a full exposition of our chirographical method of studying mankind; but the hints which we have given may perhaps be thought worthy of being amplified, by some whose time and ingenuity fit them for the avocation, into a theory which shall totally eclipse those of the cranioscopists and physiognomists of the present day.

INFANCY AND OLD AGE.

These two seasons of human existence have peculiar claims on the affections of those who are passing through the middle walks of life. The infant, that may be considered only in the vestibule of a treacherous and illusive world, utterly incapable of demanding or obtaining the means of subsistence, and wholly ignorant of the vast field that lies diversified in prospect, would inevitably perish in that helpless and fragile state, were it not for the kind attentions of parental affection, and the general dictates of humanity. These protect and foster the tender frame of infancy, which awakens the liveliest and warmest sympathies of the heart. For who can behold a fellow creature, in the dawn of being, hardly conscious of existence, exposed to injury or destruction in a thousand ways, and yet smiling amid surrounding dangers, without extending to an object so needy and interesting all the kind offices and feeling emotions which it claims and inspires? If the great Founder of christianity took little children in his arms and blessed them, was it not for an example to all succeeding generations, to be kind and affectionate to our species in that helpless state? And what can be considered as a more undeceiving criterion of a pure and good heart, than the tender regard which the benevolent always manifest towards infants? If it is not the most splendid virtue that can adorn the human character, we certainly know of none more amiable; and the few solitary instances of persons who can contemplate the state of infancy without a kindred glory of ardent and interested feeling, only serve to add lustre to a better principle so generally implanted in the human bosom.

And if we view the condition of man in the decline of years, (though in some respects this state may be compared to that of infancy, inasmuch as it is sometimes marked with extreme imbecility) our feelings of regard and interest are called into exercise from different motives. Here we behold man, not a candidate for all the turmoil and vicissitudes of this transitory scene, for a fluctuating season to receive the smiles and frowns of fortune and the world, because these have already been realized and are passed; but he is contemplated on the low acclivity of life, just ready to disappear forever in the dark vale beneath. The attentions bestowed upon him at this eventful crisis, are not to rear him up to buffet the tempest of secular scenes, or glide smoothly up the acclivity of life, but to render the pressure of years and infirmity supportable; and to tranquilize the mind that looks back with broken recollections and mingled feelings on all that has passed, and forward with anxious solicitude on the events of futurity. As it is natural to the mind of man, when engaged in the contemplation of infancy, to wish that this state may be succeeded by a prosperous and happy life; so, when administering to the wants and weaknesses of age, it is equally natural for every benevolent heart to breathe forth aspirations that the close of life may be calm and peaceful, and that the dark valley of death may be an avenue leading to a higher and more blissful existence. And as it is an almost infallible indication of a good heart and pure affections, to feel a deep interest in the opening dawn of life; so it will ever be regarded as one of the brightest traits in the human character, to pay proper deference to the aged, and treat their infirmities with sentiments and feelings of tenderness and compassion.

A ROMAN EXECUTION.

It is the practice in Rome, to heighten the agonies of a criminal, by the excitement of imaginary terrors. The fatal sentence is not revealed to him until the night before its execution. Suddenly at midnight, he is conducted to a room hung with black drapery; a skeleton, holding a scythe and hour-glass, starts from the wall, while, at the same instant, a deep sepulchral voice exclaims, "Thou shalt die!" From this moment, however, to the last of his existence, the offender is constantly attended by his "comforter." These comforters, who are masked, and are usually persons of high rank, avail themselves of these opportunities, to perform a meritorious and acceptable service, thinking, probably, that they can thereby expiate their own offences. Early on the morning of execution, several masked individuals, some of whom are usually men of rank, walk through the city with boxes, and collect alms for the condemned criminal. The amount thus collected is given to the relatives of the sufferer by way of compensation for their loss, and they are moreover conveyed before the hour of execution, beyond the city walls, and provided with meals for the day, to save them from all risk of witnessing a spectacle so trying to their feelings. The gallows is erected the previous evening in the Piazza del Popolo, and guarded throughout the night by Sbirri; and the door-way of one of the contiguous houses is hung with black, that the delinquent may receive there the sacrament immediately before his execution. On the following morning, the criminal, enveloped in an old cloak, was brought in a cart to the door-way hung with black, through which he passed into the house, and, immediately after his descent, the cart was crowded with spectators. After the sacrament had been administered, the condemned man was led to the gallows. He mounted the ladder, and the executioner, after fixing the rope, called out to him "Credisne tu in Jesu Christo?" The criminal answered in the affirmative, the hangman pushed him from the ladder, and stepped upon his shoulders to accelerate his death, then, sliding down the rope, he embraced, and kissed the dead man, according to the established custom, and in proof that he had entertained no malice towards the criminal. The fine proportions of the body were now admired and commented on by the surrounding Romans, many of whom exclaimed "Che bel morto!" after which they asked the foreigners present, how they liked the ceremony, (come piace, &c.) and now the blind poor proceed through the streets of Rome, describing the unction with which the criminal had prepared himself for death, and the fortitude displayed in his last moments.

ADRIANOPLE.

Adrianople, the second city in the Byzantian Empire, lies on seven gentle eminences, and occupies the site of Uskadama, the ancient metropolis of the Bessi. It was built by Adrian, and was named after that emperor; though by some it was styled "Orestia," an appellation which Manet conceives to have been borrowed from Grecian mythology. It is well known in the annals of the Eastern empire, by the siege and devastation it underwent when attacked by Fritigern and his Goths in the time of Valens; by the pillages, to which it was doomed, when taken by the Bulgarians under Romanos; and by the passage of the Crusaders through it in the times of the Comnenes. In the East it is famed far and wide for the amenity of its situation, at the confluence of three rivers, one of which, the Hebras, is studded with gardens of roses and orchards of quinces, which yield an oil an extract of roses, vying with the choicest produce of Egypt and Persia. It is equally famed for its soap, quince-marmalade, sherbets, and confectionery; and though last not least for the personal endowments of its inhabitants. The charms with which both nature and art have thus endowed it, have been specially and frequently commemorated by Turkish bards, from whom it has received the name of the "City of Commotion;"—"a city, the beauty whereof, both as concerns herself and her indwellers, fills every heart with commotion!" Adrianople has been the cradle and last home of many a poet, dear to Turkish song; and this of itself is a circumstance which constitutes her principal attraction in the eyes of the Ottoman, who regards with singular veneration the shrine of the pious and the sainted, the learned and the inspired; and holds in far inferior estimation, the palaces, buildings, markets, mosques, schools, and bridges of this, the second city of European Turkey.

It was wrested from the sceptre of the Greek empire in 1361, being treacherously delivered up to Amurath I. Its present population is 100,000.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1829.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

☞ The length of the excellent article in our masonic department this week, rendered it necessary that we should use a smaller type than usual, in order to present the whole of it to our readers at once, without encroaching unreasonably upon other departments. We trust that the reader will give it an attentive perusal. The author is the Rev. TIMOTHY FLINT, one of the ablest writers in our country. He has taken a broad and comprehensive view of his subject, and drawn the character of the present excitement in the truest colours. The nervous and forcible style of Mr. Flint, and his habits of close reasoning, were peculiarly adapted to an investigation of this subject, and we doubt not his "Review" will have a salutary effect upon the minds of the community.

FRANCES WRIGHT, of whom all our readers have heard something, has been in this city, and delivered two lectures at the Athenaeum Hall—one on Thursday evening and another on last evening,—concerning what she considers the popular errors and popular vices of the times. Her audience was large and respectable on each evening, and her lectures were listened to with great attention and apparent interest. There was nothing very "shocking" in them; nor, indeed any thing which a man might not think out for himself, if he would set about it. They were plausible, and we have no doubt the lady believed she was doing the public a benefit by delivering them. These lectures, she says, are but the commencement of a course which she intends to finish next spring, when she will visit the city again for the purpose of endeavouring to get up a "Hall of Science," in imitation of the one in New-York, and others in embryo in Philadelphia and Boston. On a recent visit to the latter place she left with the "free inquirers" for the benefit of the "Hall of Science" that is to be, $500, being the surplus of the receipts over the expenses of a course of lectures delivered there. "Free inquiry," she says, has been made the "turning point of the Philadelphia elections;" of which matter we have our doubts, having no proof of the "sense" to support it.

It would be unfair to judge of Miss Wright's system of "free inquiry," from the explanation we have heard of it. There seems to be much in it that is good, and something in it that is not good. In the lectures which she has delivered in this city, she has probably presented its best features. She said nothing about marriage, and very little of the Scriptures, though she did speak rather freely and severely of "theological teachers." Her notions of religion are offensive to a vast majority, and will not be tolerated. Men are not sufficiently Owenized to convert their churches into "Halls of Science," and to exchange the ministers of revelation for "practical philosophers." Miss Wright's theological notions are chimerical and impracticable; but concerning other matters she speaks more rationally and "with a learned spirit." We think that the good might be separated from the bad, and adopted, profitably to the present as well as the rising generation, and not only without injury, but beneficially to exciting religious institutions.

Miss Wright is, we should think, about midway between thirty and forty years of age. Her person is tall and well formed; her face, though not handsome, denotes health; her forehead is of about the usual height, and her eyes are bright and penetrating. Her language is chaste and well chosen; her pronunciation pure; and her enunciation clear, distinct and forcible. No one who hears her can deny that she is possessed of a superior mind, and that her reading is extensive. Possibly she has made some friends in this city, probably she has confirmed many in their preconceived unfavourable opinions concerning her doctrines.

THE TOKEN FOR 1830. We have had this beautiful annual on our table for some days, but have not been able to give it such an examination as we could wish. We have barely looked at its rich exterior, and its elegant engravings, and perused a very small portion of its various contents. In this partial examination we have found every thing to praise and nothing to censure. We may hereafter enter into a more extended examination of its contents. We delight not however, in fulsome praise, and it would be an ungenerous and thankless task, to carp at the trifling faults of so beautiful a book, and so fair a specimen of the literature and arts of our country. At present, we can merely commend THE TOKEN to the patronage of the reader, with the assurance that he will not be disappointed in his highest expectations. The engravings of the "Banks of the Juniata," "Chocoma's Curse," the "Lost Children," "Innocence," and the "Sibyl," are among the most beautiful we ever saw. See advertisement.

Honest John Cray, who has been nominated for the Senate by the political malcontents of the fourth district, was a member of the now defunct "Washington Benevolent Society." He hung to it till the close of its last gasp, wept over its manes, and then set up for a patent republican. Its principles are even now as dear to him as the apple of his eye, and it disturbs his serenity amazingly, even to hint at a recantation.

The Toleration Ticket has succeeded in Pennsylvania by thirty thousand majority! Had its friends manifested a zeal equal to that of its enemies, it is supposed the majority would have been twice as large.

The accounts from Europe say that Adrianople has fallen into the hands of the Russians, and that the Porte has acknowledged the independence of Greece.

SUNDAY MAILS. It is said, that the effort to stop the running of the mails on the Sabbath, is to be renewed at Washington next winter. We sincerely hope that it will prove abortive. We have not the least idea, that those gentlemen who are bent on carrying the measure into operation, have any design of subverting the religious liberty of the Republic—but we fear, that they are the dupes of their own amiable enthusiasm.

The Publick want their letters on the Sabbath as well as on other days. If the government has important intelligence in its possession on the first day of the week, that intelligence ought to be communicated, as soon as possible, to the persons interested. The government should be considered, in this matter, precisely as an individual. If any individual receives, on the Sabbath, a letter, which he thinks it important that his neighbour should read immediately, he does not hesitate to send it, notwithstanding the sanctity of the day. Why should not government do the same thing? Every Sabbath, the government has the charge of letters, of almost incalculable importance to thousands and thousands of the citizens of the United States, and why should these letters be stopped?

A great deal is said about the disturbance created by a mail stage passing through the country on the Sabbath day. Nonsense. If the officers of government see fit to stop mail carriages on the Sabbath, let them, at the same time, stop all other carriages. This, the clamourers against Sunday mails would hardly like. Rather than go to meeting on foot, they would be reconciled to hear the clattering of a mail carriage on the Sabbath, every hour of the four and twenty. It is a little strange, that a man should be willing to disturb his neighbours with the noise of wheels, merely for the sake of going to church in handsome style, and yet look with horror upon a mail carriage passing through the country to relieve the anxiety and minister to the interests of tens of thousands. And which of these gentlemen that make such an outcry about Sunday mails, would not "lose his ox or his ass on the Sabbath, and lead him away to watering?"

We do not wish to expose ourselves to the prejudices of the religious community, for we know that these prejudices can not fall upon an individual without grinding him to powder. Let the enemies of Sunday mails be charitable towards us, and we will be charitable toward them. If they will give us credit for not designing to subvert the Church, we will continue to give them credit for not wishing to subvert the State.

"EXCERPTS" FROM THE LAST NUMBER OF THE CAMDEN JOURNAL.

When Spring had melted all the snow,
And streams had not forgot to flow,
A man went forth to plough and hoe,
His name was Ichabod Beverly.
Says Ich: "This year I'll raise a beet
Fit for a Congress man to eat,
And if it turn his temper sweet,
'Twill answer very cleverly."

Linkum Fudge.

Mr. Burgess, of Rhode Island, who lately beat his competitors for Congress "all hollow," and who was always famous for beating the table in illustration of his own oratory—he was once professor of oratory, has now beaten every body in Christendom in the size of his beat. [we use the Rhode Island orthography.] One of his constituents lately gave him a beat (it should probably read beat, but we take no responsibility upon ourselves—it is a part of the "American System," with which we hold no communion,) which weighs (we will try to get along (if we can) without further parentheses;) just 24 1-8 pounds, avoirdupois. This noble vegetable properly manufactured would produce more saccharine matter than Mr. Tristram Burgess ever had in his possession before, from his cradle up; and we can't help thinking that his constituent meant it for a sly hint to the member elect, that it would be as well to sweeten his temper a little in returning to his place in Congress. There has hitherto been acidity enough about him to turn milk sour to as great a distance as the Amsterdam Organ.

Schism in the Steam Faculty. Doctor David Rogers, a disciple of the infamously famous Samuel Thompson and a graduate in the art and mystery of steaming foils into purgatory upon the high pressure principle, has lately denounced Thompson, and published a pamphlet setting forth "some of the absurdities of the Thompsonian practice!" Rogers says he gave 20 dollars to Thompson, for the privilege of committing homicide in his peculiar mode, and he abuses his former master most deliciously, descants upon his ignorance (Lord help us Dr. Rogers, to look grave) and talks about his own skill in very dainty terms. He says he is a better physician than either Dr. Thompson, or the regular practitioners.—Et hoc est paratus verificare.—He gives certificates from Mary Smith and Peleg Briggs. Well, if Peleg Briggs has lived through the Doctor's doses of lobelia and red pepper, he would not be to blame for certifying to—a miracle. We wish these worthy Quacks all manner of prosperity in their new vocation of throwing mud at each other, and may they both be suitably rewarded by the public; which according to our notions of recompense, would be dosing them with their own physick, with a gentle recreation in a tossed blanket till it operates.

We wish our friends of the New-York Courier and Enquirer would help us to the pronunciation of that unutterable name of the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian Army now marching upon Constantinople. We presume they are Au fait in every thing pertaining to the present campaign but as for ourselves, we had rather storm Chumla than undertake the true pronunciation of Count Diebitch. A gentleman of our acquaintance whose present feelings are nearly as Turkish as those of our brother Editors in New-York, pettishly pronounced it D—db—ch, a day or two since. Is that right Messrs. Editors?

"Nails in the coffin of Masonry." Such is the caption of a very comfortable article in the last Palladium, which no doubt was intended by the writer as the quiescence of anti-masonick veracity and wit. Take the following as a specimen.

"The former constituents of Col. R. M. Johnson, of Kentucky have demanded of him his opinion of Freemasonry, previous to accepting him as a candidate for Congress. Drive a nail there!"

Now, let it never hereafter be doubted that Solomon's thirteen in this county are really wise men; for it seems they have discovered that, though Col. R. M. Johnson was elected a member of Congress last August by a large majority, it is not too late for the anti-masons now to demand of him his opinion of Freemasonry, "previous to accepting him as a candidate for Congress." This, certainly, may be numbered among the most convincing proofs of the wisdom of the scull-cap tribe, and we shall wait with impatience to be informed, how it is, that an individual, already elected, can be called upon for his opinion upon an abstract question, "previous to accepting him as a candidate." The story of the man who locked his stable after the horse was stolen, is a mere joke to this. But nothing is too deep for the anti-masons, and the Wallkill will probably be soon set on fire from the "Snake" kill to Bunticee.

OBITUARY.

DEATH OF JOHN V. HENRY, ESQUIRE. This eminent counsellor and much respected citizen, expired at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

The death of Mr. Henry is a publick bereavement. Standing at the summit of his profession, after an uninterrupted practice of more than forty years, his great talents called constantly into requisition, and the most important causes claiming the assiduous attention for which he was distinguished, his life had become so closely associated with our legal proceedings, that the separation,—so suddenly, without warning or expectation,—is deeply felt throughout the whole community.

Mr. Henry was a profound and thorough lawyer, in the spirit and philosophy of the profession; and he leaves behind him few equals as a close and powerful pleader. The week before the last, he was heard before the court of errors, in one of his most able arguments, some say his ablest, in the important will cause; and although upwards of 65 years of age, his mental vigour seemed to have attained scarcely its meridian.

His death teaches a most admonitory lesson. Ten minutes before the attack, he was in high health. We do not recollect to have ever seen his step more firm and his physical powers apparently more vigorous than on Wednesday morning. He had just left the Supreme court room, and was passing down State-street, and when opposite Mr. C. Star's residence was seized with a sudden and alarming illness. He was assisted into Mr. Star's, where he lingered, nearly all the time in an insensible state, until the hour of his death. The disease is supposed to have been a suffusion of water on the brain.

To his family, the bereavement is irreparable as it is overwhelming; and our city mourns one of her ablest sons.

POETRY.

From the Yankee, for October.

JUDITH AT THE TENT OF HOLOFERNES.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Night was down among the mountains,
In her dim and quiet manner,
Where Bethulia's silver fountains
Gushed beneath the Assyrian banner.
Moonlight, o'er her meek dominion,
As a mighty flag unfurled,
Like an angel's snowy pinion
Resting on a darkened world!

Faintly rose the city's murmur,
But the crowded camp was calm;
Girded in their battle-armour,
Each a falchion on his arm,
Kingly chief and weary vassal
In the arms of slumber fell;
It had been a day of wasail,
And the wine had circled well.

Underneath his proud pavilion
Lay Assyria's champion,
Where the ruby's rich vermillion
Shone beside the beryl-stone.
With imperial purple laden,
Breathing in the perfumed air,
Dreams he of the Jewish maiden,
With her dark and jewelled hair.

Who is she—the pale-browed stranger,
Bending o'er that sun of slaughter?
God be with thee in thy danger,
Israel's lone and peerless daughter!
She hath bared her queenly beauty
To the dark Assyrian's glance;
Now, a high and sterner duty
Bids her to his couch advance.

Beautiful and pale she bendeth
In her earnest prayer to Heaven—
Look again—that maiden standeth
In the strength her God hath given!
Strangely is her dark eye kindled,
Hot blood through her cheek is poured,—
Lo—her every fear hath dwindled—
And her hand is on the sword!

Upward to the flashing curtain,
See, that mighty blade is driven—
And its fall!—'tis swift and certain
As the cloud-fire's track in heaven!
Down, as with a power supernal,
Twice the lifted weapon fell—
Twice—his slumber is eternal—
Who shall wake the infidel?

Sunlight on the mountains streameth
Like an air-borne wave of gold;
And Bethulia's armour gleameth
Round Judea's banner-fold.
Down they come—the mailed warriors,
As the upper torrents sally
Headlong from their mountain-barriers
Down upon the sleeping valley.

Rouse thee from thy couch, Assyrian!
Dream no more of woman's smile—
Fiercer than the leaguered Tyrian,
Or the dark-browed sons of Nile,
Foes are on thy slumber breaking—
Chieftian, to thy battle rise!
Vain the call—he will not waken—
Headless on his couch he lies.

Who hath dimmed your boasted glory?
What hath woman's weakness done?
Whose dark brow is up before ye,
Blackening in the fierce-haired sun?
Lo! an eye that never slumbers
Looketh in its vengeance down;
And the thronged and mailed numbers
Wither at Jehovah's frown!

From the Token, for 1830.

TO A WAVE.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

List! thou child of wind and sea,
Tell me of the far off deep,
Where the tempest's wing is free,
And the waters never sleep.
Thou perchance the storm has aided,
In its work of stern despair,
Or perchance thy hand hath braided,
In deep caves, the mermaid's hair.
Wave! now on the golden sands,
Silent as thou art, and broken,

Bearest thou not from distant strands
To my heart some pleasant token?
Tales of mountains of the south,
Spangles of the ore of silver,
Which with playful singing mouth,
Thou hast leaped on high to pilfer?

Mournful Wave! I deemed thy song
Was telling of a floating prison,
Which when tempests swept along,
And the mighty winds were risen,
Foundered in the ocean's grasp,
While the brave and fair were dying.
Wave! didst mark a white hand clasp
In thy folds as thou wert flying?

Hast thou seen the hallowed rock,
Where the pride of kings reposes,
Crowned with many a misty lock,
Wreathed with samphire green and roses?
Or with joyous playful leap
Hast thou been a tribute flinging
Up that bold and jutting steep,
Pearls upon the south wind stringing?

Faded Wave! a joy to thee
Now thy flight and toil are over!
Oh! may my departure be
Calm as thine, thou ocean rover!
When this soul's last joy or mirth
On the shore of time is driven,
Be its lot like thine on earth,
To be lost away in heaven.

From Gabrieli; a Tale of the Swiss Mountains.

THE SWORD SONG.

"Thou sword upon my belted vest,
Why glitters thus thy polished crest,
Kindling high ardours in my breast,"
From thy bright beams?—Hurrah!

"A horseman brave supports my blade,
Proud for a freeman to be made—
For him I shine, for him I wade
Through blood and death.—Hurrah!"

"Yes, my good sword, behold me free,
In fond affection bound to thee,
As though thou wert betrothed to me,
A first, dear bride.—Hurrah!"

"Soldier of Freedom, I am thine!
For thee alone my beams shall shine—
When, soldier, shall I call thee mine,
Joined in the field?—Hurrah!"

"When the shrill trumpet's summons flies—
When red guns flash upon the skies—
Then will our bridal sun arise
And join our hands.—Hurrah!"

"O welcome union! haste away,
Ye tardy moments of delay;
I long, my bridegroom, for the day
To wear thy wreath.—Hurrah!"

"Why restless in the scabbard, why,
Thou iron child of destiny?
So wild, as if the battle-cry
Thou hearest now.—Hurrah!"

"Impatient in my dread reserve,
Restless in battle-fields to serve,
I burn our freedom to preserve
Thus with bright gleams.—Hurrah!"

"Rest, but a little longer rest,
In a short space thou shalt be blest,
Within my ardent grasp compress,
Ready for fight.—Hurrah!"

"Then let me not too long await—
I love the gory field of fate,
Where Death's rich roses bloom elate
In bloody bloom.—Hurrah!"

"Then out, and from thy bondage fly,
Thou treasure of the freeman's eye!
Come to the scene of slaughter, hie
Our nuptial home.—Hurrah!"

"Thus be our glorious marriage tie
Wedded beneath heaven's canopy;
Bright as a sunbeam of the sky
Glitters my bride.—Hurrah!"

"Then, forth for the immortal strife,
Thou German soldier's new-made wife!
Glow not each heart with tenfold life
Embracing thee?—Hurrah!"

"While in thy scabbard at my side
I seldom gazed on thee, my bride—
Our hands now joined we'll ne'er divide,
Ever in sight.—Hurrah!"

"Thee sparkling too my lips I press,
And thus my ardent vows profess—
O cursed be he beyond redress
Who parts us now!—Hurrah!"

"Come joy into thy polished eyes,
Let thy bright glances flashing rise—
Our marriage-day dawns in the skies,
My Bride of Steel.—Hurrah!"

THE SOLDIER'S GRAVE.

He sleeps:—the burning breath of war
No more shall wave his purple plume;
No watching by the midnight star
Shall chill the warrior's youthful bloom.
He sleeps:—the hour of mortal pain
And mortal pride alike are past:
His blood is scattered on the plain;
His cheek is withering in the blast.

A thousand storms may wander there:
May swell a thousand battles' cry:
For earth he has no eye, nor ear:
Pain, pleasure, glory, pass him by.
He sleeps,—the brother of the worm,—
By thunder and by trump unmoved:
And is this frail and faded form
All that is left of all we loved?

No;—mourner kneel and weep no more:
That faded form is not thy love;
Its hour was come, its course was o'er,
The spirit winged its way above.
Life might have sunk, a long disease,
Or evil chance have stained his fame:
Or passion's hopeless agonies
Have smote his bosom like a flame.

But now upon his living glance
Are sights to which the sun is dim;
Earth lost in the sublime expanse;
All nature one majestic hymn.
And wouldst thou for his glory weep,
And grieve him with thine idle tear?
Love was not born in tombs to sleep.
See yonder heaven!—thy love is there.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN APPEAL

To the Inhabitants of Vermont, by Members of the Masonick Fraternity, present at Montpelier, at the Annual Communication of the Grand Lodge, October, 1829.

At the annual communication of the Grand Lodge of Vermont, October 6th and 7th, 1829, the undersigned members of the same, with others of the institution present at Montpelier, for reasons which must be sufficiently apparent to those they address, deemed it expedient to vindicate themselves,—so far as their most solemn declarations could do so,—to every friend of republican liberty, but more immediately to the inhabitants of the state to which they belong:—And this they would do briefly by a submission of the following

APPEAL.

The attitude, fellow citizens, which a concurrence of circumstances of the most astonishing character, requires us to assume, however unpleasant to ourselves individually, can render us obnoxious to no sort of censure. The principles upon which the structure of this government rests, inculcate as a paramount duty, the presentation of dispassionate and candid, but fearless and decisive protests against the obtaining of any doctrines designed to subtract from, or restrict the exercise of, any, the least among the rights secured to every citizen of these United and Republican States. It would then be but the discharge of a duty, if we believe ourselves, as the free residents of this soil, aggrieved, our characters traduced, and our most innocent intentions calumniated; to stand forth, and claim from you the liberty of the free and perfect exercise of all those benefits, for the enjoyment of which, we stand to each other in the relation of mutual guaranties. They are identified with your own—indivisible in themselves—and the hand which would blot from the record of his country's freemen the name of the least among them—be he free from the retributions which the sanctity of the laws requires—would equally as effectually abstract the privileges attached to each of you. But beside the violation of personal immunities, which alone would constitute a sufficient warrant for us thus publicly to appear, we find an imperious requisition in the peril to which our republican institutions are exposed. Every individual among you, who will not openly and unqualifiedly assent to the proscriptive policy and anti-republican doctrines which the leaders of anti-masonry have inscribed, broadly and deeply upon their acts, is placed at once without the pale of benefits, and as effectually disfranchised as are the vassals of a despotism. You cannot but know that, contrary to every legal, moral, or religious principle, they have endeavoured to make a large and respectable association of individuals, numbering in their ranks some of the most distinguished patriots of the revolution, and statesmen of subsequent time, responsible for an act, respecting which, the bounds of probability are transcended, if it be said that most of them previous to its commission could so much as have even heard. This forestalling of the public mind, which is little less than a virtual annihilation of the judicial power, whatever the magnitude of the innovation, is but the inceptive step in the progress of this second Gallic revolution. The contagion must necessarily extend to every department of the government. The church is to be pruned of its excrescences which we are told have so long disfigured it; and as the cap-stone in this novel order of improvement, the military power is to be composed exclusively of conscripts from political anti-masonry.

Fellow citizens, in sincerity of heart, we are constrained to ask, what solemn event can, by any possibility, have occurred, demanding or even excusing this entire revolution in the polity of our government? So far as we are acquainted with the ostensible reason, it consists in a series of charges against freemasons, and those who, in the remotest manner, attempt a vindication of their cause.

From the first establishment of civilized communities in this country, until 1826, masonry existed in every section of it where christianity obtained, without exciting in the public either fear or jealousy; while the European despotisms were continually harassing and oppressing its members, and in instances which have now become the subject of history, a complete interdiction was enforced, and not unfrequently the omnipotent aid of the inquisition resorted to, that the destruction of the institution might be effected, or its mysteries developed to the observation of the world. These efforts, we need not tell you, were utterly of no avail. At the latter period, the inordinate but laudable feeling which pervaded the public mind, because of a violation of the right of personal security, was manifested by members of the fraternity, no less than by others; and the former, as masons, and as citizens solicitous for the unqualified enjoyment of their privileges,—for immunity from harm, and as foes to every feature in disorganization, most heartily deprecated and denounced the lawless act.*

There were found in the vicinity where this abduction took place, individuals prepared to take advantage of the excited state of public feeling,—and instead of permitting it to take a course which, to all appearances, would have resulted in the ample satisfaction of justice, by the signal conviction and exemplary punishment of the guilty, and the consequent exoneration of the innocent from every imputation—were disposed utterly to divert its course, and change a holy demonstration of public feeling, into an engine for the erection of a distinct and anomalous party in politics; well knowing that in every faculty, the pioneers, from inordinate zeal, entitle themselves indisputably to the spoils of victory. Hence every means was used to secure the end; and this single secret of political anti-masonry contains an invincible reason why we are compelled to obstruct ourselves upon the attention of our fellow citizens.

The consequence of this assimilation of leaders for political warfare, was the establishment of various presses, through which, as channels, every necessary slander, which the rankest malignity might require, could, with impunity, be poured upon the public ear. This having been done, were to remain silent, we should be guilty of inflicting no less an injury upon you than upon ourselves. For were we quietly to submit to the dispensation and dissemination of error, and suffer a political party to be built upon it, destructive to the liberties of the people, when we possessed the power of exposing the falsity of the representations, we should, to say the least, display an unwarrantable and reprehensible disregard for the safety of the free institutions under which we live.

As masons, we have been charged with being accessory to the abduction of William Morgan—with shielding masons from just punishment for crimes they may have committed,—with exercising an influence, through the masonic character, over the legislative, executive and judiciary branches of our government,—with tampering with juries, with exerting an influence for the political preferment of members of the order, because of their membership, in preference to others,—with various blasphemous practices,—with causing the death of a distinguished mason, lest he should dissolve his connexion with the order,—with holding or sanctioning principles at variance with religion and virtue,—and with the assumption of a power to judge an individual brother, by a law known only to ourselves, and inflict corporeal punishment, even to that of death.

To each and every of the above charges, as men whose characters are known in this community, and who rely upon a future accountability, we make reply. In the most solemn manner, we positively affirm that of each and all of them, we are entirely guiltless;—and that masonry, so far as we are acquainted with it, in no way or manner, yields a sanction to the principles or practices which all, or each of them include.

As masons, we hold ourselves guiltless, in any manner, of the shedding of human blood,—guiltless, in any manner, of conspiring against the liberties or the privileges of the people, or endeavouring to monopolize an unequal portion of these privileges to ourselves, or to abridge the rights of others,—guiltless, in any manner, of impeding, retarding, or diverting the course of justice,—guiltless, in any manner, of an intrusion into the three great departments of our government,—guiltless, in any manner, of attempting to identify the subject with politics, or of making the latter a matter of discussion or remark,—guiltless, in any manner, of performing any rite, or doing any act, immoral or irreligious,—and guiltless, in any manner of entertaining the remotest suspicion, that the life of a fellow being was subject to our controul. For the truth of these declarations, solemnly made, we have given you the strongest pledge which honourable and virtuous men have it in their power to yield.

From the Nashville Banner.

To the Hon. Cadwallader D. Colden—

I have just seen your letter to a certain committee, on the subject of freemasonry. It smells much of contrivance, between them and you, to afford you an opportunity of expressing the malignity of your heart towards that institution of which you any have been a member. A little family, more pure than this profane to be, once had a Judas among its members. That one so large as this, composed of a vast multitude from among most of the nations of the earth, should have many, like yourself, is a to be wondered at. If you have ever passed through the grades of masonry, you must have done so, as a man once boasted that he went through college, by going in at one door and going out at another—without having your mind imbued with any of the principles that are there taught.

Names are nothing—principles are every thing. You may have been admitted to your name, and yet have none of the principles which it is intended to inculcate. Hence you denounce that which you cannot attain. You pay but a poor compliment to the patrons of the order, some of whom are the most distinguished men of this or any other age. In supposing that they had not "deliberately examined the merits of the institution," and that it was reserved for your all pervading mind to make the scrutiny, after having been a member for forty years, and having been decked by it with stars and ribbons—and saluted with its high sounding titles! It is too manifest, that now, in your old age, you are playing off the pranks of a demagogue, and under a popular excitement, and at the expense of principle, endeavouring to ride into office and power. You say you "have never known a great mason who was an ad hoc one—but afterwards, modestly defining the term g. of masons as one who is proud of his pompous title. Now how the fact can be ascribed that a person is proud of his title, and the badge of his office, but by receiving and wearing it, I do not know—and if it be evidenced in this way, from your own showing, you must have been the fool, the churl, of which, to answer your present purpose, you are willing so ungraciously to fix upon others.

That there are and have been unworthy members of the institution, your admission thereto, in connexion with the exposure of your present views of its principles and object, suffices to evince. But that it has existed for ages, and been cherished by the good, the great, and the patriotic of every age—and will exist and be cherished by such men, when you, and apostates like you, shall have sunk into contempt and deserved oblivion—there is, there can be no doubt.

A persecution may be attempted and a false and improper excitement, the flames of which you are endeavouring to fan—but instead of crushing the edifice, (and as well might a mouse attempt to crush a mountain,) it will be the means of uniting its members, who are worthy of being united, in the cement of love and brotherly affection—of expelling the dross from the crucible—and of fixing its foundation more permanently in the affections of the discerning and virtuous part of the community. Of the murder of Morgan, I, in truth, he was murdered, to which you so truly allude, you are constrained to admit, "that the fraternity did not participate in this crime." But "that the guilt of this transaction is confined to those infuriated men who assailed and slew him—and that they had no intention of taking his life when they first assailed him." Why this unmarked admission is opposed to the spirit and indignity which breathe through your address? Why but to screen yourself from the imputation? If an institution, or a body politic or corporate, is not amenable for the unauthorized and unlawful acts of one of its members and a proposition, which you, in effect admit—and the fraternity did not in any manner partake in this deed, by what sort of logic is it that from these premises, you arrive at the conclusion, that the institution itself is not "deserving the countenance and support of any good man?"

With regard to this atrocious act, if it were perpetrated, I would only remark, that masons feel as indignant at a deed which with as much horror, as any other part of the human family. With regard to Morgan, since his name has been introduced, I would remark with a view to a parallel—that he, like Judas, betrayed, so far as he could, his profession, for money, but you, to something worse.

That abuses exist in many of the lodges, is probably too true—but that they constitute an objection to the institution, of the magnitude which you urge—would be to make the unworthy walk of some of its professors an objection to christianity!

Not content with other missiles, you have also levelled at masonry the shaft of ridicule. You say, that "as to the sciences, the whole scope of instruction goes no further than frequently to remind the brethren that the sun rises in the east, and sets in the west, and rules the day, and that the moon rises in the night." Now can you believe that you can find a community sufficiently credulous to believe the a sort of? And how could you make it, when you knew, if you know any thing on the subject, that the expression to which you allude, only refers to the officers of a lodge, whose duty it is to rule and govern their lodge, imparting moral light and heat, as those luminaries rule by day and night, imparting natural light and heat!

You further say that you "have never heard of any other attempt to impart moral instruction, than that which could be conveyed by precepts like these—'as masons must live within the compass—walk up right as the plumb—must deal on the square—and other such mystical advice.'" Now what may be comprehended by such other mystical advice? It did not suit your purpose to state—such as the inculcation of the principles of faith, hope, and charity, in the broadest sense, patience, fortitude, to God and man. These are the rounds of the masonic and christian's ladder, the steps of which it is to be feared, you have never trodden. Freemasonry is a moral and religious institution, not opposed to the gospel system, but fully engrained up in it—by which its members are bound together, by ties which the immoral and unprincipled cannot feel, and therefore they are not knowingly admitted within its walls. It is not, it cannot be opposed to the laws or the government under which we live: they are of paramount obligation. On the contrary, it enjoins obedience to them, and inculcates in the most forcible manner, most of the higher, and a lot of the relative duties. So far from its being true, as you allege, "that the whole machinery of the institution is peculiarly adapted to political intrigue," pollicks of every kind are expressly excluded, and never can be admitted within this moral temple. Here is no place for the political juggler, or the demagogue, and he generally chooses as you have done, to slay away.

As to the expenditure in the erection of masonic edifices, which adorn some of our cities—collected by voluntary contribution—I should not be urged to this day of expansive benevolence—when the spires of our churches almost reach the clouds—and when almost every moral and religious association, has its place in our affairs, its temple.

I will not ice one other objection, and for the present take my leave of you.

You allege as a fact "that the craft seldom separate without refreshment, and that it happens that more is taken than is necessary to repair the exhaustion of their labours, and too frequently, more than is consistent with temperance." Now, if this were the fact how could it happen to be so soon to you, when, as you allege, you have not been within the walls of a lodge-room for some eight or ten years? How this fact may have been in some places, I cannot pretend to say, but this I can say, that I have never known it, that it is wholly inconsistent with the principles of the order, and that it is a good ground, where it exists, for suspension, if not for expulsion.

Temperance, with other virtues, in the lectures, is strongly inculcated, and in many places I know endeavoured to be enforced by example—and with temperance societies, which are getting up every where, I have no doubt the lodges will, as they ought, go hand in hand.

Where abuses exist, in any society, it is the interest and duty of every plain and patriotic mind to endeavour to reform them. But to denounce the institution itself and one which covers such an extent of surface, and embraces such a vast number, for the irregularities of a particular lodge which may deserve to have its charter taken away, or the wickedness of a few individual members, is to argue not like an inconsistent "fool" merely, but like a knavish fool. HIRAM.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the Boston Evening Gazette.

ON THE USE OF ACIDS FOR THE TEETH.

A notice of the beneficial effects of the use of vinegar, for cleaning the Teeth, has been very generally published in the papers of late; the following extract, in relation to this subject, is from "Le Dentiste de la Jeunesse," and was furnished to us by T. W. Parsons, M. D. Dentist of this city:—

In general, all the acids have the property of whitening the Teeth; they act in the same manner as aqua fortis does upon marble, that is, by destroying its polish and solidity. An experiment, which every one might easily try, proves that the Teeth are softened by being put into acid liquors, and that the earthy and calcareous part, which constitutes their solidity, settles in the bottom of the vessel, in the form of a sediment. It is by means of the acids, in which the Teeth are macerated, that anatomists have succeeded in discovering their base; Hatchet, Pepys, Bezelius, Fourcroy, and the celebrated professor of chymistry, M. Vaugelin, have also had recourse to acids, for the purpose of analyzing the hard substance of the teeth. The ancients were not ignorant of the injurious effects which acids have upon the teeth. The prophet Jeremiah says, "Every man that eateth the sour grape his teeth shall be set on edge, and Solomon, who was not unacquainted with the physical sciences, observed an analogy between the action of smoke upon the eyes, and that of vinegar upon the Teeth.* We must acknowledge then, that the edging of the teeth constitutes the first degree of pain; and all the acids, vegetable and mineral, produce this effect. Vinegar is not then the only acids which deteriorates the teeth by rendering them white; all acid substances, which are capable of setting them on edge, have a similar tendency, such as sorel, lemon-juice, cream of tartar, and the mineral acids, in whatever form they are applied, and by whatever specious denomination they may be called. B Martin remarked, more than one hundred years ago, in his Dissertation on the Teeth, that acids corrode and calcine the Teeth, and, in time, they make them permanently yellow, he might have added, that, having lost their polish, they afterwards become black. I knew a lady whose Teeth had acquired the colour of horn, from the loss of the enamel, after having made use of an acid preparation for a long time, the dangerous consequences of which, by an express order, were publicly exposed in hand-bills in 1793, and by the Denmark Journals.

By what facility then, are the minds of men fascinated with these powders and tinctures, which have an acid base? I am sorry to say that, even in our time, there are Dentists who make use of these perfidious agents; for the purpose of cleaning the teeth. I am acquainted with several young ladies at boarding schools, whose teeth have been cleaned by means of a piece of wood, moistened with acids; their teeth were very white at first, but being violently set on edge, became at length carious and black; thus presenting an example of the bad tendency of this detestable custom. Let those Dentists, who use acids, content themselves with the use of instruments instead; which, when directed with address, never injure the Teeth; otherwise the evil consequences of this practice, will show the danger of the cosmetick, and they will justly forfeit the public confidence.

Sir John Sinclair has ascertained, by a series of experiments conducted under his superintendence, that permanent and beautiful colours in silk, cotton and woollen goods, may be produced from the flower of the potato. Sir John says, that these colours are "equal to the finest tints procured from the most valuable foreign materials, and in richness of shade they are likely, in some cases, to be even superior;" and he adds, that "it is a peculiar advantage attending this discovery, that the cutting of the flowers of the potato is not prejudicial to the plant; on the contrary, by preventing the formation of the seed or apple, there is reason to believe that it will add to the weight and improve the quality of the root."

PRESERVATION OF POTATOES.

Potatoes at the depth of one foot in the ground, produce shoots near the end of spring; at the depth of two feet they appear in the middle of summer; at three feet they are very short, and never come to the surface; and between three and five feet they cease to vegetate. In consequence of observing these effects several parcels of potaatoes were buried in a garden at the depth of three and a half feet, and were not removed until after an interval of one or two years. They were then found without any shoots, and possessing their original freshness, firmness, goodness, and taste.

From the Encyclopædia Americana.

ANIMAL HEAT.

Animal Heat is that property of all animals, by means of which they preserve a certain temperature, which is quite independent of that of the medium by which they are surrounded, and appears rather to be in proportion to the degree of sensibility and irritability possessed by them. It is greatest in birds. The more free and independent the animal is, the more uniform is its temperature. On this account, the human species preserves a temperature nearly equal, about 96°–100° Fahr., in the frozen regions at the pole, and beneath the equator; and on this account, too, the heat of the human body remains the same when exposed to the most extreme degrees of temperature; in fact, cold at first rather elevates, and extreme heat rather depresses the temperature of the human body. Fordyce and Blagden endured the temperature of an oven heated almost to redness, and two girls in France entered a baker's oven heated to 269° Fahr., in which fruits were soon dried up, and water boiled. A Spaniard, Francisco Martinez by name, exhibited himself, a short time since, at Paris, in a stove heated to 279° of Fahr., and threw himself, immediately after, into cold water. Blagden was exposed in an oven to a heat of 257° in which water boiled, though covered with oil. There is also a remarkable instance of a similar endurance of heat by the convulsionnaires, as they were called, upon the grave of St. Medardus, in France. A certificate signed by several eye-witnesses, among whom were Armand Arouet, the brother of Voltaire, and a Protestant nobleman from Perth, states that a woman named la Sonet, surnamed the salamander, lay upon a fire nine minutes at a time, which was repeated four times within two hours, making, in all, 36 minutes, during which time fifteen sticks of wood were consumed. The correctness of the fact stated is allowed even by those opposed to the abuses in which it originated. The flames sometimes unite over the woman, who seemed to sleep; and the whole miracle is to be attributed to the insensibility of the skin and nerves, occasioned by a fit of religious insanity. These facts are the results of law of all living substances, viz., that the temperature of the living body cannot be raised above certain limits, which nature has fixed. There is also an increased flow of perspiration, by means of which the heat of the body is carried off. The extreme degrees of cold which are constantly endured by the human frame without injury are well known, and are to be explained only by this power in the living body to generate and preserve its own heat. The greater the irritability of individuals whether from age, sex, peculiarity of constitution the greater the warmth of the body: it seems also to depend, in part, upon the quickness of the circulation of the blood: thus children and small animals, whose circulation is lively, feel the cold least. The heat and the power of preserving it differ also in the different parts of the body; those appearing to be warmest in which there is the most copious supply of blood, as the brain, the head and neck the lungs and central parts of the body. We see also, that when the irritability of the body, or any part of it, is particularly increased, the heat of the part undergoes a similar change. Increased activity and motion of the body, as in walking, running, &c., and diseases of increased excitement, as fever and inflammation, produce a similar increase in the temperature of the body. All this justifies the conclusion, that animal heat depends chiefly upon the irritability of the body, and is thus most intimately connected with the state of the nervous system. This view is confirmed by the late experiments of Brodie, who ascribed this power of the living body to the influence of the brain. He destroyed the brain of a rabbit, and kept up the respiration by artificial means; but the heat of the animal regularly diminished.

COLONY OF BEAVERS.

IN THE CANTON OF GRUNEBERG, DISTRICT OF MAGDEBURG.

Not far from the town of Barby, and on a small river, the Nuthe, and half a league above the point where this discharges itself into the Elbe, from the right side, a colony of beavers has been established for more than a century. The country is desert covered with willows, intersected by the Nuthe, which is extremely tortuous, and not more than six or eight yards in breadth; from time immemorial it has borne the name of Biberlache (beaver-ditch). Many couples of beavers are still living there, in spacious burrows, which are frequently thirty or forty paces in length, and, being on a level with the river, have two entrances,—one of which opens under the water of the river, the other upon the plain. These animals have also constructed many huts in the neighbourhood of their burrows, but these huts bear no resemblance to such as are described by travellers in North America; they are heaps of branches and trunks of trees, placed together without skill, and piled to the height of eight or ten feet. In autumn, when the instinct for building is most developed among these animals, they cover the branches with soft earth, which they obtain at the river, and push before them to the hut, by means of their breast and fore-paws. Thus covered in, their huts resemble ovens; they are not generally used for places of residence, but only serve to shelter them when the rising of the waters drives them from their burrows.

A naturalist who has watched their proceedings with much attention, never saw them construct dams, except in the warm summer of 1822, when the colony amounted in number to fifteen or twenty. At this time the waters of the Nuthe were so low as to have sunk below the entrances of the burrows which opened into the river. The beavers then selected a part of the river with a small island in the centre wherein to construct a dam; strong branches of trees were thrown into the water on each side of this eminence, and the interstices were filled up with earth and reeds; the work was so well executed that it raised the level of the water a foot. M. de Meyrick, the naturalist, to whom we have alluded, had it destroyed several times, but it was invariably re-constructed, and always in the same manner, on the following night.

These beavers are never seen during the day, except when the waters of the Elbe rise above their burrows; they then lie upon their huts or upon their neighbouring willows. But if the height of the waters do not absolutely force them to quit their huts or subterranean abodes, they only come forth in the evening after sunset.

They swim with equal rapidity against the current, or with it; and according as they believe themselves in greater or less security, they raise only their nose and forehead, or their entire head and back, above water. When they have ascertained that there is no danger, they land and frequently go 50 yards from the river to cut with their incisors willows and aspens for their food, or young oaks and elms for their buildings. In summer and in autumn, they frequently swim to the distance of a league, but always return the same night.—In winter they go out only every eight or fifteen days to seek their food; during this season they close the entrance to their dens on the land side with branches of willow, the bark of which serves to support them. When the branch of a tree which has been cut off, is too much for one to move, several combine for the purpose; but usually they cut pieces two or three feet in length, and singly carry them to the water in their mouths, and not between their fore-feet, as some authors have believed. When eating they sit upon their hind-feet and they gnaw the young branches of willow or aspen by turning them rapidly in their mouths with the fore paws.

It is always close to the water that beavers take their food; and, while eating, their faces are invariably turned towards the river. They never eat the bark of a tree or shrub which is standing, as others of the Rodentia tribe do; it is necessary for them to have the branches cut and separated. No difficulty repels them from the food which they prefer; for they frequently pass several nights in effecting the fall of a willow, from 12 to 14 inches in diameter. These animals generally cut much more than is required for their food and for their buildings; they have been seen to cut many trunks of willows without any branches, six or eight inches in diameter, and from which they could derive no advantage. M. de Meyrick has not observed them eat fruit, although there was some in the neighbourhood; neither do they eat fish nor crayfish.

The beavers have produced their young by the month of April; at the age of two months, they follow their mother by swimming. They never bear more than three. At the end of a year, they are not taller than a hare, and do not reach their full size till after the second year.

The beavers are not so gentle as Buffon has been pleased to represent them; they have been seen to kill otters; females with their young have turned upon hunters, who were obliged to defend themselves; and a female was seen to bite her young ones, because they wanted to gnaw a branch of willow she was holding in her mouth.

THE GATHERER.

BURMESE TEMPLES.

In the Burman towns and villages the number of temples seem to exceed the number of dwellings, which is not unusual. The former are as splendid as gilding can make them, and the latter as humble as can be conceived from the frail materials of which they are constructed—bamboos, palm leaves, and grass. The wealth of a Burman, always insecure, is very generally expended on the luxury of temple-building. Religious merit, indeed, consists mainly in the construction of one of these huge, costly, and showy edifices; and is not considered as increased by building a durable one. No one ever thinks of repairing or restoring an old temple; and the consequence is, that in every part of the country may be seen half finished structures of enormous magnitude—the respective founders having died before they were completed.

PETROLEUM.

Petroleum Wells supply the whole Burman empire with oil for lamps, and also for smearing timber, to protect it against insects, and particularly the white ant. Its consumption for burning is stated to be universal, until its price reaches that of sesamum oil, the only other kind used for lamps. The wells, which occupy a space of about sixteen square miles, vary in depth from two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet; the shaft is square, not more than four feet each side, and is formed by sinking a frame of wood. The oil, on coming up, is about the temperature of ninety degrees of Fahrenheit. It is thrown into a large cistern, in the bottom of which are small apertures for the aqueous part to drain off, when the oil is left for some time to thicken. It is then put into large earthen jars, placed in rude carts drawn by oxen, and carried to the banks of the river, from whence it is sent by water-carriage to every part of the empire. By the number and burden of the boats employed in this trade, and the number of voyages they are supposed to make in the course of a year, the exportation from the wells is estimated to amount to 17,568,000 vis, of twenty six pounds and a half each. Thirty vis a-year is reckoned to be the average consumption of a family of five persons and a half; and about two thirds of the oil are supposed to be employed for burning.

TURKISH JOKE.

When the Caliph Haroun el Raschid (who was the friend of the great Charlemagne,) entertained Ebn Oaz at his court in the quality of jester he desired him one day, in the presence of the Sultana and all her followers, to make an excuse worse than the crime it was intended to extenuate; the Caliph walked about, waiting for a reply. After a long pause, Ebn Oaz skulked behind the throne, and pinched his highness in the rear. The rage of the Caliph was unbounded. "I beg a thousand pardons of your majesty," said Ebn Oaz, "but I thought it was her Highness the Sultana." This was the excuse worse than the crime; and of course the jester was pardoned.

BAD HABIT.

Sir Frederick Flood had a droll habit of which he could never effectually break himself (at least in Ireland.) Whenever a person at his back whispered or suggested any thing to him whilst he was speaking in public, without a moment's reflection, he always repeated the suggestion literatim. Sir Frederick was once making a long speech in the Irish Parliament, lauding the transcendent merits of the Wexford magistracy, on a motion for extending the criminal jurisdiction in that county, to keep down the disaffected. As he was closing a most turgid oration by declaring "that the said magistracy ought to receive some signal mark of the Lord Lieutenant's favour,"—John Egan, who was rather mellow, and sitting behind him, jocularly whispered, "and be whipped at the cart's tail."—"And be whipped at the cart's tail!" repeated Sir Frederick unconsciously, amidst peals of uncontrollable laughter.

OUR GREAT CITIES.

In all our great cities, the females are more numerous than the males. The average of our six largest cities, Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New-Orleans, gives 109 females to every 100 males, while the average of the whole United States gives but 97 females to every 100 males, making the females in our cities about 12 per cent. more numerous than in the country at large. This great excess of female population in our large cities, is to be attributed in part to the fact, that many of the males are engaged in occupations in which there is unusual risk of life. Our seamen, for example, are taken principally from the towns on the coast.

This, however, does not account for the whole difference, for it is a singular fact, that in every one of the above mentioned cities, among the children under sixteen years of age, where of course the cause referred to does not operate, the females are more numerous than the males, while in every State in the Union, the fact is the reverse; and in the new states especially, the excess of males among the children is very great. In the states of Alabama, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, for example, all of which have been recently settled, there are among the children under ten years of age, 76,067 boys, and 70,033 girls; that is for every 100 boys there are only 92 girls; in the old states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and the District of Columbia, there 153 113 boys, and 153 384 girls; that is, for every 100 boys there are 97 girls; while in our six largest cities, there are, under ten years of age, 28 319 boys, and 28 223 girls; that is, for 100 boys there are nearly 100 girls.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Think how the dog, fond and faithful creature as he is, from being the most docile and obedient of all animals, is made the most dangerous, if he become mad; so men acquire a frightful and not less monstrous power when they are in a state of moral insanity, and break loose from their social and religious obligations. Remember too how rapidly the plague of diseased opinions is communicated, and that if it once gain head, it is as difficult to be stopt as a conflagration or a flood.

CURIOUS POST OFFICE.

It is said, as the Isle of Ascension is visited by the homeward-bound ships on account of its sea fowls, fish, turtle, and goats, there is in a crevice of the rock a place called the "Post office," where letters are deposited, shut up in a well-corked bottle, for the ships that next visit the island.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

LORENZO STARK.

Translated from the German of Engel, for the Ladies Magazine.

The young master Stark had given his word, to appear at the publick concert, and for this purpose had decked himself out in a light-brown velvet coat, with a gold embroidered vest. He had spent rather two much time over his dress, and now proceeded in great haste into the common counting-room, where the old gentleman sat beside the counter. Frederick! Frederick! Frederick! exclaimed he, whilst he tore open again with violence the scarcely closed-to doors.

God be with us! said the old gentleman; what is the matter?—and took down his spectacles.

The son ordered a light for the seals, threw himself down to his writing-table, and muttered to the old gentleman sideways the words: I have got to work—Letters to write.

So hastily? said the old gentleman. I have repeated it to you already so often: considerate and uninterrupted labour is of more avail than working passionately and by impulses. Yet it is true! 'Tis true! The sooner one gets rid of the work-table, so much the earlier—

One comes to the gaming-table, he would have said; but because Frederick then entered with a light, so he recovered himself, and swallowed the word.

To whom are you writing then? he began again after a little while.

To Everard Born in S**.

The son?

The father's name is Augustus, not Everard.

Good! my compliments to him—I often think as yet of the journey last summer; wherein I became acquainted with him. He is indeed an excellent young man!

O yes! muttered the son to himself. Who were only like him!

A regular, industrious, gentlemanly man, born as it were for a merchant. Full of spirit, to undertake any thing, but not without consideration; in his external appearance so becoming, so simple, no friend to velvet and embroidery, and, what I particularly estimate in him—no gamester. I think he would yet lose the first Solo* in his life. If he ever indeed plays, it is not in cards, but with his children. Oh and the old gentleman, his father! who can be a father to him so entirely out of a full heart: he is a fortunate man!—I know fathers, continued he, in a little lower voice, who could sin against him, who could envy him.

Write, or—said the son, whilst he punched one pen after another on the table, and threw them away.

The old gentleman looked at him a while. Are you really quite as angry as it seems?

Who would not be so? muttered the son again to himself.

Am I perhaps the cause? Have I not hit your taste?—He arose and went to his son's table. I know, you are indeed, no friend to hints and allusions, and I can also speak plainly.

O there is no need of it, said the son, and wrote on.

The old gentleman took the pen gently out of his hand, cleaned it and laid it aside. See! he then began: it is ever from day to day a source of vexation to me, that I must have for a son a man of so liberal a head and of so narrow a heart. A man, who for his finery, his pleasure, who in Phombré and whist, trifles away one ducat after another, often also indeed, by the dozen: who but only yesterday again has played until night-fall; and who, if he should have a smart run of business, would perhaps be master of not a single dollar; a man, who ever continues single, because no match is rich enough for him; and who yet has always enough left to support a gig, to ride about, to act the cavalier, and to wear velvet and embroidery. I can not surely have done you injustice, he proceeded, after a short pause; for you cannot answer me.

O, I could, said the son, whilst he arose with passion; but—

Speak then! what hindered you?

* That is, he had never played: if he should play and lose, it would be for the first time in his life.

By Heaven! I am tired of living on so—O that I dared to hope that! I am now, methinks, a man, and no more a child. Wherefore am I still treated as a child? Son! son! there are old children.

I am attentive; I neglect nothing that is to be done; I never lose sight of the esteem and respect toward you.

Only obedience a little.

I conduct your business with honesty and fidelity; and yet—yet I cannot live a single hour in peace; yet is each moment of my existence embittered with reproaches without end; yet is every diversion, every poor pleasure grudged me.

You speak very harshly, but very true; every poor pleasure.

Poor—because it costs me nothing; or but a little. What have I then as yet lost, if I have lost?

The most costly thing we have: the time.

And shall I then have no enjoyment of my youth? Shall I always labour on as you do; support myself, confine myself even as you do? Shall I—

Now, why hesitate? speak out!

Shall I—save together by dollars in order to throw away by the hundreds?

To throw away, said the old gentleman, to whom nothing in the world seemed so insupportable, as that children should attempt to controul the free use of a self-earned property. Did I, indeed, think it, that the young man would yet become my guardian! To throw away! What do you mean by that. What do you call throwing away. Speak!—He went near him and seized him somewhat roughly by the arm. To hold open his purse to every honest man, who needs assistance; any thing like this!

Honest, said the son, with a moderately sunken voice; if they were all so!

O, I am still a little deceived. I comprehend my man first in the countenance, ere I give. And what do you call then throwing away—speak!

You lend to all—without having the least thing therefrom.

Fool! without having the least thing therefrom. He withdrew the hand from his arm, and gave him a look of contempt. I have this therefrom, to see that it goes well with my fellow-men. Do you consider this as nothing? And when at some future day they bear me down the long pathway (to the tomb) and I leave all behind me here, so I hope, there will be many a one to say with tears in his eyes: mercy upon the upright man! I have to thank him with my wife and children for my whole prosperity. I was in trouble, and I came unto him; then he helped up, and I was enabled to preserve my honour. With you on the contrary—Yet why stand I here and preach to the wind. Your head has at once its own philosophy; and would to God, that it were a more judicious one! But ever again to your work! Write! Write!

TALES OF TRAVELLERS.

The following fine specimens of the tales of travellers, taken from the last number of the London New Monthly Magazine, will afford amusement to our readers. The writer might, with great propriety, have added to his collection some of those beautiful truths in relation to our country with which English tourists have garnished their travels; that for instance, told, we think, by Veld, of a mosquito that bit through George Washington's boot. Washington City Chronicle.

Father Dominic Fernandez Navarette, a Spanish Dominican friar, who, in 1646, became resident in China, tells us that the bird of paradise has neither feet nor wings. Father Dominic viewed them carefully and could observe neither. They alight only on trees, moving as the wind wafts them, by means of long tails of various colours, and as fine as can be imagined. If the wind fails, they fall; and having a long bill, are precipitated head foremost into the ground, where they stick and are taken. The intestines are drawn out, dried, and preserved for their beauty.

"They look," says Father Dominic, "very glorious, and are beyond all nose-gays." He presented a couple to a great lady who had done him considerable courtesies. "I inquired," he continues, "after their nests, and how they hatched their eggs. They answered me, that the hen laid her eggs upon the cock's back, and there hatched them. I made several objections, but they could give me no more satisfaction. It is certainly so; it seems impossible, but is easy to him that made all things."

Another singular bird, called Tubon, lays an egg bigger than itself. After it is laid, the bird digs a hole, above a yard in depth, deposits the egg, and fills up the hole. The sun then takes the rest of the trouble: hatches the egg, and leaves the young bird to grope its way up to day-light. The moment it accomplishes this arduous undertaking, it trots off to the sea to pick up sea-weed. Father Dominic is certainly surprised at their not being stifled by the heat and weight of the superincumbent stratum, and at their strength in breaking through it. But as he sensibly observes, "these are prodigies of the Almighty's working." One of these eggs is enough to satisfy a good stomach, and the staler they are the better. If they have chickens in them, nothing can be finer or more delicious.

"In Congo," says a Capuchin missionary, "are sparrows which, in rainy weather, turn red;" and he adds, on the authority of Father Francesco da Pavia, that, on the way to Singa, are certain large white birds, with long beaks, necks, and feet, that dance as soon as they hear music. A bird not unlike a sparrow, which at a distance appears black, but on approaching turns blue, at day-break almost distinctly articulates the name of Jesus Christ; other birds then join in concert, being excited by a cross on the mountains, which got there heaven knows how; by the earth, which bears a fruit called 'Nicefo,' marked also with a natural cross. Another bird, supported by the testimony of Father Caprivi, sings in right Etruscan, 'Va dritto,' go right; and a third warbles in the language of the country, 'Vuichi, vuichi,' honey, honey. There is likewise a dark yellow bird, bigger than an eagle, that cries like a child." This might be a fitting ornament for a nursery.

In Java, the cassuary will swallow iron and burning coals, and keep them undigested a full twelvemonth in its bowels. In Brazil, the bats are as large as crows, and in the island of Catigban they are as big as eagles, very good eating, and taste much like a hen. George Spilbergen, 1614, captured two birds with heads like sheep, and combed like a cock; two ell in height, and three ell from the tip of one extended wing to the other. Along the Nile are little birds about the size of thrushes, that haunt the jaws of crocodiles. The cause appears to be this. Crocodiles devour beasts and fishes, and hence remnants of flesh and fish stick to their teeth, become petrified, and procreate worms. The crocodile leaves open his mouth, the bird enters and eats his fill. But at last, finding his teeth fairly picked, the monster, ungrateful to his benefactor, endeavors to devour him. The bird, however, is armed with a little stiletto growing from its head; and this it instantly thrusts into the traitor's throat, forces open the jaws, and frees itself from durance. Antonio Galvano, a Portuguese, tells us that in New Spain there are certain small birds named Picmalim. "They are greatly esteemed to work gold with. They die or sleep every year in the month of October, sitting upon a little bough in a warm and close place. They revive or wake again in the month of April, after the flowers be sprung, and therefore they call them the 'reviving birds.'" The celebrated Ferdinand Mendez Pinto reports, that the kingdom of Chintaleubos, which is eight days' journey across, was dispeopled by the infinite multitude of birds that covered it.

In the river Zaire, in Egypt, are found mermaids—the upper part woman, as we all know, and the lower, fish. Its head is round, and its face like that of a calf. It has a large ugly mouth, little ears, and round full eyes. Upon its back is a perforated skin, which seems to have been designed for a lady's mantle, and so, contrived as either to open or shut. Its bones staunch blood, and the Capuchin Merolla da Sorrento has eaten of this creature very frequently. It tastes like swine's flesh; lives upon herbs growing by the water's edge, and permits only its human part to be visible. Columbus himself is said to have seen three mermaids at once, with an extraordinary fish, as large as a whale, which had on its neck a shell like that of a tortoise. Its head, resembling a hog's head, was lifted out of the water.

The worthy William Davies, also, barber-surgeon of London, who quitted England on the 23th of January, 1597, relates that "Morria is a small low island, lying in the river of Amazonas, the highest part of the West Indies. This island is altogether inhabited by women, having no mankind amongst them; they go altogether naked, using bows and arrows for the killing their food.—The hair of their head is long, and their breasts hang low. And whereas many here in England do imagine that they have their right breast seared and cut off, it is no such matter now: what hath been in times past I know not," which is a very sagacious observation. He had also seen very good oysters and muscles growing upon trees, and had eaten many a hundred of them. So also did Obwer, Noore, a Dutchman, in 1665, in Guinea.—The trees bore oysters three times a year; but he believed that they had been there "since Noah's flood, when

*Piscium et summa genus haurit olim
Nota quæ sedes fuerat columbis;*

the fish got their way into the sea again." Equally remarkable is another fact recorded by Master Davies, the barber-surgeon; for at Naples he saw the tomb of "one Virgil, a learned man."

We are sure that nothing told for truth was ever more "ridiculously vain" than the story which we subjoin. "Returning through the deserts," says a Minorite Friar, one John de Plano Carpin, "they came into a certain country wherein (as it was reported unto us in the Emperor's court, by certain clergymen of Russia and others, who were long time among them, and that by strong and steadfast affirmation) they found certain monsters resembling women; who, being asked by many interpreters where the men of that land were, they answered, that whatsoever women were born there, were endued with the shape of mankind, but the males were like unto dogs. And delaying the time in that country, they met with the said dogs on the other side of the river. And in the midst of sharp winter they cast themselves into the water. Afterward, they wallowed in the dust upon the main land, and so the dust being mingled with water, was frozen to their backs; and having oftentimes so done, the ice being strongly frozen upon them, with great fury they came to fight against the Tartars. And when the Tartars threw their darts, or shot their arrows among them, they rebounded back again as if they had lighted upon stones; and the rest of their weapons could by no means hurt them. Howbeit the dogs made an assault upon the Tartars, and wounding some of them with their teeth, and slaying others, at length drove them out of their countries. And thereupon they have a proverb of the same matter as yet rife among them, which they speak in jesting sort to one another, 'My father, or my brother was slain of dogs.' The women they took they brought into their own country, who remained there till their dying day."

MISCELLANY.

CHINESE BURIALS.

A series of numbers have appeared in the Post in Canton, under the title of "Recollections of China," that are well worth perusing. The only drawback we have felt, as to their republication, has been whether or not the circumstances they profess to record, are to be regarded as facts or fiction. Our intercourse with China is limited; and from the very nature of her institutions, our knowledge of her manners and customs of that people must be partial and incomplete. But whatever may be our impressions as to the general character of the people included to, and whatever proportion of fancy we may suppose to be interwoven in the narrative, still there is a flow of sentiment in the conclusion of the extract subjoined, that must have found a response in every feeling heart.

The Chinese, if they do not much reflect upon a future state, have yet a great desire to be buried in a good coffin; and in some this amounts to such a passion that their life passes like a silk worm's, in the preparation of something fine to cover themselves when they are dead. They have also a careful eye to the coffin of a friend, and a son will sell himself to slavery to buy a good one for his father, whom perhaps he neglected while alive, as in occidental countries we raise monuments to genius, when it is dead, that we suffered to languish in want while it lived. Where the coffin is splendid, the funeral is, of course, magnificent; and if a family is unable to bury its dead in a suitable, that is, in a sumptuous manner, the bodies are kept sealed and glazed in the coffin, until more favourable times, it may be for twenty years.

In a country where death is so much honoured, there must be a code of funeral ceremonies. The first part of a funeral is somewhat like an Irish burial, and consists in howling; in which all the mourners and friends are expected to bear a part. After a few howls, judiciously varied, come refreshments and tea. The funeral procession is led by musick, and has banners, streamers and images. The eldest son walks with a stick, as if to intimate that he is overcome with grief. Their dead are buried in places that do no more credit to the living than our sombre grave yards. It is an amiable weakness in the survivors to suppose that their deceased friends may be gratified with a tomb in a pleasant spot;—some airy hill, shaded with trees, where they themselves may linger to muse and commune in spirit with the departed. When a friend is dead, it strikes upon our hearts to remember how we misprized him and how ill we requited his kindness. We forget his failings before we have covered him with earth, and remember only what is amiable. We recal the thousand times that he preferred our happiness to his own, and our harsh return for what was kindly meant. He is beyond the reach of our vain regrets and late remorse; but it is some relief to a wounded spirit to lay him in a shaded spot, and "manibus plenis" to scatter flowers upon his grave. Excuse me for this digression, but I feel that I write. I am myself lacerated by this vain regret, and late remorse. I would give ten years of life that I might recall from death for one month, a friend who never knew how much I loved him, if he judged me with half the severity with which I now condemn myself. He lies in the deep sea, where flowers cannot be scattered, or inscriptions graven, and I have no monument for him but these lines of self reproach, that I have written in sorrow, and you will read with indifference.

From the London Court Journal.

THE INVISIBLE GIRL.

A romance of real life connected with this obsolete wonder, is sufficiently striking in its incidents to deserve recording. The daughter of count B., a Hanoverian nobleman, having formed an imprudent attachment, which was opposed by the wishes of her whole family, took occasion to elope with the object of her affection; with whom, after various vicissitudes on the continent, she was persuaded to visit England. For some weeks the fugitives were detained at Dover by want of funds to proceed on their journey; and when at length their remittances arrived, the seducer found it more agreeable to return alone to Germany, than to proceed with his mistress to London. He sailed clandestinely on board the first packet; and the abandoned Ariadne, resolving to seek the protection of the Hanoverian minister, took her solitary way to town, and chanced to arrive at Canterbury in the midst of the tumult of the fair. A pedestrian traveller is not nice in the selection of hotels; and in the inn, where the young Countess accidentally took up her rest, the proprietor and mechanism of the invisible girl were also deposited for the night. The Hanoverian was young, beautiful, and accomplished; and withal pennyless and hungry; the proprietor acute and prosperous, and in especial want of an expert linguist to assist in his deceptions. A compact, advantageous to both parties, was quickly arranged. He promised a father's protection, and food, and a due proportion of pounds sterling; while the young Countess agreed to furnish "an airy tongue to syllable men's names" in half the languages of Europe.

Meanwhile her two brothers, burning with anxiety to rescue her from the hands of the adventurer who had beguiled her from her family, set forth from Hanover,—traced her from place to place, from town to town,—from France to England; till at length they were startled at Dover, by tidings of the desertion and wretchedness which had befallen her, and lost at the same time all traces of her route. They resolved, however, to prosecute their search through the metropolis; and during several months the young foreigners occupied themselves in visiting every obscure retreat consecrated to the destitute and the miserable in the city or its suburbs,—but in vain. At length, when time had in some measure reconciled them to the event, and wholly dissipated their expectations of success, they agreed to pass away a vacant hour in a visit to the invisible girl, where Adelheid, at her post behind a crevice, was stationed to satisfy the inquiries of the curious. The astonishment, and terror, and interest which overcame her startled feelings may be easily imagined; but with matchless presence of mind she determined to ascertain the disposition of her brothers towards herself, and to plead her own cause by a seemingly preternatural ministry.

"Who are we?" was the first question of the strangers,—a question satisfied with miraculous accuracy. "What has brought us to England?" was the second demand. "A desire of vengeance against one who has disgraced her family." "And where, supposing your opinion a just one,—where shall we find the dishonoured object of our search?"—"Providence, which has hitherto watched over the destinies of the unhappy Adelheid, will not abandon her to undeserved chastisement. Till you are moved to a more merciful view of her sufferings, no trace of her actual condition will be revealed to you." "But you are mistaken, mighty wizard: our intentions are of a milder nature. Your art should have instructed you that we are come to support, to sustain, to defend our sister; to temper the wind to the shorn lamb, and restore her to the anxious affection of her parents."
